

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

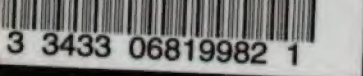

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

THE Second Volume of the new and enlarged series of EVANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM is now completed, and with it the fifteenth year of our literary existence; during which period we have been enabled to chronicle no small amount of important progress in various departments of the Church of Christ. We feel assured that events are approaching replete with undiminished interest to all sections of the Church, as well as to that cause of catholic union and love which has been our more distinctive object; and we trust that, having once more reached the starting-post, we may, with renewed help and strength, run the race set before us during the ensuing year.

While our intelligence from the Continent of Europe has been perhaps our most constant and peculiar source of interest, we have been increasingly desirous to obtain special communications from missionaries in all parts of the world, and of all denominations; thus more and more manifesting the oneness of Christ's real Church and the catholicity of our views. And as EVANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM is now extensively circulated amongst missionaries of all denominations throughout the greater part of the earth, we trust to receive from various regions communications of increased interest and variety. Nor would we desire to confine such communications to those who agree with our own views. Rather, we would wish that Christian correspondents, in a true brotherly Christian spirit, would freely exercise their liberty of pointing out what they may think mistakes in our columns, if by so doing good may ensue to the great cause of truth and righteousness. Either in the editorial department, or in communications from correspondents, opinions may sometimes be broached with reference to missionary operations, or other subjects, which may seem to some minds ill-founded. We are living in an age of progress, of transition, and of great mental as well as mechanical activity. It is well, we think, within a certain range, and always in a spirit of sobriety and gentleness and kindness, to freely ventilate subjects of the kind referred to, in order to prevent stereotyping and stagnating where variety and movement may be more desirable; or, at all events, in order to reburnish what may prove, after all, to be sterling, though questioned for a time. Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. And manly frankness in discussion can very well consist with mutual forbearance, and tend to mutual edification. Let our friends, therefore, kindly and fairly and openly speak out, and so by the blessing of God shall we. We are anxious for the increased development of missionary effort. In arts and arms and commerce and mechanical improvements the world stands not still, but proceeds with giant strides, and we are far from imagining that the Church of the Living God is either at the end of her resources, or stereotyped into unadaptive rigidity in any of her branches. Invention, the highest faculty of the human mind, has ample room and verge enough in the wide field of spiritual development before us. The evangelization of the world is a work demanding all our resources, and suggesting many an hitherto untried effort. The very assaults of the antagonists of Inspired Truth suggest the necessity for strong lines of defence. And both at home and abroad the revived vigour of sacred learning, and of sound Biblical criticism (of the Old Testament in particular), is indicated as a special necessity of our day. We hope to be able, from time to time, to pay some attention to this department in a humble way. And we believe that the noticing of new works on such subjects in our columns will have more than a mere literary bearing. Since EVANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM circulates so largely among Christians on the Continent of Europe, as well as amongst missionaries in all parts of the world, they—the latter especially—may obtain information as to valuable works, or be warned against others of a different character, through this—perhaps the only—channel of information to which they can have periodical access. We are aware that it has been so in some instances, and we have received from scholars of note and from distant missionaries an intelligent and warm approval of what we have heretofore essayed, both with respect to our views on missionary qualification in certain regions, and to our criticism on theological opinions and works of sacred learning. Bigotry and intolerance we indeed protest against, though error must be exposed in maintaining the cause of truth. But the spirit of Christian mutual forbearance ought to be constantly kept in mind as the recognised rule for brethren amidst the trials which attend the Church on earth. May this spirit be graciously vouchsafed in abundance both to writers and readers of our journal! and may our pages prove a stimulus and a refreshment to many who, especially in heathen lands, or arduous circumstances, are labouring to advance the Kingdom of God!

Evangelical Christendom.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE SPIRIT AND PRIVATE JUDGMENT.

A LETTER from Dr. Dorner, of Gottingen, which appeared in our last April number, has elicited some critical inquiries by Dr. Fitzgerald, Bishop of Cork, in a letter addressed by him to Professor M'Cosh, of Belfast. The whole correspondence must speak for itself;* but upon one point of some interest and importance we desire to say a few words. Dr. Dorner, in a passage with which we entirely coincided, had referred to the growth of modern High Lutheranism, or Puseyism, in the German Churches as being, at least in part, a reactionary result of the sceptical criticisms of Strauss and others, which had shaken confidence in the historical credibility of the Holy Scriptures, and had, therefore, sent men to lean instead upon the authority of the Church. In contrast to this he instanced Luther, as having risen above the trammels of Church pretension, because he had obtained through the Scriptures, by the Holy Spirit's direct influence, an experimental acquaintance with Christ and salvation. Dr. Dorner alleged that in later times German theology had lost sight of this, which he calls "testimonium Spiritus Sancti;" so that men were "led away from the experimental process of salvation, and from seeking after the assurance of faith through the Holy Spirit, and through believing communion with Christ. It led to Intellectualism, which attempts to produce conviction, by the operation and demonstrations of reason alone—a conviction which, when thus reached, must always be in itself weak and superficial, whether the rational argument for the Divine authority of the Scriptures be taken from historical, or a priori reasons, or in the end supports itself upon the authority of the Church. I admit that the arguments of reason for the authority of the Scriptures which are commonly in use, especially in England, ought not to be despised. Though not decisive in themselves, yet when taken along with the more inner spiritual way of the Reformation, they form a powerful means both of defending and advancing the interests of truth; they defend and secure the historical realistic side of Christianity; and enable it to come to an understanding with history and empirical fact. The co-operation of English and German theology would be able to maintain the truth victoriously against the aggression, both of infidelity and superstition."

We cannot see anything obscure in this statement of Dr. Dorner's. On the contrary, it seems to us quite clear, and it commends itself to our sober judgment. Only we are led to suppose that Dr. Dorner's allusion to English theology is limited to certain schools; because there is assuredly a large body of English divinity which fully recognises what he calls the "testimonium Spiritus Sancti," and the "experimental process of salvation."

What the Bishop of Cork himself really admits or rejects upon this point, we are not able clearly to apprehend. He, however, demands "a test," whereby this testimony of the Spirit is to be distinguished from "enthusiasm"—unless, indeed, it be "a self-evidencing light," which neither requires nor admits any test at all. We shall not further enter into the argument, as it lies between these very learned divines; who, we may hope, will, at least, satisfy each other. But it seems to us that this question, as propounded by Dr. Fitzgerald, affects, on the one hand, the distinctive work of the Holy Spirit; and, on the other, the indefeasible right and duty of private judgment, upon which a few observations of a more popular kind may not be out of place.

Historical evidences and critical arguments, establishing the authenticity, genuineness, authority, and inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, however invaluable in their place, are certainly not the grounds upon which the majority of mankind can ever receive the Bible as true, or trust to for the salvation of their souls. The Roman Catholic Church, aware of this, supplies the authority of an infallible Church, and implicit confidence therein, as the ready though delusive desideratum; but Protestants must have some more independent and firmer basis to stand upon. Accordingly, as a matter of fact, we find in various ages numbers of enlightened and pious Christians, who have never troubled themselves about historical evidences or critical argumentations, and who place no implicit confidence, nor any confidence whatever, in the teaching of men, or priests, or Churches, and who yet have a firm, invigorating, reasonable, and sanctifying faith in the Divine Word, and a personal hope in its promises. To what end would be the question addressed to a person having such faith and hope, "How do you know that you are not an enthusiast?" Or, again, "How do you know that the Bible is not an imposition upon your credulity?" To the first of these questions the obvious reply would be, something like that of the blind man's of St. John's Gospel, "One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see." Personal consciousness of the peace-giving, illuminating, exhilarating, enfranchising, sanctifying, and comforting power of the indwelling Holy Ghost, who marvellously applies His own Word with these blessed effects—this is the obvious reply to the first question. "I am not mad, most noble Festus, but speak the words of truth and soberness." "I know in whom I have believed."

Does not Scripture itself amply authorise such a confidence as this, arising from a personal experience of the power of the Word and the Spirit of God? We are assured it does. "Taste" is a personal bodily consciousness of which no further account can be given, than that something is sweet, or sour, or bitter, to the taster's palate. To this very thing is the believer's experience likened—"O taste and see that the Lord is good." "If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious." "Sweeter than the honey and the honeycomb," &c., &c., &c. So we read of those to whom the Gospel came, "not in word only, but in power and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance." We read also: "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things." "The anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you," &c. These and multitudes of similar passages justify the believer in attributing to the Holy Spirit, and not to any delusive enthusiasm, those delightful, or sanctifying, or invigorating emotions of the understanding and affections of which he is conscious as a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ; and as a feeder upon the "exceeding great and precious promises, whereby he has been made a partaker of the Divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust." This experience, too, becomes in turn a demonstration strong of the truth and Divine authorship of the Bible itself. A man who drinks fresh and pure water when ready to die of thirst, not only feels restoration and refreshment, but is also convinced, from its results, that the water was originally pure and healthful, even though he did not know so much when he first drank of it. He needs no chemical analysis of the element to convince him scientifically that such is the fact. Nor would he feel any very profound respect for the chemist who should offer to apply his tests to ascertain it. Is it, then, reasoning in a circle to say, "I know that the Bible must be the true Word of God, because it has turned me from darkness to light, from sin to holiness, from misery to happiness; and I know also that this experience of mine must be the operation of God, the Holy Spirit, because I find it in accordance with what the Bible tells me the operation of that Holy Spirit is." We leave it to metaphysical divines to say what they please on this subject; and we appeal to the experience of the children of God of all times as the next best test to one's own consciousness, confident that the said experience and the written Word are, and are felt to be, the mutual corroborators of each other, and tests of a real salvation. Thus the poor blind man of the Gospel, to whom we have already alluded, not only knew that whereas he had been once blind, he had now obtained his eyesight; but he also very shrewdly decided that the great personage who had conferred upon him so inestimable a blessing was both good and powerful, whatever the Scribes and Pharisees might imagine or say to the contrary.

Doubtless a man's palate might be vitiated by fever, or by other disease or habit, so that he might call bitter sweet, and sweet bitter. It is, therefore, in such cases, a matter of common sense that the exception proves the rule. And a man of sound sense would, in such a case, distrust the healthiness of his own organs, finding their testimony contradicted by universal or general experience. So, likewise, if the concurrent testimony of a very considerable number of evidently experienced Christians should contradict my own religious impressions, ground would be hereby afforded to me for at least self-distrust, and new examination, and humble waiting upon God. Nevertheless, even in such a case, we know of no ultimate test but individual conviction or private judgment. A hundred or a thousand people might be imagined to combine to inform a man that, to their perceptions, honey was bitter, and not sweet. He might be startled at first, and led to investigate the state of health of his bodily organs; but being satisfied as to this, he would at the last take his stand upon his own individual consciousness, and rightfully maintain against ten thousand worlds, that honey is, after all, sweet, and not bitter. Much, also, would he be helped to this legitimate conclusion, if, upon reading a number of trustworthy books, and conferring with still other people, he found that many agreed perfectly with himself, and that his organs of taste had not at all deceived him.

It might happen, too, that a man born and bred amongst Unitarians, for instance, should have had no access to the society or to the books of Evangelical believers; but, on reading the Bible only, and receiving the Holy Spirit, had been led individually to a firm reliance upon the Divine Mediatorship and perfect Atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ; to a comfortable persuasion of his own salvation through Him, and to an experimental acquaintance, in his own person, with the operation of the Holy Spirit in His sanctifying and saving power. All the Unitarians around would denominate this man an enthusiast. He knows nothing yet of the experience of other Christians, except as he reads of the same in the New Testament. He has nothing yet to appeal to but his own convictions and the Word of God, in which he sees, as in a glass, those convictions represented and justified, but to the reality or truth of which convictions all his Unitarian friends and teachers are opposed. Greatly will he be hereafter delighted and confirmed when he finds that there is indeed a body of eminent Christians, in all ages, who have agreed with his own new personal experience; but meanwhile he must rely alone upon his own consciousness and upon his God, whose Word he feels has, through the Holy Spirit's power, made him wiser than his teachers. Let us illustrate our subject by a true story:—

Mr. X—— was a gentleman who had been led by the reading of sceptical writers, and other moral and intellectual causes, to disbelieve the inspiration and authority of the Holy Scriptures, and to reject the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, and the other distinctive teachings of the Gospel. For some time he indulged in a sort of so-called philosophical scheme of natural religion and moral and intellectual training, as what was suitable for man; classing all accounts of revelations as either the offspring of imposture, or priestcraft, or well-intentioned zeal, or something else of human origin. At the same time, he admired and read portions of the Scriptures, as being good poetry and fine morality, though much mixed up, as he supposed, with fable and chaff, and illiterate vulgarisms. He also imagined himself to be, if he really was not, a sincere lover of truth, and a searcher after that precious “gem that loves the deep;” and he piqued himself upon his candid willingness to read and to hear all that could be said in favour of revealed religion. He read Paley, and Butler, and Olinthus Gregory, and many other demonstrators of the truth of revelation by historical evidence, and by the arguments from the internal excellence of the Holy Scriptures. But all failed either to convince his understanding, or to affect his heart. He then met with some consistent Christians, whose understandings and acquirements he thought were inferior, but whose godly lives, he plainly saw, were in accordance with virtue and truth; and who professed to derive their principles from the Bible, and to have supernatural assistances of Divine grace to enable them to act out these principles. He looked at this phenomenon as a palpable matter of fact. He then was led to leave off the study of the evidences of Paley and Butler and Co., and to read the writings of some Evangelical divines. He saw that these men wrote and reasoned in a different way about the Scriptures and about the Spirit of God; and though he disliked their style, and thought it tedious and mysterious, he began to suppose it possible there might be some error in the modes of reasoning which he had previously admired. However, he still stumbled at the Bible. No external evidence, he alleged, could substantiate as a revelation from heaven to him that which his reason and feelings and taste revolted against and despised. He would rather distrust results arrived at by balancing of probabilities, than reject those more instinctive suggestions of his nature. Still he desired to know the truth. And revolving this matter in his mind, he came to the determination to ask God (in whom he had always believed) to reveal the truth to himself. He prayed that God would preserve him from receiving the Bible as a Divine revelation, if it were only a human production; and, on the other hand, he prayed to be preserved from rejecting that revelation, if it were truly of God.

After making this prayer he retired to rest, and in the course of the night he was conscious of a mysterious influence on his soul and body. He rose early on a summer morning, and taking the Bible into his bed, he read with new emotions and ineffable delight many of those very passages of the New Testament which he had before stigmatised as unintelligible jargon in barbarous Greek—as, for instance, the Epistles to the Ephesians and Corinthians. Scales seemed to have fallen from his eyes. A new and glorious light shone upon his mind and upon the pages of inspiration, the one answering to the other. For several weeks he almost lived upon the Scriptures, which he found to be indeed sweeter than honey, and redolent of delight. He was convinced of sin. He was gradually illuminated to perceive the beauty of the types of the Old Testament, and to feel the mysterious power of the doctrines of the New—the atonement—Justification by Grace—pardon of sin—promise of heaven—union with Christ and with God, &c., &c. He revelled as in a new world of new delights, and was finally led to complete salvation, and to a life dedicated humbly and gratefully to the service of his Redeeming Lord. The various and successive stages of this experimental acquaintance with the power of the Gospel need not be further adverted to here. But after the first burst of surprise and joy, the doubt was insinuated into his mind whether these emotions might not be entirely delusive and enthusiastic—the workings of those wonderful and mysterious springs and wheels of the human organization which are so little understood—or (if there be evil spirits) the delusive suggestions of one of these to lead away the soul from philosophic truth.

To this insinuation two replies suggested themselves. First, the thing experienced was in harmony with the description given in the Scriptures themselves of what the normal experience of a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ is or ought to be; so that the Book and the experience were evidently traceable to one and the same source or author; they agreed with and corroborated each other.

Secondly, Mr. X — had recourse to certain books, particularly to some works of John Owen, in which he learned that a man of eminence, some hundred years before, and who was admitted to be, in the main, a sound divine by persons of judgment, and who agreed with a multitude of other writers, had laid down as the general experience of believers, or as the ordinary effect of the communication of the Spirit of God, that very operation in his soul of which he was personally conscious. This second argument was comforting and corroborating. But, doubtless, even had it been wanting, the first would have proved sufficient, under the gracious direction of the Spirit. Still it was profitable and comfortable for a new-born soul to read such words as these on Rom. viii. 16 ("The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God")—viz.: "The witness which our own spirits do give unto our adoption, is the work and effect of the Holy Spirit in us. If it were not, it would be false, and not confirmed by the testimony of the Spirit Himself, who is the Spirit of Truth. And none knoweth the things of God but the Spirit of God (1 Cor. ii. 11). If He declare not our sonship in us and to us, we cannot know it. How then doth He bear witness with our spirits? What is His distinct testimony in this matter? It must be some such act of His as evidenceth itself to be from Him immediately unto them that are concerned in it, that is—those unto whom it is given." And in another place: "God's sealing of believers with the Holy Spirit, is His gracious communication of the Holy Spirit unto them, so to actuate His Divine power in them, as to enable them unto all the duties of their holy calling, evidencing them to be accepted with Him, both unto themselves and others. The effects of this sealing are gracious operations of the Holy Spirit in and upon believers; but the sealing itself is the communication of the Spirit unto them. They are sealed with the Spirit."

In a certain sense, therefore, and in certain various degrees, there may be "a self-evidencing light which puts an end to controversy;" and yet this may be for all practical purposes distinguished from "enthusiasm," in the injurious meaning of that word. The inward teachings of the Holy Spirit must be true; but our perception of those teachings is liable to error, and the written Word and the experience of others (all subjected to the ultimate tribunal, however, of our private judgment) are given as our helps to form that judgment. We dare not doubt the promise of God, that He will give His Holy Spirit to them that faithfully ask Him. Why, then, should we doubt but that this Blessed Person will really lead the humble, patient, and watchful believer into all truth, according to the promises? Dr. Dörner, as we understand him, does not disparage, in proper place and degree, that conviction of the understanding which may be arrived at by a rational consideration of historical and critical arguments; but he justly holds that such a conviction is in any case weak and superficial in comparison with that powerful demonstration of the Holy Ghost in the personal consciousness of the believer. Dr. Fitzgerald admits that the inward operation of the Holy Ghost is to be believed in as "a matter of revelation;" but we are at a loss to perceive what he thinks of that operation as a matter of fact. He thinks that people will soon be asking why they are to believe, as a matter of fact, that Jesus Christ was raised from the dead; and he appears to suggest that the only answer to this question is to say that we can prove, by the proper evidence of matters of fact, that He really was raised. Doubtless, the proof of Christ's resurrection is as capable of being made out in this way as the proof of any other historical fact of a similar date. Nay, we may freely admit that no other historical event of that, or of any other date, is so fully confirmed by such evidence as is the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ. Yet, after all, this is not demonstration. It is but high probability. A high probability, indeed, which, as it governs us in all other matters, ought to govern us in this matter too. Still, cannot Dr. Fitzgerald imagine that an acute and candid intellect in such a matter as the eternal salvation of his soul, and of his duty to God and to himself, might well demand certainly, instead of the very highest degree of probability? According to our notion, this is just what the Holy Ghost gives us. Men must believe, as a matter of fact, in the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, either because the Bishop of Cork, or somebody else tells them, that he has, in his portfolio, a splendid demonstration of the high probability of that fact; or because, after a laborious search into great libraries, and a critical balancing of conflicting testimonies, they have arrived at the conclusion that the matter is so highly probable as to amount almost to demonstration, and that, therefore, it is highly reasonable they should submit to the evidence and believe!!

The way of God seems to us to be the better way. There is such a thing as the "power of Christ's resurrection," which irrefragably demonstrates the truth of the fact to thousands in all ages, who have neither leisure nor ability to inquire into, or to decide upon, the just weight of historical evidences and critical arguments. If Jesus rose not from the dead, the New Testament is a fable. But that it is not a fable, and that the resurrection of Jesus Christ is the very truth of God, is continually proved by its power in every age to raise dead souls to spiritual life. If disbelief in the resurrection of Jesus Christ—or in the Gospel, which amounts to the same thing—grow to a general or common affair at any time, we rather suppose it will be mainly because the living monuments of the "power of His resurrection," are not conspicuous for faith and holiness. But in the presence of a pure Gospel, preached with effect, and of a body of real believers, leading lives of usefulness, piety, and brotherly love, such a question seems almost impossible, and altogether without excuse.

The English mind, as Dr. Fitzgerald says, is direct and practical. If, then, something causes men to be humble, and holy, and useful, and loving, and gentle, and happy, who before were the reverse of all these, and if the account they give of the change is that the Holy Spirit did it for them—is this not practical? He gave that "demonstration" which no criticism could or can bestow. He gave that personal assurance of an interest in the promises which became a motive power of a supernatural energy on the path of holy activity. Let God who did it have the glory. And let those who profess to be taught of God, and not of man, demonstrate to those without, that whether it be called enthusiasm or not, they walk as the children of God ought to walk, while they know that they are of God by His Spirit, which they have received, and KNOW ALSO THAT THEY HAVE PASSED FROM DEATH TO LIFE, BECAUSE THEY LOVE THE BRETHREN.

THE WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER.

The first half of the present century was characterised in the Church of God by Activity; it will be well if the second half shall be equally distinguished by Prayer.

In 1792, the first of our modern missionary institutions was formed; in 1804 the British and Foreign Bible Society took its beginning. From the period thus signalised until the present time, the impulse given to Christian zeal has never subsided. On the contrary, there now scarcely remains any portion of Christendom which has not been quickened into religious activity. If, during this epoch, we have had fewer theologians, we have had more missionaries; the names of Warburton, and Gill, and Doddridge, have been replaced by those of Carey, and Martyn, and Williams. The Word of God has been translated into barbarous languages, as well as into Sanskrit and Chinese, and almost all countries, the savage and the civilised alike, have been visited—would that we could say pervaded—by the tidings of redemption. Nor amidst these efforts abroad have the claims of our home population been neglected. Sunday-schools have become so general as to take the character of a national institution. The sacred Scriptures have been circulated by millions of copies, religious tracts more profusely still. The Established Church and the Nonconformists have emulated each other in providing edifices for Divine worship, as well as in various other modes of employing Christian agency; city and town missions, village itinerancies, cottage lectures, ragged-schools, reformatories, and an incalculable number of local religious and philanthropic influences, literally permeate the country. And Britain is not alone in thus directing her attention to the spiritual wants of her own children. To say nothing of the numerous similar institutions in America, the Bible-reader and colporteur traverse Sweden, while the "Gustavus-Adolphus Society" and the "Inner Mission," besides more limited and local attempts, are carrying on their Christian designs through a large proportion of the Protestant States of Germany, and following with their blessings German Protestants dwelling in foreign, and especially in Roman Catholic lands. Activity—perpetually augmenting and expanding religious activity—has for more than fifty years past marked our era.

May it be inferred from indications of another kind, and sufficiently striking to challenge more than a superficial observation, that the spiritual life of the Church is passing into a new phase? Is this period of activity about to be succeeded by a period of Prayer? Or to put the inquiry into another and preferable form, are Christians waking up to the conviction that, while they should not be less active, they should pray more?

Let us, however, while we prosecute this inquiry, be careful that we do no injustice to the memories of the men who set these activities agoing. They were men of prayer; men mighty in prayer. Their journals and biographies reveal whence they derived that giant energy which roused the slumbering Church to a sense of her duty. If activity has to any extent superseded prayer, or if with the multiplication of agencies there has taken place a transference to them of that dependence which should be placed on Divine power alone, this is of later growth. In fact, they called their fellow-Christians to prayer before they sounded the trumpet notes which sent them to do battle, whether with the idols of heathendom, or with the practical ungodliness of Christendom. The monthly missionary prayer-meeting preceded the formation of the oldest of our missionary societies, and that was itself preceded by an agreement to observe special seasons of private prayer among a number of Christian ministers. Thus under date of April 11, 1784, we find the following entry in the diary of one of the originators of modern missions: "Devoted this day to fasting and prayer, in conjunction with several other ministers who have agreed thus to spend the second Tuesday in every month to seek the revival of real religion, and the extension of Christ's kingdom in the world." And again, three months after, July 13: "Spent this day in fasting and prayer, in conjunction with several of my brethren in the ministry, for the revival of our Churches and the spread of the Gospel. Found some tenderness and earnestness in prayer, several times in the day. Wrote a few thoughts on the desirableness of the coming of Christ's kingdom." Prayer—fervent, frequent, united prayer—preceded the activity and awakened it.

A possible thing it is that we who have succeeded to the inheritance of holy toil, which our godly ancestors bequeathed us, may have lost, if not altogether, yet to a considerable degree, their "tenderness" in devotion, their "earnestness" and frequency in prayer. We may have become so absorbed in the manifold calls of Christian duty as to be less mindful, if it may not be said of the higher, yet at least of the equal claims of the closet. Besides which, encompassed as we are by the multiform varieties of Christian agency, familiarised with the facts that so many Bibles are distributed, so many zealous men employed, so many sermons preached, so many churches built, who does not perceive how liable we may be to rest in all this, as if methods so scriptural could not fail of success? We forget that the human administration of even a divinely-appointed system of means must of itself be impotent of good. We are apt to reason as if it were a thing no way fitted to occasion surprise, that the Church should suffer a paralysis, and the world riot in its unrebuked profanity, while there was no voice crying in the desert, "Make straight the way of the Lord," and no faithful, energetic ministry calling aloud, "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion!" and so far, perhaps, we reason well. But the argument fails us, and turns altogether into a fallacy, when we go on to infer that, now these deficiencies are supplied, and supplied so amply, we have attained all that is needed to secure the designed result. For let us ask, within what period of time that result is likely, upon any sober estimate of probabilities, to be attained? Only let the eye rest upon a missionary map of the world, and observe the huge spaces coloured red, and green, and black, to denote respectively the domains of Popery, Islamism, and Heathendom, with here and there a little fringe or tiny speck of yellow, indicating the existence of the Protestant form of Christianity, and we think the most sanguine mind will recoil from the view with a feeling of almost utter despondency. The unquestioning belief of Christians, we presume, leads them to anticipate a time when these vast regions shall be evangelised; and we do not mean to insinuate a doubt that their faith rests on a satisfactory foundation. But let them tell us, taking for the basis of their calculations the progress which the Gospel has made since the commencement of the present century, when that time will arrive. Must there not intervene, not merely many centuries, but many thousands of years? In truth, not sceptically, as the words were first used, but in a just appreciation of the inadequacy of present agencies, may it not be said, "If the Lord would make windows in heaven might this thing be?"

Not to depreciate the value of these agencies, as far as they are wisely chosen and applied, are these remarks made, but to suggest that there is yet another means to be added to them, of far greater potency than all of them together. And if there is one circumstance which, more than any other, is, at the present moment, ominous of good for the future, it is the return of the Church to its increased employment. Let us entertain the hope that the Special Prayer-Meetings about to be convened—not, as we understand, in our country alone, but wherever there exists a company of Christians who can meet for prayer—will not prove to be a mere spasmodic fit of spiritual enthusiasm. We do not think they will. We rather regard them as the utterance of the conviction, lying in the depths of Christian consciousness, and now newly awakened, of the utter impotence of man in view of the evangelisation of his fellow-men. To a revived feeling of the absolute worthlessness of all the means they can employ in the accomplishment of this great design, apart from the co-operating agency of the Holy Spirit, we are persuaded, should be traced this supplicating posture in which the servants of God desire now to be found. And if our apprehension be well-founded, then we may entertain the belief that these meetings will generate other similar meetings, and that the importunity of prayer, fomented and fed by the use of prayer, will wax more and more intense, until the words of the prophet are literally fulfilled, and "they that make mention of the Lord shall not keep silence, nor give Him rest, till He make Jerusalem a praise in the earth."

Whether the subjugation of the world to the dominion of the Redeemer is to be brought about by the multiplied and extended use of the means at present employed, accompanied by a mightier spiritual energy than hitherto, or whether we are warranted to look for a revival of the miraculous powers of the primitive Church, a view of the subject sustained by the respectable name of Archbishop Tillotson, and not discountenanced by Bishop Heber,* in either case we recognise the necessity of prayer. Nor less upon a third hypothesis suggested by a profounder thinker than either. "It strikes me as not improbable," says the author referred to, "that the grand moral improvements of a future age may be accomplished in a manner that shall leave nothing to man but humility and grateful adoration. His pride so obstinately ascribes to himself whatever good is effected on the globe, that perhaps the Deity will evince

His own interposition, by events as evidently independent of human power as the rising of the sun. Perhaps some of them may take place in a manner but little connected even with human operation. Or if the activity of men shall be employed as the means of producing all of them, there will probably be as palpable a disproportion between the instruments and the events as there was between the rod of Moses and the stupendous phenomena which followed its being stretched forth. No Israelite was foolish enough to ascribe to the rod the power that divided the sea; nor will any witness of the moral wonders to come attribute them to man."* Upon all the suppositions of which the case admits, the proper attitude of the Church is that which places her on her knees. Let her clothe herself with humility, and enter into the audience chamber of the King; let her betake herself to prayer. No sentiment becomes her like a deep sense of her own utter insignificance, weakness, and unworthiness. In the survey of all her necessities and duties, let her rest on the sufficiency and promised grace of her risen, Lord renouncing self in all its forms, the most specious and subtle, as well as the most patent, and waiting until He shall "arise to shake terribly the earth;" for let her assuredly know that, whenever that event takes place, "the lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the LORD alone shall be exalted in that day."†

Foreign Intelligence.

A few lines introductory to our Foreign Intelligence will, perhaps, serve to guide our readers to the more salient points of interest.

Our French correspondent, in his usual quiet and piquant manner, makes some just remarks on the opposition manifested by the Sacerdotal party to the liberal measures inaugurated on the accession of Count de Persigny to the Ministry of the Interior; and seems to hope that they will prove favourable to the Protestant interest, while they will be appreciated by all the intelligent and educated portion of the people.

Austria, and Hungary as a part of the empire, still exhibit problems which her statesmen are either unable or unwilling to solve. Two of our correspondents write on these topics.

We have no positive assurance to give that British remonstrance will be successful against Spanish intolerance; but a touching letter will be found from Matamoros, dated from his prison, and breathing a spirit of patience, fortitude, and faith, worthy of a sufferer for the sake of Christ.

Sweden supplies us this month with a simple, but interesting picture of the humble labours of a colporteur. They who like to read of individual cases of unpretending, but precious Christian toil, will find their taste gratified.

Our African information is larger than usual, and, as will be seen, comes from three sides of the continent.

But we must especially direct attention to the intelligence from Jamaica. Here the interest of the present month culminates and centres. The statements are startling, but we know them to be trustworthy, and they are calculated to awaken both inquiry and prayer.

* Foster's Essay on the Application of the Epithet Romantic.

† We have received a letter from "A Church Missionary" at Agra, requesting us to insert in our pages a Circular Letter, which he has addressed to all his fellow-Christians, calling upon them, under the weight of their solemn responsibilities, "to pray more." It is truly gratifying, and it must be, at the same time, a great mutual encouragement, to those who believe in the efficacy of prayer, to find how Christian minds in remote parts of the world are exercised on this subject. There is the less necessity that we should transcribe the whole of the circular, because of the foregoing article and the fact of the intended special meetings, but we subjoin the concluding sentences: "But especially you ought to pray more; and to this end we urge you to devote some time, at least once a week (say noon, each Friday), to earnest prayer to God for the mercies so urgently needed in the present circumstances.

1. That God, by the Holy Spirit, would quicken His people to more unity, sympathy, and prayer.
2. That He would cause the development of coming events to end in the extension of His kingdom.
3. That He would pour out His Spirit, according to His promise, on all flesh. . . ."

FRANCE.

France, December, 1860.

THE NEW POLITICAL MEASURES OF NAPOLEON III.
CONSIDERED IN A RELIGIOUS POINT OF VIEW.

Since I addressed to you my last letter, important changes have been effected in the political constitution of France. An imperial decree, of November 24, has restored to the Senate and the Legislative Body the right to interfere more directly in the general affairs of the country. The deliberations of the two Chambers will obtain greater publicity. This is, in some sort, the revival of Parliamentary life. By other and more recent proceedings, Count de Persigny, the new Minister of the Interior, has encouraged the periodical press to express its opinions with freedom and independence. This, it is true, does not amount to re-establishing constitutional liberty; but still these reforms of Napoleon III. indicate his firm intention to pursue henceforth a more liberal course.

What is the tendency of the new measures in a religious point of view? This is the only point to be examined in our correspondence. It deserves especial notice, that the Ultramontane journals have expressed no joy or satisfaction in consequence of the decree of November 24. They have preserved a chilling silence. This fact is the more characteristic, as other organs of the daily press have given utterance most energetically to their feelings of gratification and hope. Whence the dissatisfaction of the clerical party, under these important circumstances? The reason is quite clear: the ministers and agents of Rome systematically disapprove of everything tending to the diffusion of common rights. They extol, they claim, in a certain sense, liberty; but they mean only their own liberty, liberty for what is true and good, as they call it; adding, that these qualities are to be found exclusively among Roman Catholics. To translate this fine theory into the language of simple good sense, the advocates of Popery falsely give the name of liberty to absolute preponderance, or to a monopoly of doctrines and authority by themselves. Immediately other Churches and other opinions obtain analogous rights, they pretend that we are in a state of anarchy. They declare themselves oppressed when they are no longer oppressors; persecuted, when they can no longer persecute their opponents; and they deem themselves free only on condition of their being able to put an end to the freedom of those who differ from them.

Such is the secret of the bad temper of the sacerdotal party, on reading the decree of November 24. The Jesuits warmly applauded the harshest measures which followed the establishment of the military dictatorship; despotism appeared to them quite legitimate and necessary, so long as it shut the mouths of religious and political dissenters, and left an unrestricted course of action to the Romish priesthood. Now, their applause has ceased, because they see that their antagonists can combat them with less unequal weapons.

I may add, that Napoleon III. has shown much wisdom and foresight in these reforms; for, on the one hand, he will attach to his dynasty the liberal-minded classes, who retain considerable influence in this country; and on the other, he will secure a means of counteracting the agitation excited by the Popish clergy. This agitation, as I have said in former letters, is not very dangerous. The masses remain indifferent to the incendiary appeals and clamour of the bishops. Nevertheless, as these reverend personages possess almost solely the enormous privilege of speaking with plainness and vehemence, they are able to produce a false impression as to their real strength. Those who cry loudly amid universal silence, are more formidable in appearance than they are in reality. This factitious power must come to an end.

Be assured that Louis Napoleon, in his quarrel with the clergy, will be supported by the public opinion of the nation. The priests are strangely deceiving themselves, if they believe that they will be followed by the French people in their crusade against the ideas and the legislation of modern times. They are respected in the exercise of their spiritual duties; and if their personal character is honourable, they may hope to be seconded in their religious enterprises; but that is all. Immediately they endeavour to tread upon civil and political ground, they encounter keen resistance. The French have learned by long and painful experience, that the influence of priests in affairs of the State has always been fatal to the liberty and prosperity of the nation. An invincible instinct leads them to repel these clerical encroachments. Let the priest remain in the sanctuary, and there fulfil his ecclesiastical office, leaving politicians to look after temporal things: such is the general sentiment, even among the humblest peasants, and the priests will be very certain to be made to remember it.

CARDINAL DE BONALD'S LETTER TO THE MINISTER OF WORSHIP.

The struggle between the Government and the clergy continues; it even assumes, daily, a more violent character. To bitter words have succeeded threats, and if the Jesuitical faction had the power, they would immediately raise the standard of revolt. We have a new proof of these hostile passions in the recent letter of Cardinal de Bonald, Archbishop of Lyons.

The quarrel is this: The former Minister of the Interior, M. Billault, addressed to the prefects of departments a circular, in which he said that the pastoral letters or mandements of the bishops must be subjected to the common law, inasmuch as they treated of political rather than religious matters. This common law, invoked by the Minister, provides that all political pamphlets shall pay a stamp duty, and that two copies shall be deposited, before publication, in the hands of the prefect and the Imperial procurer. I am not discussing the question whether this law is good or bad; I only point to the fact that it is the law; dura lex, sed lex. It should be added, that the bishops approved of these harsh provisions with all their hearts, while they were only applied to the Protestants and the Liberals. The circular of M. Billault extended the application of the law to the pamphlets of the episcopal body, and this has excited a strong feeling of irritation among the clergy, as we see by Cardinal de Bonald's letter.

The argument of this prince of the Church is a singular one. He first affirms that the bishops, in speaking of recent events in Italy, do not trespass upon the domain of politics. "Do not forget," he says, "that we support the temporal rights of the Vicar of Jesus Christ only because they protect his spiritual rights. And whatever may be the warmth of language with which these questions are treated in our pastoral letters, they are always there discussed in a religious point of view, and without entering the sphere of worldly politics." M. de Bonald here commits a gross sophism, and falsifies the facts; for under the pretext of defending the spiritual independence of the Pope, the bishops have developed all political theses imaginable. Not only have they demanded that the Roman Pontiff's territorial possessions should be respected, but they have poured the most infamous abuse upon King Victor Emmanuel, his councillors, and his troops; they have reviled all the advocates of the national unity and independence of Italy, calling them scoundrels, thieves, emissaries of Satan, &c. They have pleaded in glowing language the cause of King Francis II. and the Grand Duke of Tuscany; they have glorified General Lamoricière and his bands of volunteers; they have even uttered treasonable insinuations with reference to the Emperor's acts in the Peninsula. What is all this? Is it not politics? It pleases the Archbishop of Lyons to say that it is simply religion; but things are not changed by a change of words.

M. de Bonald says further on, that the bishops ought not to be subjected to humiliating formalities. Humiliating! Why, priests of Rome, have you applauded these humiliations when they were inflicted on other citizens? Are you not citizens, like ourselves? It is really an intolerable and scandalous infatuation in the Popish bishops to be constantly claiming exclusive and distinguished privileges. They were pleased enough to humiliate journalists, political writers, and every other class in the nation; but when they find themselves on a common level with the rest of mankind, then, for the first time, they passionately declaim against this humiliation! "We have received by Divine right," says the cardinal, "the power of instructing the people, and it is to God only that we must render an account of our words." Very good; these spiritual gentlemen decline all responsibility before civil society; they would publish their political lucubrations without control, and if any one asks them by what right they insult whatever is most worthy of respect in the State, they will reply, "It is a Divine right; we are responsible to God only!" It remains to be seen whether the French Government and nation are disposed to grant to the priests irresponsibility and omnipotence like this.

Cardinal de Bonald concludes his letter with some threatening expressions. "Before stirring these exciting questions," he writes, "the civil power ought to investigate, within the limits of its rights, the question what it can, and what it cannot do, lest it should raise a storm that might not easily be calmed. . . . The [Romish] Church is never attacked with impunity." This is bold; M. de Bonald informs the Emperor that he must be careful in touching the privileges of the bishops, or that he may have cause to repent it. But this simp!

mindful prelate, who writes his letters under the dictation of the Jesuits, is strangely deceived as to the extent of his authority. He forgets that we are no longer living in an age when the Pope and his cardinals were able to trample beneath their feet the crowns of princes. M. de Bonald will act wisely by confining himself to the use of arrogant language. If he attempts to pass from words to acts, he will learn, to his cost, that lay society refuses to be enslaved by a tyrannical priesthood.

PUBLICATION OF A PAMPHLET ON THE POPE AND THE EMPEROR.

These excesses of the Romish episcopate unhappily lead other writers to throw themselves into an opposite extreme. M. Cayla, a man hitherto but little known in the literary world, has published a pamphlet entitled The Pope and the Emperor. This pamphlet has excited great attention, and reveals a sign of the times in our country: it is for this reason that I shall proceed to say a few words respecting it.

The author's scheme is not a new one; it has received, in our ancient controversies, the names of Cesaropapacy, or Erastianism. M. Cayla would have Napoleon III. to be at once Pope and Emperor, Supreme Head of Church and State. In justification of his plan, he quotes the example of Henry VIII., that of certain of the Protestant princes of Germany, that of the Czar of Russia, and so forth. He asks that the bonds between France and Rome should be severed, and that there should be at Paris a Grand Patriarch, assisted by a dozen cardinals or French primates, who should govern the ecclesiastical society under the superintendence of the temporal sovereign. In this manner, he thinks, peace would be completely re-established in the State, as well as in the Church, and the recurrence of actual conflicts between the two powers would be for ever prevented.

It is superfluous to show the fallacy of this monstrous scheme. M. Cayla is probably a stranger to the most elementary truths of the Gospel. He knows not that Jesus Christ instituted a City of God on earth—a spiritual kingdom, which, as to its doctrine and discipline, must be independent of all human authority. He is not aware that the distinct action of the two powers is the best safeguard of individual and social liberty. But this pamphlet is, I repeat, a sort of revelation of the state of the public mind in France. Many people are weary of the permanent antagonism which exists between the new institutions and the principles of the Popish clergy; they are desirous of re-establishing harmony between them at any price. Some influential journals have expressed their approval of M. Cayla's theory, and have even attributed the views of this pamphlet to so exalted a source as the inspiration of Napoleon III. Nothing can be more inaccurate. The Emperor has too much wisdom and good sense to adopt such extravagant Utopias. But the Papacy must be upon its guard. The word schism has been pronounced by the Siecle and by other political papers. If the Romish clergy fill up the measure of their iniquities, they must suffer the penalty for it. France will abandon the Pope, rather than the principles of 1789.

THE DIOCESE OF VERSAILLES PLACED UNDER THE SPECIAL PROTECTION OF THE VIRGIN.

While these grave questions are being agitated, certain prelates are amusing themselves by getting up ridiculous festivals for the purpose of removing the relics of some very apocryphal saints, and seducing the imagination of their devotees by narrations of false miracles. The Bishop of Versailles being, it would seem, at leisure, and desirous of getting rid of his ennui, has indulged in the puerile recreation of publishing a pastoral letter, with a view to place his diocese under the special protection of Mary, Queen of Heaven, the Virgin of Virgins. "We wish," he says, "that this consecration should be renewed every year, on the same day, in order that it may be a monument of our devotion to the august Mother of God, and a sign of the boundless confidence we have in her."

The simple and ingenuous bishop hopes that the protection of the Virgin Mary will be of infallible and sovereign efficacy in curing the maladies of the Romish Church. "The occurrences which are taking place," he writes, "the trials which we are passing through, the dangers which threaten the faith, make it a duty to have recourse to Her who has never been supplicated in vain, when the vessel of the Church has been beaten by the storm." Then he attacks, with gross invective, the Reformation and philosophy: "Since the appearance of Protestantism, philosophers, poets, historians, legislators, have formed a vast conspiracy; they have joined hand in hand to drive God from the world. . . . When triumphant impiety has sown the doctrines of hell, and when souls, seduced or blinded, yield to the devastating torrent, the only efficacious means of conquering the evil is to restore to the religious principle its authority and power over the minds of men."

And it is for this that the Bishop of Versailles has solemnly consecrated his diocese to the Virgin! He says that God has been banished from the world; and he himself substitutes for the worship of God that of Mary! He relies on the all-powerful intercession of the Mother of God, and does not reflect that the calamities of the Papacy have been increased twofold since Pius IX. proclaimed the new dogma of the Immaculate Conception! The anniversary of that proclamation was celebrated at Rome, and throughout the Popish Church, on the 8th of December last. I cannot tell what are the secret thoughts of Pius IX., but if his misfortunes have not deprived him of the power of sober thought, he must have had some sad reflections upon the vanity of his former hopes. When he promulgated, with so much pomp, a few years ago, the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin, he declared, in express terms, that Mary would restore to the Church of Rome her former glory and greatness. Alas! alas! this prophecy has been entirely falsified by events, and never has the Papacy been more humbled than of late. Accordingly, an Italian monk recently reproached the Virgin Mary with having shown ingratitude to the Holy Father! It would have been more decent and more accurate to say, that the Roman See had been chastised for having perpetrated an act of folly and profanity.

JUDICIAL DECISION FAVOURABLE TO FREEDOM OF EDUCATION.

Your readers perhaps recollect that I have more than once spoken of the proceedings taken against a schoolmaster named Jusnel. The facts were these: Some Protestant schools were opened in the department of the Hauts-Rhins. Everything went on quietly, and the public peace was strictly maintained. But the schools—having been denounced by the priests, who were exasperated by the Reformed faith being propagated—were suddenly closed by a decision of the Academical Council of Limoges.

M. Jusnel, moved and sustained by truly Christian zeal, then undertook to go from house to house, from family to family, in order separately to instruct the children with whose education he had been entrusted. There was no school; for a school can only exist when a given number of children meet in a building previously fixed upon. It was private and domestic education. However, the priests and fanatical magistrates still attacked M. Jusnel; and accused him of violating the law, which requires a previous authorisation for the opening of a school. This affair was pleaded before two judicial courts in succession, and M. Jusnel was sentenced to pay a fine. But he has appealed to the Supreme Court of Paris, and there succeeded in obtaining a decision from more impartial judges.

The high legal functionaries of the Court of Cassation are aware that the sacred rights of parental authority would be violated, if a schoolmaster could not teach a few children under the protection of the domestic roof. They also understand that private teaching cannot be assimilated to the official duties performed in a public school. They at the same time admit, that it would be an act of religious intolerance to prevent a few poor peasants from enabling their children to acquire elementary knowledge and the rudimentary principles of religion. The sentence pronounced upon M. Jusnel was therefore reversed, and the case was sent back to the Imperial Court of Bordeaux. Here, again, the judges proved to be favourable to the accused, and M. Jusnel was permitted to return to his humble labours. This is a triumph for freedom of education. God grant that other restrictions may soon be removed, and that the existence of schools may no longer be dependent upon the arbitrary will of Academical Councils!

INSTALLATION OF PROFESSOR BOIS IN THE PROTESTANT THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE OF MONTAUBAN.

M. Bois, the new Professor of Hebrew and the Interpretation of the Old Testament, has delivered his inaugural address in the Theological College of Montauban. This address has fully answered the expectations of the Consistories who gave him their suffrages for the vacant chair, and the friends of sound doctrine among the French Protestants have reason to bless the Lord for this appointment.

The learned and pious professor investigated the question of the supernatural element, both in the government of the world by Providence and in Christianity. To understand the importance of a matter like this, at the present moment, it must be borne in mind that several partisans of the new theology have proceeded so far in their negative course, that they question the truth of everything that relates to a supernatural order of things. They reject miracles, prophecies, the Divine inspiration of the Scriptures, and even the facts which relate to the incarnation of Christ, and his resurrection and ascension. But, notwithstanding this, they still claim to be called Christians!

M. Bois showed that the notion of a personal and living God suffices to prove the possibility of supernatural facts; and it being admitted that these facts are possible, it is easy to show that those of the Gospel are real. To refuse to God the power of interfering in the order of nature and modifying its laws, is to imagine an impersonal God—an enslaved God—a lifeless

God; and then there remains only Pantheism, against which conscience and our moral nature utter their protest in the name of duty. I have given a very inadequate analysis of this excellent address. The subject discussed by M. Bois enters into the deepest questions of divinity and metaphysics. Let us hope that the new school, which would substitute an empty and barren philosophy for the revelation contained in Holy Scripture, will meet with numerous and strenuous opponents. The cause is the sacred one of God and eternal salvation. . X. X. X.

PROTESTANTISM AT ST. ETIENNE AND ITS NEIGHBOURHOOD.

About thirty-seven years ago a faithful servant of God passed through the town of St. Etienne (Loire), which at that time was of little importance. After a conversation with a pious old woman, he sent her a few Bibles, which were soon distributed among the neighbours. He was not aware of what would come out of this handful of seed. A place of worship was opened some time after, with an Evangelical discipline and mission, among the Romanists. But we forbear from entering into details, and come at once to a plain statement of the present work of the Evangelical Church at St. Etienne.

We opened last year a large new chapel, the congregation of which amounts to about 400 persons, 150 of whom are regular members. Our day-schools reckon some ninety children. A meeting designed especially for the conversion of Romanists is also held in another part of the town, and is attended by 80 to 100 Roman Catholics, and presided over alternately by the pastor of our Church and that of the Reformed National one.

St. Etienne, with its present population of more than 100,000 souls, is thus evangelised (as to the Romanists) by our little band. But the brethren of the Church are also at work in the environs and the department, where we have five places of worship, three schools, two colporteurs, one evangelist.

Marsilly, Charlieu, Roanne, St. Chamond, and Le Fay, are the localities where the Gospel is preached. In Roanne, a town of 20,000 inhabitants, the brethren are about twenty-five in number, well united and active. Had this place a special labourer, it would be, with God's blessing, very prosperous, and become at the same time a centre of evangelisation for the other places and the north of the department.

St. Chamond is a manufacturing town of 15,000 inhabitants, situated at seven or eight miles out of St. Etienne. A Roman Catholic workman, who had heard of the Gospel in one of the mines of St. Etienne, through a member of our Church, on his return to St. Chamond called together in his house three or four persons, to whom he spoke of Christ. About a year after this interview, some forty or fifty persons could be seen reading and hearing the Word of God in a small meeting-room, some of whom had already shown real signs of conversion. But the priests—one of whom had said to a colporteur in the street, "As for you Protestants, you shall never come here"—were much moved in seeing this little beginning, and contrived to get seven families sent away from their work, leaving them to seek their bread where they could. They were obliged to retire from St. Chamond. The meetings were thus reduced to twenty persons. But this little flock was not discouraged; they continued to assemble, with the aid of their brethren of St. Etienne, who met every Sunday with them to expound the Word of God.

One object occupied their mind—viz., the education of their children. One of the parents was summoned to send back his child to the school of the Frères, if he would not be deprived of his daily work. "If you refuse me my bread!" answered the father to his master, "I will find it elsewhere; the Lord has promised it!" Poor as the friends of St. Chamond are, they subscribe some 20*l.* per annum for the school opened last May in their locality. Some time after this the inauguration of the statue of the Virgin at Valfleury, by the Pope's Legate, in presence of 15,000 spectators, contributed to excite the passions of many against this little Protestant flock, the very name of Protestant being considered as an insult. Two persons were dismissed from the manufactory where they worked, and the influence which we might have gained upon Roman Catholic children was neutralised by the spirit of intimidation thrown into the minds of the parents. Our position is, therefore, very difficult in this place. Our school is but little frequented, and our resources are almost null. Nevertheless, we must not be discouraged, especially as the Lord has blessed us lately by the conversion of an intelligent man, for whom his wife had prayed during several years. He is now showing as much zeal for the Lord's work as he formerly did for the interests of this life.

Financial Situation: Deficit (resulting from the construction of the chapel), 2,041*l.*; annual expenditure for pastor, evangelist, school-masters, and evangelisation in general, and debt paid off in ten years, from 600*l.* to 700*l.*; annual sums subscribed by the Church and congregation (nearly all poor working men), 120*l.*

The Lord be our help through our brethren!

GERMANY.

THE RELIGIOUS QUESTION IN AUSTRIA, IN HUNGARY, IN ELECTORAL HESSE—PARTICIPATION OF GERMANY IN THE RELIEF AFFORDED TO THE CHRISTIANS OF STRIA.

Frankfort, December, 1860.

At the moment at which I write, all your readers have doubtless been apprised, by the telegraph and the public papers, of those highly-important events which have just been accomplished at Vienna. Every one will at once perceive their political bearing; but it is not of this that I must now speak. The facts referred to are not less grave in their religious aspect; and that aspect is our theme.

Follow for an instant the march of affairs in this vast Empire of Austria, and judge! In 1865, the young Emperor, yielding to fanatical influences and to the counsels of ambitious ministers, handed over, by the Concordat concluded with the Court of Rome, all the immense interests of the Catholic Church, all its prodigious power, all its property—to whom? To the Jesuits, and independently of State control. He committed to them, moreover, all public instruction, from the university to the village school; no one could be a professor or schoolmaster without a diploma of Roman orthodoxy, nor teach anything but reading or mathematics. He handed over to their charge all the literature of the country; he entrusted to the bishops alone the censorship of books, whilst the Government were bound to enforce their prohibitions. He thus transferred to them all the power—religious, moral, and intellectual—of the Empire. All this he abdicated, reserving to himself scarcely anything but the administration of his exhausted finances, and the command over his army, which absorbed three-fourths of the revenues of the country. More than this, he gave up to them the Protestant Churches of all parts of the Empire; for the Concordat was their oppression. It is true that to these Churches were promised the blessings of a Protestant Concordat, conceded by the same ministers who had elaborated the other. Of these promises not one has been fulfilled, except the celebrated and too-long-deferred patent in favour of Hungary, which was at length extorted from authority by the force of circumstances, and refused by the Churches, who pronounced that it was "too late!" All the organs of Ultramontaniam sounded the trumpet in loud praise of the young Emperor, whom they proclaimed to be another David, or a Constantine—eulogies which announced the unmistakable triumph of Popery.

Five years only have elapsed, and now, after various concessions, granted when too late, and declared insufficient, we behold a new Ministry formed, under the presidency of M. de Schmerling, which publishes to the world the following programme:—

1. Equality of all religions in the State.
2. Revision of the Concordat (read suppression).
3. A Political Constitution for all the German and Slavonic populations of the Empire.

Why are the first two items in this programme of an entirely religious character? The reply is obvious. It is because the causes of an imminent revolution (which is sought to be averted) are religious; it is because it is the Concordat, far more than the battles of Magenta and Solferino, which has brought the Empire to the verge of ruin. "Be wise now, O kings! be instructed, ye judges of the earth!" But it will naturally be asked, Is this equality of all the Churches in the State—this revision of the Concordat—this Constitution itself—anything more than a string of empty promises, extorted by fear, like the confessions of certain sinners in extremis? This might certainly be apprehended, if the matter depended only on Rome and her adherents. But we have guarantees—guarantees which God has written with His powerful hand in events throughout the Empire of Austria—in Italy—in the whole of Europe. Your readers have perhaps not forgotten my last letter, in which I referred to the generally tottering condition of Ultramontanism on the Continent. These are the “signs of the times,” upon which we found our hopes of the emancipation of human consciences, and of the triumphs of that “everlasting Gospel,” whose mild, benignant light shall assuredly penetrate those lands where spiritual darkness and the slavery of despotism have so long reigned.

As to Hungary, in particular, it is long since we have referred to it. Why? Because its cause has not, for some time past, been of a character to claim discussion in a religious journal. When, last year, in the midst of the struggles of this country for its ecclesiastical liberty, I informed you that motives entirely political were at the bottom of the question, and held there the first place, several of our friends were much scandalised, and thought we were betraying the interests of our oppressed brethren. No, we would only ask for sincerity in language and in conduct. When we reproach a despotic power with making use of religion as an instrumentum regni, the populations which aspire to liberty, even of the most legitimate kind, must not make use of religion as a means of revolution. Now this is the case in Hungary, and every one knows it. This country is now no longer engaged in a struggle for its religious liberty, which was gained even before the programme of the Minister Schmerlin; it is contending for the right of self-taxation and self-conscription, or rather, for its own complete emancipation from the crown of Austria, with which it had freely made alliance, and by which it has been oppressed for centuries, and was at length crushed, in 1849, under the régime of General Haynau. If ever a political cause were just, it is that of Hungary; but it would have been better, for the honour of the Gospel, not to make Protestantism bear the responsibility of the revolution. “My kingdom is not of this world.” To be justified in reproving Catholicism for its forgetfulness of this great and holy principle, Protestant Christians must themselves remember it. This said, let us add that we bless God with joyous sympathy that the religious liberties of Hungary will henceforward be complete.

I well know that it is very difficult even for Churches independent of the State, as are those of Hungary, to separate entirely the interests from the political interests which they have to maintain against a Government which has always oppressed them, and which since 1849, has completely despoiled them of the rights and liberties so dearly acquired at the cost of the blood of their fathers, during many generations. What, then, must the difficulty be in our Germany, where there prevails such a lamentable confusion of the province of the State with that of the Church! Here there is no political agitation which does not react upon religion. We have, at this moment, a melancholy example of this in Electoral Hesse. This country, deprived of its Constitution by an arbitrary act of the Government, has maintained a lengthened struggle for its recovery, through the medium of its Chamber of Deputies. Last week that Chamber, elected according to a Constitution which it did not recognise as legitimate, was declared incompetent, and was then immediately dissolved. The irritation of the country is so much the more augmented. It hesitates between re-electing the same Chamber, and not electing any. Now, on whom does this irritation fall? Not only on the politicians who advise the Prince, but also on their religious principles—that is to say, upon the Gospel of Jesus Christ. It is known that the most influential of these men belong to that feudal and Puseyite party which has its principal representatives at Berlin; it is known also that a majority of the orthodox pastors share their opinions; and this must invariably deepen the abyss which Rationalism has created between the people and the Church. The people regard their pastors as agents of the civil power, as upholders of arbitrary rule, as enemies of their own liberties. Judge of the disastrous religious and moral effects of such a state of things! And the same phenomenon is reproduced in Prussia, with this difference, which renders it still more striking, that here the Government, in concert with the Second Chamber, desire to walk in the ways of liberalism in respect both of political and religious questions, whilst the party above described arrests its measures in the Chamber of Lords (Herrenhaus). The Parliament will shortly meet. The First Chamber, having been augmented by new members, created by the Government, the struggle is about to recommence. I shall have occasion to write to you respecting the debates on religious questions.

Your correspondent at Berlin has referred to the noble efforts of Germany in aid of the afflicted Christians of Syria. He has told you that two German ecclesiastics have been sent to Syria, the one, M. Disselhof, by Dr. Fliedner of Kaiserswerth, with some deaconesses; the other, M. Kramer, by the Committee of the Kirchentag. The object of their mission is to convey relief, material and spiritual, to the victims of the massacres. Their first letters home have been received, and have been published in the Neuen Evangelischen Kirchenzeitung of Berlin. Their descriptions of the calamities before their eyes exceeds all previous accounts and all imagination. Ruins of former habitations, intermixed with unburied corpses, whose infection contaminates the air, inspire overwhelming horror, whilst the sufferings of these who have escaped death rend the hearts of the beholders. There are actually, under the eyes of the two delegates, 20,000 persons to be provided with shelter, nourishment, and clothing. These two brethren are raising in Germany the energetic cry for further aid: "Help, help!" But they also note certain facts which (if well founded, as there is every reason to believe) merit denunciation before all Europe. These statements are that—whilst the English Committee has made abundant distributions to the sufferers, and the German Committee has done likewise to the extent of its means—the French Committee is reserving all its resources, amounting to several millions of francs, to build two immense establishments for orphans. In other words, that it is working for the future—for the future of Catholicism in Syria and the East—for a time when the wants, now so pressing, will no longer exist. And meanwhile, thousands of human beings are suffering from hunger, cold, and death itself! Already has the Independence Belge pointed out abuses of this kind. Let us hope that the men charged with distributing in Syria the generous gifts of France will not delay to render account of their stewardship; let us hope that a miserable spirit of sect will not so influence them as to quench in their hearts, in the midst of woes so terrible, the flame of the charity of their fellow-countrymen.

HUNGARY.

CONCESSIONS BY AUSTRIA—NEED OF THE GOSPEL—MISSIONARY LABOURS IN PESTH—ENGLISH WORSHIP—WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER.

The concessions lately made by the Emperor of Austria to the Hungarians have given back again to this nation their constitutional freedom, and the right of self-government, and so the way has been opened for a thorough reorganization and reform in this country. It gives me much pleasure to be able to state that, upon the whole, the people, as well as their leaders, are conducting themselves most nobly and worthily, and it is not to be doubted but that, if things continue to go on in the same legal and orderly manner, the present proceedings will lead to great and happy results. It is true that, in the meanwhile, the ecclesiastical and religious interests of the people seem to be almost entirely lost sight of, because the Protestant clergy, as well as the Roman Catholic priesthood, are taking a very lively part in the national movement; some of them even holding a very prominent position in the same. This is certainly much to be regretted; but still we may hope that, in the end, the cause of truth and religion will be advanced by this favourable turn of events, and that religious liberty, as well as every other desirable privilege, will be established and secured. And then we may surely expect that, when once the Word of God shall have free course in this country, it will, before long, also be glorified, even as it is with you. Let us pray God for it!

But certainly, in order that this end may be attained, it is needful that the proper kind of instrumentality should at the same time be set on foot, and in this respect we have still to look in a great measure to England for support; and, as the time appears now to have fully come for the opening of Hungary for the preaching of the Gospel, I would direct the attention of British Christians to this country, that they may consider whether some kind of organization might not be put into operation, and be brought to bear in some larger measure upon the spread of the truth in Hungary. That, indeed, is the one thing needful for making this nation truly great and good, for, however much we may respect and honour the fervent love which the Magyar bears for his native soil, and the many admirable qualities in his character, truth prompts me to say that true spiritual piety is not to be found among them, and, consequently, they lack that higher culture which vital godliness can alone impart, and the infinite importance of heavenly and eternal things is neither felt nor understood by them, and souls are left to live and die without a saving knowledge of the way of salvation. Yet we should not lay all the blame of this upon the Hungarians, for it is quite true that the peculiar disadvantages under which poor Hungary has suffered so long have, in a great measure, prevented the Gospel from being made known in all its fullness and power through the land, and excluded this nation from the powerful influences of the Christian movements of the time. And I do not for a moment hesitate to maintain that, if through the preaching of the Word of the Cross the power of godliness could be propagated among the Magyars, they would be likely to become one of the noblest and foremost nations of Europe.

As regards my own humble labours in this place, I am happy to say that the Lord continues greatly to bless and prosper the work I am engaged in. I have now around me a properly-formed congregation, consisting of a considerable number of truly serious people, and among them several converts from the house of Israel. It is impossible to say what good a body of people like these may be enabled to do by their influence in a city like this. What we are in great need of is a proper place of worship and a school. Our brethren here are most willing to do all they can in contributing towards this object, but still we shall need a good deal more aid to get up the building. I feel sure that if our friends in England could fully know our position, and the desirableness and importance of such a place in the city of Pesth, they would assuredly sympathise with us and lend us their liberal assistance towards completing this object.

I should also state that I am endeavouring to supply English services for the English, Scotch, and Irish residents here, and this is likewise a most necessary work. Therefore, without making any special appeal, I still feel it my duty to lay before British Christians this simple statement, which may suffice to draw the attention of some to it, and I shall merely add that, if any, whom God has blessed with means, should be disposed to render us some aid, it will be most thankfully received, and, by the help of God, used for His glory. The Rev. Dr. Steane will, I feel sure, be kind enough to receive and forward any such gifts.

Yesterday I received a number of copies of the appeal, issued by the Committee of the Alliance, proposing a week of special prayer by the Church of God throughout the whole world. I have already circulated some of them among those who understand the English language, and shall try to get them printed and circulated in the Hungarian, Slavonian, and German languages. May God give His blessing, and make this appeal effective, so that many, even in this country, may feel themselves willing to join in the prayers of the united Church of Christ around the globe. I am greatly delighted with the beautiful idea thus expressed, and shall make arrangements for having prayer-meetings in the way proposed, during those eight days, among my own congregation in Pesth.

In conclusion, allow me to express the request to all who read this, and who intend to take part in that great union of prayer at the commencement of next year, that in their petitions they would remember Hungary.

Yours truly in the Lord,

ADRIAN VAN ANDEL,

Pesth, Dec. 18, 1860.

AUSTRIAN SILESIA.

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH.

The boundary between Austria and Prussia runs through Silesia, so that part of it belongs to the one state, part to the other. Austrian Silesia is thus on the northern frontier of the empire, and borders on Bohemia, Moravia, and Galicia. The Gospel was first brought into it by the followers of Huss, who, after his death, fled to the principality of Teschen, in Silesia.

These prepared the people for a favourable reception of Luther's doctrines in the following century. As early as 1518 they were preached by an Augustinian monk of the name of Hofmann, whose example was followed by many others. The nobility and princes espoused the cause, as, for instance, George of Brandenburg, in Jagerndorf, and Duke Frederic II., of Lignitz, the latter of whom had been well known for his pious pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Even the bishops at first manifested very little opposition.

The work, therefore, steadily advanced. Duke Casimir IV. was at least not hostile to it, and his grandson, Wenzel Adam, gave in his full adhesion to the Augsburg Confession. The land soon possessed fifty churches in which the Gospel was preached. During the minority of Wenzel Adam's son, the Queen Regent also favoured Protestantism.

After the death of the Emperor Maximilian II. the contested succession to the Crown induced Rudolf II. to give favourable patents to the Protestants, which were confirmed by his successor. One of these was published August 28, 1609. On October 30 Duke Charles, Bishop of Breslau, declared that, as for this patent, it did not bind him or his.

The Northern Silesians, the Dukes of Lignitz, Brieg, Münsterberg, and Oels, made, with the Elector of Saxony, in 1621, the so-called "Dresden Agreement," by which their religious liberties were guaranteed them; but the Archbishop cared nothing for this "Agreement," and the Silesians had to experience the horrors of the Thirty Years' War, till at length the Peace of Westphalia brought them the confirmation of their religious liberty.

The principality of Teschen, however, that part of Silesia connected with the Empire of Austria, fared differently. The young Wenzel Adam, who had been brought up a Protestant, and had been an intolerant oppressor of the Roman Catholics in 1610, went over himself to the Roman Catholic Church, and sought to compel all his people to do the same. In the following year he expelled the pastors of Teschen, Skotschau, and Schwarzwahl, and put Roman Catholics in their place. They pleaded their Imperial Patent, and the Prince tore their petition in pieces, and severely threatened them. They remained steadfast in their faith, held their meetings outside the town, and appealed to the Silesian States, who gave them permission again to meet in their churches. On this the Archbishop lodged an information against them with the Emperor, the battle at the White Mountain brought on fresh complications; Elizabeth Lucretia, sister of the late Duke, oppressed the Protestants, the magistrate of Teschen became a Roman Catholic, and soon the Protestant teachers and preachers were banished the land, and in 1633 all their churches were closed. Many families left Teschen, and the country, occupied now by the Swedish troops, and now by the soldiers of the League, was most awfully devastated.

Even the Westphalian peace brought them no alleviation of their troubles; they were not included in the states which had won their freedom in the specified year, and all attempts to obtain it now were unavailing. For fifty years the public exercises of their religion were interdicted, their churches and schools were closed, and they were forced to conduct their meetings in secret. Still their faith did not fail; they met away from the towns in secluded valleys and woods, their Bibles and books of devotion were hidden in hollow trees and clefts of the rocks, and so they worshipped God. In this they were not much disturbed, as the Imperial Government took no notice of it.

But somewhat brighter days were to come. The war which raged at the commencement of the eighteenth century turned the attention of the Government so much to politics, that it became less zealous in oppressing the Protestants. Besides this, Charles XII. of Sweden interested himself on their behalf, and in the Convention of Altromstadt, in 1707, interposed a clause by which all that had been enacted against religious liberty since the Peace of Westphalia was revoked. This properly applied only to the northern part of Silesia, to the parties to the "Dresden Agreement," and to the town of Breslau; but the people of Teschen petitioned the Government for similar privileges, and obtained, in reply, a patent, by which they were allowed again to build a church and schools. They were indeed thankful to have their school instruction renewed, after being deprived of it for fifty years. While their church was building, the cost of which was defrayed out of their own great poverty and that of their friends, they erected a temporary wooden building, where they were again allowed publicly to worship God. Their first stock of Bibles and religious books were seized and burnt by the Roman Catholic authorities, but on an energetic protest being made, they never had to complain of any repetition of the act. This was in 1709. Five preachers were appointed to preside over the Church at Teschen, but, as four of them were foreigners, the Government would not sanction their appointment, so one of them, Muthmann, had for some time the sole charge of the Church devolving upon him. At length three Silesians, Hentschel, Schmidt, and Steinmetz, were found to assist him.

In 1710 the foundation-stone of another church was laid, large enough to seat many thousands, but it was not completed for more than twenty years. A flourishing school was also formed, and an active religious life was generally manifested. Those under religious instruction numbered about 60,000, living in a circuit of sixty miles, and thus the time of the five pastors was fully taken up.

In this manner the Church prospered for a time, the religious liberty guaranteed to them being faithfully observed, except that they met with occasional instances of molestation from the local magistracy. But troubles now began to arise from within. Hentschel and Schmidt accused their colleagues, Muthmann, Steinmetz, and Sassadius, of being imbued with the pietism of Halle, their real motive being simply envy, because Steinmetz had been appointed chief pastor, and he and his two associates were more beloved in the Church than they themselves. They demanded, in 1722, an investigation into the charge, when the three were completely freed from all blame. On an appeal to the University of Jena, the decision was confirmed, and the accusers were required to withdraw their charge, or be prepared to be removed from their post. Instead of yielding, they, in secret league with the Jesuits, appealed to the Imperial Government, which reversed the preceding decisions, and banished from the country Steinmetz and his friends, as convicted of pietism. And so, in 1730, these faithful ministers had to withdraw from Teschen, amidst the tears of their people, and were conducted by a dragoon to Bunzlau.

Hentschel and Schmidt were now confirmed in their position; but they had entirely lost the esteem of the Church. Many of its most active members left it entirely, and met together in private houses. The school declined, and never again recovered its former vigour. An enemy of the Church applied to the Emperor for the dismission of five of the elders; but although he did not obtain this, the liberty of the Church was further restricted by the requirement that all who applied to be appointed preachers were required to make their application direct to the Court itself.

By this arrangement Hentschel hoped to obtain the appointment of his two sons to the post; the Silesian States, however, urged the election of three others, and after a delay of four years, they gained the day.

The effect of these divisions on the financial affairs of the Church was most disastrous. Almost all building was brought to a standstill, and it was well that most had been finished before the expulsion of Steinmetz. The funds were so low, that for a year or two the teachers could not be paid, and they would have been brought to yet greater extremities, were it not that Sarganeck, in his banishment, made collections in Germany for the Church.

The incorporation of Northern Silesia with the kingdom of Prussia deprived Teschen of many of its most zealous friends, and at the same time a separate consistory was appointed over it, consisting mainly of Roman Catholics, with only two Protestant councillors. During the lifetime of the schoolmaster, Radetzky, the school was in a somewhat flourishing condition, but on his death they were six years before they could get a suitable man to succeed him.

The new consistory cramped the energies and froze the zeal of the members of the Church. Indifference and scepticism, which had spread from England and France through Germany, bore its pernicious fruit, lukewarmness and coldness became the mark of good breeding, and if some few persons of position felt the power of the truth, the majority grew more and more worldly and careless. Yet the Church as a whole remained steadfast.

During the reign of the Empress Maria Theresa there were still many things to complain of; great difficulties were put in the way of visiting the sick residing in Catholic places, and the Protestants were compelled to pay clerical fees to the priests. But on the accession of Joseph II. an appeal to him obtained, in 1782, the grant of a Patent of Toleration, which removed most of the vexations complained of. In 1784 the consistory was reorganised, and soon afterwards combined with that of Vienna. The Protestants now in Teschen, though not possessing equal rights with the Roman Catholics, had yet gained a great deal; they had a legal status, and all their affairs were better managed. Many who had secretly embraced Protestant views, to the number of 2,500, from fifty-three different localities, now came forward and publicly professed them. Buildings for worship were opened in Silesia and Galicia, and the resident Christians formed into Churches. This decentralisation weakened in numbers the Church at Teschen, which had till then been the one Church for all the neighbouring places; but these offshoots stood by the side of and really strengthened the mother Church.

An Imperial Patent of December 31, 1851, gave the Churches the right of keeping independent registers of births, marriages, and deaths, removed the obligation to pay the clerical fees, and gave complete rights in all Church and school matters. Fresh life was thus awakened, and if this is allowed to act with more completely unfettered energy, it may be confidently hoped that the Protestant Church in Silesia will soon be a flourishing and active one.

SPAIN.

PERSECUTION OF PROTESTANTS.

Soon after our last number went to press a large and influential deputation had an interview with Lord John Russell, at the Foreign-office, on the above subject. Memorials embodying the facts were presented by the Evangelical Alliance, the Protestant Alliance, the Scottish Reformation Society, and the Islington Protestant Institute. The deputation was introduced by that distinguished diplomatist and generous friend of Religious Liberty, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and the Secretary of State was addressed by Sir C. E. Eardley, Hon. A. Kinnaird, Rev. Dr. Begg, and Dr. Tregelles, the learned Biblical critic, who had spent a considerable part of the past summer in Spain, and personally knew both Matamoras and Albama. Lord J. Russell's reply was cautious, but at the same time encouraging. Since then the memorials have been communicated to the Spanish Ambassador, and he has been made fully acquainted with the state of British feeling in reference to religious persecution. Results we must leave in the hands of Infinite Wisdom; it is ours to use the best efforts of which we are capable, and wait in prayer.

In the meantime, our friend, Mr. Greene, has received another letter from Matamoras, a copy of which we subjoin:—

Prison, Barcelona, Nov. 27, 1860.

Respected and very dear Brother in our beloved Redeemer Jesus Christ, the only Mediator between God and Men,—I have just received your comforting and Christian letter of the 17th of November, and with it an order for 15l. Thanks! a thousand thanks, dear Brother, to you and to your friends, for this good deed!—thanks from the bottom of my heart, which my pen cannot express. But you, and the lovers of the Gospel, the true children of the Church of Christ who have joined you, will be able to appreciate the depth of my gratitude, by the Christian joy you have experienced in succouring a brother in bonds for Christ's sake—a brother whose only offence and only crime has been loving and circulating the Word of God. . . .

Dear Brother, it appears that my tyrants seek to make my captivity daily more irksome, striving with each other for the pleasure of giving me pain. I have been examined a third time, and have been informed that I must obey the summons of the Tribunal of Granada, but that besides this, the "Audiencia" of Barcelona had determined to bring another action against me, to discover and prove what I have done and attempted for the circulation of the Gospel in Catalonia. So not only is one tribunal acting against me, but two—or rather three—those of Granada, Barcelona, and Malaga. The Tribunal of Granada is so anxious for my appearance there, that in the space of a very few days I have been several times summoned, and my papers called for also. They need not be in haste—I am ready. My poor mother has petitioned the Government to delay my journey, in consideration of the feeble state of my health; and some of the newspapers have supported this demand of hers. Will the Governor grant it? We shall see; and I will let you know the result. My poor mother is suffering martyrdom. Her repeated anxieties have brought on a serious attack of illness; and she has been confined to bed for several days.

I cannot recall without a shudder the sorrowful scene that occurred the day of my arrest. When my dearly-loved and most unhappy mother saw me seized, she fell fainting and senseless to the ground; and my little brothers burst into tears and loud cries, for in their innocent and comfortless sorrow they believed that she was dead. I attempted to go to her assistance, and was not permitted. Cruelly! I shall ever remember that terrible moment with anguish. From that time her health has been so feeble, that I am deeply anxious about her, and on her account. I really dread the day of my departure. God's will be done.

Spain is the grave of many martyrs, the victims of the Church of Rome. In her religious intolerance she has only changed in the external forms for the last 200 years. The Church of Rome hates light and knowledge, and punishes us because we have learnt to know Christ. The Church of Rome despises the Word of God, and imprisons us because we love and respect it, and hold it in our hearts as a sacred and saving possession. Let us take comfort, however, for we see that the rigour of Papal tyranny is impotent against us, and their Satanic wiles are useless. Our imprisonment was needful, and has done much service to our holy work. All Spain knows that we suffer for Christ's sake; and so all may see, evidently, how far removed is the practice of the Roman Church from the precepts of God's Holy Word. But whatever she may attempt against us now is already too late. The Word of God is in the hands of thousands of Spaniards, and the study of it has raised up hundreds of decided Christians, willing and rejoicing to spread the good news, and despising the gainsaying and the persecution of men—ready to take up the cross and follow Christ. So, though tyranny does not falter, neither shall our holy work. But tyranny is the work of man, therefore it must cease. Our work is of God, and therefore ultimately it shall glorious triumph.

For myself, I am perfectly tranquil. Every fresh suffering that my poor weak body endures, every fresh delay which is interposed between me and the day of my release, is a fresh motive to increase my joy and confirm my faith. I glory in tribulations! My imprisonment is a trial to the body, but not to the soul. The slayers of the body are weak and miserable enemies to the soul of a Christian. It can even rejoice in its sufferings for Christ's sake.

I cannot describe to you, dear Brother, the happiness that I have felt since I received your letter, and learnt from it that your noble fellow-countrymen had interested themselves in my fate. Oh, give them the assurance of my deep gratitude. How can I repay so many favours, so much Christian love? The reward is so great that I could never give it, but God will repay it tenfold; and posterity will not fail to keep a sacred niche in history for the sons of noble and powerful Albion, who are ever ready to support the good cause, and to defend the weak and the afflicted.

May God enlighten you, dear Brothers in Christ—may he take you under His special protection—may He recompense, as He sees fit, your noble deeds.

I have confessed before the Tribunals. I do not, and shall never, repent of this. As I have done at Barcelona, I propose doing at Granada. I will confess Christ before the weak as before the strong; before my brethren as before my murderers. I shall suffer—and what then? Did not Christ suffer for us miserable sinners? Did He not lay down His life for our sins? Did He not redeem us by His death? What are my little trials to be compared to the blessing that His words and His example are to me? Oh, nothing! less than nothing! I knew well, when I undertook my Evangelical labours, that I was in the midst of wolves. I knew the thorns and thistles that would be under my feet, but I never forgot the words of the Saviour, "He that taketh not his cross and followeth after Me, is not worthy of Me."

Let us pray to our great Master that He would pardon our enemies and persecutors. Let us pray with sincere and humble faith that He would bring them to his heavenly fold—that He would enlighten and preserve them. I feel no anger against them. I understand the motives of their inhuman cruelty, and I heartily pity them for their separation from Christ.

Farewell, dear Brother; I do not yet know when I shall leave this place. The journey to Granada is indispensable, but the state of my health may occasion some delay. But you shall hear of my movements if possible.

Your Brother in the Lord Jesus Christ,
MANUEL MATAMOROS.

SWEDEN.

LINDBLAD THE COLPORTEUR.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Dear Sirs,—Do you think that the readers of Evangelical Christendom would be interested in the experiences of one of our aged colporteurs during his last journey before leaving his field of labour? It is a very simple account; contains none of those wonderful manifestations that you meet with elsewhere. It does not even profess to describe remarkable conversions; but it opens to your view the state of mind of the people—the fertility of the soil which the Holy Spirit of God is preparing in Sweden for future harvests, and it is also, as far as I understand it, a specimen of what the colporteur is called to do—the humble task that the mole is performing in our fields, removing obstructions to the progress of the sowing, and also using the blessed privilege of the husbandman, throwing in the seed where he meets with a little plot of ground ready tilled.

It was during the autumn of last year that our old friend set out with his supply of books. Lindblad was in former years a soldier, then a shoemaker, and of late he has been a dealer in the Word of God, and felt so happy in his work. He has been trudging on foot through large forests, such as you have seen in Sweden, and visiting little wooden cottages, such as you may remember them, nestling here and there among the pines, or on the borders of a lake, or on the mountain sides. For the benefit of those who have not seen them, we would add that they are generally painted red, with a door and one window in front, with a high thatched roof, and a garden or potato field outside. Now let us fancy to ourselves old Lindblad coming along the pathway with his precious burden of books and his heavenly message; but listen to a few of his own words before you accompany him into the first cottage: He does not like to tell about his work, he says; it is not every flower that bears fruit. Then he will tell you that he does not pick out the abodes of Christian people, but he sets out praying that God will open to him the doors through which he ought to go, and let His Holy Spirit guide him in what he is to say to the inmates, so that it may result in glory to God and the awakening of the souls of men.

In the first cottage, where our old friend went in to seek for a night's lodging, he found a woman, who thought that all was well with her soul, but after some conversation in the evening and some in the morning, she became anxious, and said that she saw that if she was to die in that state she would be lost. What could she do? so she inquired. Nothing, Lindblad told her, but believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and not cease to pray for the Holy Spirit, till God had given her assurance of being a child of God.

In the next cottage he found an old widow and a servant maid. When he spoke to them about salvation, the girl said that she went regularly to church, read the Word of God, and often had deep emotions; that she hoped God was gracious and merciful, and so forth. "Never forget this," he said, "which God now makes known to you, as He does to us all: 'Unless thou art born again by the Spirit of God, thou shalt not see, much less enter, the Kingdom of God.'" Her tears gushed forth, and she prayed to the Lord that she might be born again by His Spirit and enter into His kingdom. The old woman, seeing this, said sulkily, "Well, if none but such are to be saved, I do not think there will be many." "Nor do I," said Lindblad, "because the Lord says Himself there are not to be many, but do not look to the number—look to thyself." He spoke to her strongly, represented to her the danger she was incurring—near as she was to death, and not converted. The old woman was terrified, but finished by saying, "I wish I had in my house daily one who could speak to me as you do." Lindblad told her to pray earnestly for the Holy Spirit of God, who would come and dwell with her, enlightening, teaching, and guiding her for ever, if she only would let Him. Hoping to hear more, the old woman accompanied him to another cottage, where her son was living. This son had, together with his wife, been last year to Alsheda to hear the Rev. Mr. Petterson, and been much affected by the Word preached.

"On entering their cottage," says Lindblad, "I found two persons longing to see the Kingdom of God. One of them was an aged soldier. We had been comrades during the campaigns in Germany, in 1813 and 1814, but had never met since. Now we met at the age of three-score years and ten. He was blind, bodily and spiritually. When he heard that I was come, he jumped out of his bed, calling out, 'I know who you are, old friend and comrade; I have long been waiting for you! I know that you are a Christian, and I have been longing to speak to you!'"

"Well, my friend," I said, "but have you not also heard of a man whose name is Jesus? He is rich in experience and power, and He can give sight to the blind! Do as the blind man in the Gospel narrative—cry, 'Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy upon me! Open my spiritual eyes, so that I may not lose myself on the way to eternity, and in the darkness pass by the door of heaven and stumble into hell!" Dear brother, we have been comrades in the service of his Majesty the King of Sweden, let us now, with upright hearts, swear allegiance to the banner of Christ, tinged with His blood! Let us become spiritual warriors; yea, powerful ones, who, with the help of His spirit, will take the kingdom by force (Matt. xi. 12), and enter it, led by the Captain of our salvation."

"Here I was overwhelmed," says Lindblad further, "by the sense of my own unworthiness and want of power to speak of such mighty things. I had recourse to prayer, that the spirit of wisdom and understanding might be given me, so that I might say what should tend to the glory of God's name and the edification of souls.

"I will only add, that we had much converse together, and so sweet, that it cannot be recorded. They obliged me to stay over the night, and praised the Lord for bringing me to their cottage, and letting them experience the power of God on their hearts. They wished me to come back; I only requested them to pray that God's Holy Spirit might dwell with them."

In another cottage, Lindblad found a soldier's wife, willing to hear and to have a book, but bowed down by the cruelty of her husband, who was an avowed enemy to the Gospel. She was not allowed to go to church, to meetings, to visit Christian people, or to read good books. She was not even allowed to weep. One day she had been sitting at her loom; she was afflicted within, and could not conceal her tears. He saw them, and began to beat and to drag her round the floor, till she was so hurt that she had to lie in her bed two days. In her misery, she opened her heart to old Lindblad, and asked his advice. What was she to do? She had been tempted to shorten her life. What should she do? "Pray that the Spirit of God, who is the spirit of prayer and patience, may dwell with you," said Lindblad, "that He may drive away the temptations of Satan. The Apostle says: 'Ye have not yet striven as unto blood.' Pray for your husband, for his conversion; may-be his present cruelty is necessary for yours. Pray that when that has been effected, God may not throw the rod of your chastisement into the fire, but also convert him. All is possible with the Lord. Keep in mind these words: 'In returning at rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength'" (Isa. xxx. 1

The woman became more calm, prayed and praised.

In another cottage he found another woman, who, as he expresses himself, seemed to know some of the language of Ganaan, but she complained of never being joyful; she saw other children of God happy, and she heard them rejoice, but she was always sorrowful. "To be sure," said Lindblad, "the children of God have always much cause for rejoicing; but are you sure that you are one of the number?"

"Oh, to be sure," she said, for she had sought the Lord many years.

"Yes, you have sought, but then, have you found Him?" He reminded her of such Scripture texts as "Many shall seek to enter in and they shall not be able." "It is important to seek, but still more important to find the Lord. The Apostle says that 'he who is a child of God, has the witness of the Spirit.'" Weeping, the woman confessed that such was not yet her experience. She was thankful for the advice received, requested that Lindblad would pray for her, and never pass her door without coming in.

"Not far from a village I met a man," says Lindblad, "known to be a weak, unconverted, wicked man. I was tempted to pass him by silently, but remembering the words, I accosted the man with a friendly salutation, 'Peace be with you!' and asked if he would buy a book.

"'Oh no!' he said, 'we have so many books, and we do not read them.'

"'Well,' I said, 'that is wrong. We must use means to gain the end, and without reading the Word of God, which leads to salvation, we cannot attain it.'

"'That may be true,' he answered; 'let us sit down here, and look over your books, as well as have some conversation.'"

Lindblad was astonished, and during their interview he felt how great was the power of God, in conquering the spirit of opposition in man's heart, for this very opposer not only bought some of his books, but expressed an earnest wish to begin a new life, and to persevere in it to the end. The aged evangelist could only pray that such seeds might take root and bear fruit.

Next he came to a poor woman who was lying on her death-bed in much agony of mind. To her he spoke words of peace and consolation, showing to her Jesus, the only saviour of souls.

Then he finishes his account with the following words:—

"I could tell you much more, but my old and tired hand refuses to do service any longer, and I lay down my pen, probably never to resume it. My feet also are no longer able to carry me about on these my dear missionary pilgrimages. I wish, therefore, to offer my most grateful thanks to the dear friends in England, who have so kindly supplied my temporal wants, as to enable me to carry on this beloved work. May their generosity not have been in vain! Hereafter I shall on my knees carry on my work for the progress of the Kingdom of God, praying diligently for a rich outpouring of the Spirit of God. May the peace which passes all understanding keep your hearts and minds, through Christ Jesus (Phil. iv. 7). Amen."

TURKISH EMPIRE.

MISSION FIELD OF TURKEY.

The Rev. Dr. Dwight writes from Constantinople:—

I wrote you some time back about the mob of Armenians which committed a great outrage at the burial of a Protestant here. The sequel of the story you may not have heard. So deep an impression was made on the Porte by the events of those few days, and by the resolute manner in which the representatives of five different Protestant countries took up the affair, and jointly remonstrated with the Government, that, by order of the Sultan, five large burial places have been provided for the burial of the Protestants, at the public expense, around this capital; and general orders have been given to the governors of all the provinces, that a similar provision be made wherever Protestants are found throughout the empire!

Never before did these Protestant representatives unite in any measure on behalf of Protestantism in this country; and the movement has done good in many ways. It is all the more gratifying and encouraging, when we take into account that they were self-moved in this matter, as neither we or any of our native brethren had, in this case, solicited interference from a single ambassador.

The Rev. Mr. Morse, of Adrianople, mentions that the Bulgarian "Tract Primer," which had been beautifully printed, was at once introduced into the Bulgarian schools, and that the sale of this book has been so rapid, that they were compelled at once to prepare another edition. Two young ladies (Armenians) had recently commenced attending the Protestant services, under circumstances which it is hoped would greatly tend to the furtherance of the truth. One had obtained the consent of her mother, and came boldly, though amid the sneers and contempt of many who met her. The other, upon beginning to read the Scriptures, met with great opposition from her family, and her father even threatened to take her life. She was sent to the house of a bigoted aunt, and there closely watched, but succeeded in escaping, and fled to the house of the missionary for shelter. Her friends then instituted proceedings to regain her, but were so completely defeated, that they can carry it no further. Another young lady here has been reading the New Testament, and her father, in spite of the remonstrances of the Armenians, says he shall not forbid his children to read the Scriptures.

CENTRAL TURKEY.

There appears to be a desire among the Kuzzelbashes, near Killis, to receive the Gospel. Drakon Sarkis, of this place, spent two days there to enable him to learn their desires and condition. He was received by them with great favour, and reports that they desire to receive the Gospel and its teachers; and say that they will themselves pay the salaries of the school teachers, if they will come and instruct their children. There is thought to be about 8,000 of them, composing many small villages and groups of tents. All that is now needed to extend the Gospel rapidly and successfully in this region would seem to be more means and more labourers.

EASTERN TURKEY.

Mr. Walker, of Diarbekir, writes from Kharpoot:—

Intelligence of the massacres in Syria excited for a time in that region a thirst for blood among the Moslems, and a fear of death among the Christians; but of late, as there has been some appearance of coming justice on the guilty ones of Damascus, a greater degree of confidence prevails, and we hope the crisis in this region is past. At Cheamooogh, though there are but eight or ten declared Protestants, the conviction seems very general that Protestantism is the religion of the Bible. Mr. Walker continues: I could not but feel that it was an indication of good, and gave reason for great hope, that in the shops of so many who rarely if ever are seen in the Protestant Chapel, the New Testament and the whole Bible are so frequently seen, and so often the subject of discussion. The chief hindrance to the work now is the lack of the religious element in the people. They have little zeal for their old Church. Mr. Walker was much pleased with the character and the present and prospective influence of the school for theological students at Kharpoot, and concludes:—

Two or three weeks ago a Christian girl, one of the survivors of the dreadful massacre in Damascus, was offered for sale in Diarbekir, and the Pasha promptly ordered the imprisonment of the Moslem captor. Probably Diarbekir was saved a like massacre the week after I left (about August 10) by the decision and energy of the Pasha, who has proved himself one of the best in the land. Certainly we never have had a Pasha who for seven months continued to appear so well. The recent events in this land have shown us what a volcano we live above, its pent fury restrained only by the hand of the Infinite One. The effect of the introduction of foreign troops, I fear, will verify to the Moslem mind their impression that the Mussulman rule is ended, and leads them to bloody deeds of pre-taken vengeance. They have so long held and acted according to the doctrine, that "Christians have no rights that Moslems are bound to respect," they cannot endure the idea of becoming subject to a Christian power, or even of being placed on an equality with Christians.

SYRIA.

General letter from the American missionaries at Beyrout:—

The object of the present communication is to speak, not of the country, but of the mission, its state and prospects, so far as we can do so now. The brethren Wilson and Lyons remain at Tripoli. Mr. Wilson has doubtless communicated the circumstances which compelled him to leave Homs. At present we see no means of re-occupying the Homs station, for want of men. We have no idea that the country will remain long in a state which would make it unsafe for a missionary to reside there; but in our crippled state we have no one to send. Even had the state of the country not obliged Mr. Wilson to remove, it was a question with us whether his removal would not be necessary, in order to strengthen some of the other stations.

The Beyrout station continues its operation.

The press is working; the female school is in operation; the boys' school might be in operation, but that the room is occupied fully by the refugees from the mountains; the translation of the Scriptures has been resumed; the printing of the voweled edition of the New Testament is about to be commenced; and what is more than all, our chapel is crowded, and we have, and are likely to have, more direct missionary work in Beyrout than ever before. Just now we are all hard pressed with distributing the charities of the Anglo-American Relief Committee, in consequence of which Mr. Jessup remains at Beyrout.

Mr. Calhoun has remained at his station, where he has kept up the regular preaching services, as well as at Aramun; the congregations being as large, if not larger, than before the commencement of the war. It is not improbable that the male seminary may be re-opened at the commencement of the fall term. The common schools at Abeih and Aramun have been re-opened, at the urgent request of both Christians and Druses. We also hope that Mr. Bliss, and the teachers of the female seminary, will be able to return to Suk-el-Ghurb, and re-open that institution at the usual term in November; but of this we cannot speak very decidedly, as we have no idea what proceedings are to be instituted against the Druses. But whatever they might be, we anticipate the mountain stations at Abeih and Suk-el-Ghurb will be able to carry on their operations during the latter part of the fall and during the winter. Deir-el-Komr is not at present open; but we are inclined to think that after a longer or shorter time a door will again be opened even wider than before.

Mr. Ford continues at Sidon, which place, in itself considered, is a more important station than ever before, in consequence of the large number of refugees gathered there, principally from Hasbeiya and its vicinity. The work in Cana-Alma and Merj-Ayun continues to go on, so that Mr. Ford will need all the assistance we can possibly afford him. Hasbeiya has at present nothing for us to do, all the Christian inhabitants being either at Damascus, Beyrout, or Sidon.

From these brief statements, which are all that time will now permit us to make, you will perceive that we hope for good results from the overturnings which have recently taken place. During the progress of these distressing events, we have had our times of fear and discouragement; but, by the good hand of the Lord upon us, we continue to this day, and we intend, by Divine help, to witness more faithfully than ever, to small and great, that Jesus is the Christ. Every previous revolution which this land has passed through since the establishment of the mission, has tended in its results to facilitate rather than to impede the work of the Gospel, and we believe that these recent upheavings will, by the Divine power and wisdom, be made to contribute to the same end.

NORTH AFRICA.

SALE OF BIBLES AND RELIGIOUS BOOKS IN ALGERIA.

Oran, Nov. 8, 1860.

The heart of many friends of the Bible has, I have reason to believe, rejoiced and felt thankful to God, as, walking along one of the principal and most frequented streets of Oran, their eye caught the title "Aux Bons Livres" above the door of a shop, and, on a nearer approach, read on the central column "La Sainte Bible, en plusieurs langues." If, for a moment, any doubted the possibility of the existence of such an establishment, his doubts must have soon vanished, on a closer examination of a large assortment of books exposed open along the extensive glass frontage of the shop, by at once recognising that holy book in the various languages spoken by the mixed population of this city. Nor could he fail noticing, likewise, the publications of the different tract and book societies in various sizes, bindings, and colours. If curiosity led him to tarry awhile, he must have speedily felt himself pressed by Jews, Mussulmans, Spaniards, and Frenchmen, in every variety of costume and uniform, all, like himself, gazing wonderingly at the strange spectacle, and some eagerly, and perhaps loudly, reading the Word of God, or some religious book or tract. He may have also seen a few inside, either warmly engaged in discussion, or seated quietly on chairs provided for their accommodation, with some of those good books in their hands. If induced to inquire further, he will have ascertained that the books are neither given away, nor sold at very low prices, but at fixed prices, which, with rare exceptions, are the same as in the catalogues of the societies that send them forth into the world to illumine and convert mankind. An inspection of the journal would satisfy him that, notwithstanding the prices are kept up, a goodly number are disposed of every month.

Some years ago it was my privilege to be the first, and hitherto the only one, to send a colporteur into the interior of the Empire of Morocco, to spread the sacred Scriptures in the chief cities of that part of Northern Africa, which the jealous policy of European Governments permits to remain more rigorously shut up against Christians and missionaries than China itself! It is now my happiness also to establish the first dépôt for the sale of the Scriptures and religious works in Algeria. This has not been easily accomplished. It cost me more labour and fatigue than I can now describe. For six long months I had to contend with difficulties on every side; first to the introduction of the books, and then to the opening of some door for their circulation. I had to do battle and overcome the determined and systematic opposition of priests and Jesuits, who, behind the curtains, as is their wont, did their utmost to thwart every step I took, and to prejudice everybody against the object. Knowing, from good authority, that no application for the employment of a colporteur would be entertained, there remained no alternative but to open a book-shop. It were tedious to detail the formalities I had to perform. At last the application reached the highest authority, the Minister for Algeria and the Colonies, and to my joy and the surprise of many, it was granted.

I fancy some one asking, "But why all that trouble? What hinders you from doing just as we do here, and, without asking anybody's permission, take a bag full of Bibles and tracts, and go distributing them about at pleasure?" All that trouble was necessary; and others have undergone as much, and more, without succeeding. The state of the law, under the present régime, is such, that no one is safe, not only in distributing a single Bible or tract, but even in lending a book to a friend for perusal! The French Protestant ministers, being paid by Government, have more to dread than mere imprisonment and fine; and no one should blame them if they seem rather over-cautious, for it is all chance, and while one is allowed to do as he likes, another may be taken to task; and what is tolerated at one time, at the instigation of some priest or Jesuit, may be charged as a crime at another. These remarks will make evident the importance and necessity of such an establishment; without it there was no safe medium for the circulation of the Word of God; and what lasting fruits can be expected from a mission that does not possess the means to place the Bible within the reach and at the very doors of the people? Every one here despaired of accomplishing the object. Those who attempted it failed; and it was deemed presumptuous when I entertained and expressed better hopes. But, by the blessing of God, my persevering efforts have been crowned with success, to the joy of our brethren in these parts, and the discomfiture and humiliation of the enemies of the Bible and its eternal truths. To God be all the praise!

The dépôt was opened to the public on the 2nd April; and I will now render an account of the first six months of its existence. The principle on which I act is that of circulating the Scriptures, religious books, and tracts, by sale, of course. I do not, and must not, refuse a Bible or a book to real inquirers after truth; but I am opposed to indiscriminate gratuitous distributions, and am desirous to prove that, except in rare occasions and circumstances, it is not only unnecessary, but positively injurious. Those who really desire to read the Bible will be always found ready to pay something for it, while many who are persuaded to accept it gratuitously very seldom read it, if, indeed, they make no worse use of it than to lay it aside to be covered with dust. A leader in the Times, of Oct. 3rd, on book-hawking, offers some very sensible and just remarks. I quote the following: "The recipient of a tract knows that the donor has some object in giving it, and, though that object be his own good, his feelings slightly rebel against it. Tracts which are given away are not sure to be read, and if read, they will not have the relish of that which the labourer has selected for himself and bought with his own savings." How much more forcibly is this applicable to Bibles and religious books! Having premised this much, I shall have little more to add on the following table of sales for each of the last six months:—

Month	Scriptures.			Books and Pamphlets.			Tracts.			Amount of Sales.
	Vols	£	s. d.	Vols	£	s. d.	No.	£	s. d.	£	s. d.
April	22	1	10 8½	19	1	7 0	75	0	4 3	3	1 11½
May	36	3	19 8	24	0	11 11½	62	0	3 7	3	15 2½
June	44	3	4 6½	6	0	2 11½	51	0	3 1	2	10 6½
July	63	4	0 10	27	0	18 2½	35	0	2 3	5	1 2½
Aug.	73	3	3 10½	11	0	9 4½	46	0	3 6	3	16 8½
Sept.	74	3	18 6	23	1	5 4½	25	0	1 7	5	5 5½
Totals	314	17	18 1	120	4	14 10½	294	0	18 3	23	11 2½

Average per month: 52 Scriptures; 20 books; 49 tracts; and 3*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*

I would call special attention to the pleasing fact that, while the number of books and tracts fluctuates, there is a steady increase in the sale of the Scriptures. Sure, these are no extraordinary numbers, and people accustomed to read of the distribution of thousands and tens of thousands in other cities, will be disposed to think lightly of this result. Those, however, who know this ungodly country, will think otherwise. It is not Protestants that bought them. The practice in the French churches to present a copy of the sacred volume to every couple that is married within their walls, makes it most probable that the few Protestant families in this city possess at least one Bible each. But they were purchased by Roman Catholics, Jews, and Mohammedans; and those numbers represent nearly as many individuals of those classes who have been persuaded to possess themselves of books which most of them may have never read, or even seen before. And it is the more gratifying to know that they have acquired those books by purchase at fair prices.

This enterprise has necessarily involved considerable outlay. The fittings, rent, salary of depôt keeper, patent, freight, and custom's duty of books received, &c., to the end of Sept., amount to 83*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*, to which must be added 12*l.* 12*s.* of books purchased from various societies. The income has been Grant from the Bible Society, 25*l.*; ditto from the British Society, 25*l.*; donations received through Evangelical Christendom, 7*l.* 5*s.*; and donations from friends in Oran, &c., 18*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* leaving a balance of 20*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* to be covered by the proceeds from sales at the depôt.

I have an impression that in future I must depend mainly on the contributions of private friends for carrying on and extending this work, and would therefore request all who feel an interest in this enterprise, and desire its success, to send their donations to you, as I feel sure that you will kindly take charge of such gifts and forward them to me. The greater portion of the contributions I may receive will, in all probability, be invested in the publications of the continental societies, whose funds do not allow them to make very liberal grants.

Preserving for a future communication notices of instances in which the perusal of these good books has been blessed to immortal souls, and commending this mission, and this enterprise in particular, to your prayers,

I remain, my dear Sirs, yours very sincerely,

A. BENOLIEL.

SOUTH-EAST AFRICA.

THE COUNTRY AND ITS INHABITANTS—A KAFIR SUPERSTITION AND ITS RESULTS—PROSPECTS OF BRITISH KAFFRARIA—MISSIONARY OPERATIONS.

King William's Town, Sept., 1860.

It would be impossible to convey a correct idea of the great Evangelical missionary agencies carried on in these parts, without giving first a brief outline of the country and people where these operations are being conducted. In doing this I shall confine my observations chiefly to those portions of South-Eastern Africa which have been taken from the Kafirs within the last few years, as the result of those deadly wars which have raged from time to time. I do not, however, at all advert to the political line of conduct which has been adopted, or make any strictures upon it, as to whether it was right or wrong. All that I intend is, to give a brief statement of facts.

Until the war of 1846, the Great Fish River was the boundary of the old colony, so far inland from the mouth as the point where the Rat River falls into it, from which point to the northward the Rat River was the boundary.

But after the wars of 1846 and 1851, the whole country lying between the Fish and Bashee Rivers, which now constitutes the large districts of Queenstown and Victoria North, also Victoria South, lying between the Great Fish River and the Keiskama River, and extending northward until it joins the district of Queenstown, also what now constitutes British Kaffraria, situated between the Keiskama and Rei Rivers, and added to this the country lying between the Rei and Bashee Rivers—the whole of this extensive country has been taken in since 1846. But no one can form a correct estimate of the extent of territory embraced, unless he possess local knowledge of the country or examine a good map in which it is definitely laid down. Probably it is larger, considerably, than the whole colony of Natal.

To give even a short historical account of the Kafir tribes, which formerly occupied this large tract of country, does not fall within the province of this letter. Suffice it to say that the upper part was mostly occupied by the Tembookies (or Abatembu), the middle by the Ghikas (or Amangqika), and the lower by the Isimbis (or Amandhlambe), and several other tribes. The Amagaleka dwell between the Great Rei River and the Bashee River, and have been driven beyond the latter river within the last few years. The numerous independent tribes of Kafir, who formerly occupied this extensive range of territory, exist no more as an independent people, their numbers are greatly reduced, and their nationality has departed. This result was accelerated not only by devastating wars with the colony, but was also greatly advanced by the delusion of one of their own false prophets (Urazeli-kazi), by whom they were induced to destroy their corn and slaughter their cattle, under the astounding pretext, that in a short time they would rise again in prodigious numbers; and so far did this mad delusion prevail, that nearly the whole people were led away by it; the melancholy result of which was a dreadful famine, in which, notwithstanding the efforts of Europeans to provide food, tens of thousands literally died of starvation, reducing their numbers to a much greater extent than British powder and steel had ever done. They thus became at once the victims of their own wild superstition, and the monuments of the retributive Providence of a holy God. Many of them had had the Gospel offered to them by the servants of Christ, but they rejected it with haughty disdain; but now, as they are confounded, scattered, and peeled by an unseen hand, a remnant will humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, and receive the Gospel of the blessed God; and possibly, from this wreck, God may make those a people who are not a people, that all the glory may redound to Him. This is already being done among the Fingoes, who live by tens of thousands on the frontier and in British Kaffraria. These were originally driven down from Natal and adjacent countries by that great Amagulu warrior, Utshaka. There are still many Rabies in the land, and it is to be hoped that the hand that smote, smote only to save.

Since the wars above referred to, the extensive range of country already described as taken possession of by the British has been partly given out in farms to Europeans, and partly reserved for natives. The whole length of seaboard, with only a small exception, has thus been given out in farms, extending inland to a distance of forty or fifty miles.

British Kaffraria includes that part of the country which lies eastward of the Keiskama River and extends to the Rei; the seaport of the province is East London, and the capital King William's Town, which is growing into some importance. The province is separated from the old colony, and has its own government, at the head of which is Colonel Maclean, as Chief Commissioner, but important changes are expected soon to take place. As the farmers mostly occupy the coast range, the country reserved for the natives lies further inland, and if they can only have the ground secured to them, and an efficient form of government established over them, they may still become a numerous people.

But nearly everything depends upon the extent to which religious influence can be brought to bear upon them. For, when this is not done, they remain the same wild, untamed barbarians, smeared with red clay and covered with red blankets in cold weather, but otherwise still in a state of nudity, as they ever were; whilst a strong desire for European intoxicating drinks is growing upon them and decimating their numbers; and I can by no means endorse the statement that has been made, that they are embracing religion "in the masses."

Having thus given some account of the country and its inhabitants, I purpose, in a future letter or letters, giving some information respecting the missionary operations now being carried on amongst this people, with the hope that increased interest may be felt in these operations. WILLIAM C. HOLDEN.

WEST AFRICA.

GENERAL FEATURES OF THE COUNTRY AND CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PEOPLE—THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Gaboon, Equatorial West Africa,
Sept. 14, 1860.

Dear Sirs,—Having received your magazine regularly during several months past, permit me to return you my thanks, and also to express the interest I have long felt in the Evangelical Alliance and the efforts being made to unite the followers of Christ.

The intelligence you send me from month to month of the progress of the Lord's work in various parts of the world is truly cheering.

"Ethiopia also shall soon stretch out her hands unto God." This, indeed, she is already doing, and notwithstanding the weak faith of the Church in reference to this field, her prospects are far from discouraging. The very mention of the name of this land of mystery, of darkness, and oppression, should awaken a thrill of interest and sympathy in every philanthropic Christian heart. For whether we refer to the past—the bright period in her history, when her northern and north-eastern borders were radiant with the light of science and Christian civilisation, where flourishing Churches existed, and primitive fathers laboured and died—or to the long dark night that succeeded, during which, under the triple scourge of Mohammedan bigotry, bloody Paganism, and the foreign slave-trade, she experienced unparalleled woes; or if we refer to her present condition of intellectual, social, and moral degradation, in connexion with her brightening prospects and promised deliverance and Christianisation, we shall find much to elicit sympathy and encourage to philanthropic and Christian effort.

Intertropical Africa, as far as has been explored, in magnificent scenery, luxuriant soil, capable of producing in rank profusion most of the tropical productions, and invaluable natural resources, is scarcely surpassed. Her commerce, now considerable, is rapidly increasing, and when the slave-trade shall be entirely suppressed, and her people, instead of preying upon and selling each other, shall cultivate her soil, and under the stimulating and elevating influences of Christianity, develop her hidden but inexhaustible natural resources, it will be immensely valuable.

The climate of Africa, though in many places uncongenial to the constitution of foreigners, is well adapted to her native-born people, who generally enjoy as vigorous health and attain as great age as do the inhabitants of higher latitudes. The common idea respecting the great inferiority of the African race is in my opinion erroneous. During a residence of many years in this country, I have become more or less acquainted with many different tribes and nations; and while I have noticed considerable diversity among them, I have nowhere seen marked evidence of inferiority or lack of native intellectual capacity. But in estimating their natural capabilities, we must take into account their past and present disadvantages. They have always been under the darkening and degrading influence of Paganism, their minds a prey to the grossest superstitions imaginable; the darkness of ages has settled down upon their mental and moral natures. And in addition to this, let it be borne in mind that for successive generations nearly all of the maritime nations have been under the barbarising influence of the foreign slave-trade.

The African race are much what the degrading and oppressive treatment they have received from their more enlightened and powerful white fellow-men have made them. Although we find them, like all other heathen people, deplorably ignorant and desperately depraved, they possess minds and hearts as susceptible of cultivation as those of any other people placed in the same circumstances. They have a passion for trade, and in the exchange of their native products for foreign goods, exhibit no little tact, industry, and shrewdness. The tribes on and near the coast, who have depended upon foreigners to supply their wants, have neglected manufactures; but many of those who reside in the interior show considerable ingenuity in constructing their furniture and houses, and in manufacturing farming utensils and implements of warfare from their native ore, which they dig and use in preference to foreign iron.

Some of their languages, which have recently been acquired and reduced to writing, so soft and flexible, poetic and philosophical in their structure, indicate anything rather than imbecility or a want of native capacity; their fondness for drawing, passion for music and extempore songs, and particularly their rude but natural impassioned oratory on certain occasions, intimate to us what the African may become under the sanctifying influences of Christianity.

The hundreds of native children who have been instructed in our schools have exhibited a capacity to acquire and retain knowledge that has often astonished as well as gratified their teachers. Nor is this confined to children, for adults and aged persons often manifest much quickness of apprehension, inquisitiveness, and shrewdness. I do not suppose the African will ever develop Anglo-Saxon mental strength and vigour, nor will the inhabitants of any tropical clime, but that he possesses all the requisites for an intelligent, refined, and luxuriant Christian civilisation, I have no doubt. We find the African peculiarly a religious being. He is possessed of a warm and enthusiastic nature, and of a generous, affectionate, and confiding heart. In his fetichy he trusts implicitly, and in all his superstitious observances he manifests a fidelity and devotion that might teach even the Christian a lesson. But he is neither bigoted nor sceptical; when the light of Divine truth, accompanied by the power of the Holy Spirit, breaks in upon his dark mind, he readily receives it. He has nothing of the pride of the Oriental, who boasts of the antiquity of his belief; nor the haughtiness of the red man of the western world, who refuses the improvements that are offered him, but is imitative, docile, and teachable. Give the Gospel to the "scattered and peeled" millions of Africa; let its pure principles, elevating influences, and quickening impulses be felt, and their dormant minds will awaken to new life, and to the joy of "the common salvation." To secure this grand result, will not the Churches in Britain and throughout Christendom unite their efforts and prayers? For while the Church is debtor to the Greeks and barbarians—the whole world—Africa has a special claim upon her sympathies, for her woes and wants are great and pressing, without a parallel.

Fraternally yours in Christ,

A. BEHLLUNS.

In another communication, dated Oct. 22, the same correspondent expresses his gratitude to the Evangelical Alliance for the invitation they have extended to the whole Church of God throughout the world to observe the second week in January, 1861, as a season of special supplication. He also makes a practical suggestion, which we subjoin in his own words:—

"Let me especially solicit the prayers of the Christian world during the proposed week of supplication in behalf of Africa, this vast moral Sahara, where, through the instrumentality of the Church, numerous oases are beginning to bloom. The labourers who are toiling in this sterile, dark, and perilous field, are feeling more and more that it is 'not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord,' that the great work which they have undertaken is to be accomplished. O if, in answer to united prayer, the Holy Spirit descends in convincing and converting power upon all these missions upon this coast—upon the 15,000 native Christians, and the still larger number of pupils in Christian schools, and upon the hundreds of thousands who have long listened to the Gospel, how glorious will be the results! How will Africa's wail of woe be turned to shouts of joy on earth, and heaven resound with praise over repenting sinners saved! I shall do all in my power to extend the invitation to a week of prayer, and to secure its observance on this coast, and shall wait in confident expectation that it will be an aid in the progress of our work, the commencement of a brighter day, whose sun shall not set till all Africa shall be radiant with light, and vocal with the praises of God."

JAMAICA.

EXTRAORDINARY RELIGIOUS AWAKENING.

As marvellous, in some respects even more marvellous than the accounts we received more than twelve months ago from Ireland, are the accounts of similar scenes and occurrences which are now reaching us from Jamaica. We have heard before now, indeed in the times of slavery, of the rapid and extensive spread of religion among the negroes. Thousands and tens of thousands of them at that time were gathered into Christian Churches, and with more or less of attendant enthusiasm, demonstrated the great moral change they professed to have undergone. In the large majority of cases, we believe, the profession was sincere, and the change real. But it enraged beyond all bounds the slaveholders, and slave-drivers, and all that class of interested and demoralised persons, until, in their blind and frantic malice, they brought about the events which issued in the abolition of slavery. We well remember listening, in a private interview with a returned governor of the island, now no more, to an eloquent address, in which the gallant old soldier wound up his description of the religious condition of society there at that time in these emphatic words: "In short, gentlemen, there are just two classes of people in Jamaica, black Christians and white devils." It was a disinterested, though, perhaps, somewhat exaggerated testimony to the influence of Christianity upon the negro population at that period, and since then we may hope that the other portion of the community has improved.

But the present awakening surpasses everything of which we have previously heard. It is distinguished by several extraordinary features. Among these we may mention the suddenness of its occurrence, the physical prostrations, the rapidity with which it spreads, the intensity of the emotions by which it is attended, the humiliating self-criminations, and the moral results. We have copious accounts from different witnesses lying before us, and we shall proceed to give extracts and condensed portions of them, without much regard to classification. We desire only to premise that what we lay before our readers constitutes but a very small portion of the materials with which we have been furnished, that we offer no explanation of the physical phenomena, still less an apology for them, and that some of the most startling of these we withhold. It would be altogether premature to deduce general conclusions. The inductive philosophy, it may be well for all parties to remember, as well the scoffer as the devout, is slow in reaching its decisions, and demands a large collection of facts. In the meantime, for our own parts, we cannot but be struck with the circumstance that demonstrations in all their leading features similar to those now described are occurring in so many and such distant places; that so many intelligent men, not credulous or fanatical, or easily imposed upon, witnesses of what they describe, regard them as the evidence of a supernatural Divine influence, and that their immediate, and hitherto, in the vastly largest proportion of instances, their permanent effect, has been a quickened sense of spiritual and eternal things, combined with an improved morality.

"Prayer," says the Rev. C. Sibley, "has not been offered in vain, for a Pentecostal shower has come down. The work began in St. Elizabeth's, amongst the Moravians, and spread in the Church of England, and amongst the Baptists." "The awakening," says the Rev. D. J. East, "all through St. Elizabeth's, Westmoreland, and St. James's, borders on the miraculous. Every one regards it as the work of God, and yet almost every one speaks of it with fear and trembling." A third witness writes: "We have been at once startled, awe-stricken, and filled with adoring gratitude by manifestations of the wonder-working power of God, as marvellous as those witnessed in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost. . . . At the commencement of this year there was a confident expectation in the hearts of many that it would not close without a signal blessing; but I believe no one anticipated—no one had faith to look for that blessing in such copious showers." A fourth, the Rev. John Clarke, of Savanna-la-Mar, says: "From New Carmel, and the borders of St. Elizabeth, the work has steadily progressed westward, widening in its course in each direction. Its influence has been felt, in a greater or less degree, at the following places and doubtless at some others, of which I have not yet heard: all round Carmel, and onward to the Bigwoods on the one hand, and to Beaufort and Bethel Town on the other; to Aldair, Tonzalin Town, and Tennis, along the seaboard; and in powerful operation eastward to New Hope; and has reached, it is reported, inland to the town of Mandeville, in Manchester. From Bethel Town and Beaufort it has extended to Mountward and Mount Peto, in Hanover; and from the Bigwood it has come to Cairn Currain Waterworks, Sutcliffe Mount, Whitherne, Petersfield, Hertford, and Shrewsbury. It is said it has also appeared in its powerful operation upon the minds of sinners in the Fullers' Field District."

Let us now, from these general statements, proceed to particular facts. A Moravian pastor, writing to a Baptist minister, says:—

The Lord has been pleased to visit us with an extensive outpouring of His Holy Spirit upon the inhabitants of this part of the island, St. Elizabeth; very many have been awakened from their sleep of religious formality; and many very ungodly persons have been prostrated at the Saviour's feet, and have cried for mercy; and not a few, I may confidently believe, have obtained that blessing. It is in every respect identical with the revival of religion in England, being evidently wrought by the self-same Spirit. I have within the last four weeks conversed individually with 345 persons who have been brought under its happy influence, and still the work proceeds. Oh, that it may spread over the whole land!

Two or three weeks since (another missionary writes under date of November 20), a minister of the Gospel went on a visit to Montego Bay to preach on the Sunday to a congregation there. He arrived on the Saturday evening about five o'clock. Scarcely had he taken refreshment when one and another came in to discourse with him of the amazing movement; some wondering what it meant; some in doubt, some confessing in it the mighty power of God. It was past nine o'clock before the last caller left. The whole town was in a state of excitement, not from the awakening itself, but from the rumour of it. It was the one subject which engrossed universal attention; the market-place and the store were full of it; all classes were talking about it—market people, merchants, and planters. Some were mocking, and some were praising God. All were filled with astonishment. From an early hour on the Sunday morning, the minister, who had come from a distance, and had before heard only faint whispers of what was doing, could now hear of nothing else. So all-engrossing was the subject, that as the hour of public service drew near, he was compelled to throw aside the sermon he had intended to preach, and make this great awakening the subject of discourse.

At first when I heard of the movement, I had my doubts about the work, but after fully inquiring from several persons in St. Elizabeth's, I felt convinced the hand of God was in it, and that powerfully. I told the friends at Bethel Town what I had heard, preached a revival sermon, and proposed a prayer-meeting before daylight on Monday morning, and oh! what a meeting it was! 500 persons came out; the Lord was in the place. I gave out that there would be another meeting in the evening, but to that I could not stay. I desired Mr. Atkins to preside. The meeting was held; the people crowded in; prayers were offered; and when the last petition was being put up the answer came; the Spirit was poured out, and the mighty revival movement commenced in real earnest. The people could not, and would not, leave the chapel; the work progressed; so much so, that Mr. Atkins sent express for me on the Wednesday evening. I went, and oh! what a sight! never shall I forget what I then heard and saw. The stricken were innumerable during the first part of the night. There must have been 100 poor hardened sinners down at one time, crying bitterly over their sins, and most earnestly suing for mercy. Oh! may they all be amongst the saved! I stayed with the friends until Friday morning, when I dismissed them after holding an open-air service. Before I left, fourteen couples that had been living in sin, came to have their names published for marriage. Brother G. H. rejoices over the work with myself, but feels with me that it requires the most careful guidance.—Rev. P. Sibley.

The following is from the pen of G. W. Gordon, Esq., Justice of the Peace. After describing an evening meeting at Mount Carey, at which he addressed the people, he proceeds:—

I feel convinced of the sincerity of the movement; this is indeed a time for prayer and supplication; a people neglected, a people wronged, a people burdened, we have prayed for relief, and the Lord is about to answer our prayer. . . . We now retired to rest, and at nearly seven o'clock next morning we had a prayer-meeting, conducted by Rev. G. Henderson, who immediately left for Bethel Town, to conduct the service and to see how the work of revival was progressing. It then devolved on me to undertake the service of the day at Mount Carey Chapel; this was an important duty, and I approached it in much weakness, but the Lord gave me power, and blessed be His great name! At eleven o'clock there was a large congregation, some being outside the chapel, which was full, there being from 1,000 to 1,200. Serious and anxious seemed many countenances. The hoary hair of many proclaimed they were long sinners. While the hymn was being sung several parties, to the number of seven, fell down in the chapel under conviction, and it was indeed a scene which took some little care and time to get over, but from the prudence of the deacons, Mr. Houghton, and others, was so well managed, that quiet was restored and the hymn finished. . . . I may say that this service was sanctioned and blessed of God. During this day one of the convicted came to the house; I think her name was Ann James; I had some pleasant conversation with her respecting the Lord's work, and she seemed as a thankful spirit, and then kneeled down and prayed sweetly. Oh! may she be one indeed for Jesus! Mr. Henderson returned from Bethel Town, bringing a most satisfactory report of the day's proceedings there, stating that about forty couples are to be married, and that in one day twenty-nine banns had been published; this all but seemed an earnest assurance of an awakening, as many of the parties, if perhaps not all, had previously lived in open rebellion against the married life.

The important station at Shortwood could not be supplied this day, and there too much was to be done; it seemed as if the Lord had for some wise purpose removed the minister for a time, and sent His own Spirit amongst the people; that He had taken the work in His own mighty hands. But is there not room for reflection in all this? Yes, we think there is. Here is Mount Carey, say with 1,000, Shortwood with another 1,000, and Bethel Town with perhaps another 1,000; there, in the absence of the minister, we find that 3,000 are awakened by the power of the Spirit.

An Independent minister writes as follows:

That it is the work of God, is evident from the fact that it has for the present closed the rum shops and the gambling houses, that were such a hindrance to our usefulness; reconciled husbands and wives that were long separated; led prodigal children to return penitent to their parents; caused scores of banns to be published in this part of the parish; excited the rage of the ungodly whom it has not humbled; crowded every place of worship; quickened the zeal and animated the hopes of ministers of the Gospel; is purifying the Churches, and bringing many sinners to repentance. What is said in the papers about confessions is not strictly correct. No one has asked any one among us to confess anything, but when they begin to pray they pour out everything before God in audible prayer, during which they are utterly indifferent as to the consequences. In some places the disclosures have been truly astounding, and even horrible.

The Rev. W. Claydon, of Clarendon and Manchester, says:—

I write now to give you some account of the glorious and wonderful work which the God of salvation appears to be performing amongst us here. I have for a few months past witnessed an evident improvement in the state of the Churches here, particularly Porus, and I thought that God was answering our prayers for the revival of religion; but I never anticipated, had not faith to expect, such a wide-spread spiritual influence as He is now exerting on all classes here at the present moment. The Pentecost is being truly and literally enacted on the surface of society here at the present time; were it prudent so to do, we might add almost thousands of converts to the Church. As the inspired writer related of that period, "Fear has fallen upon all the people," and there is great joy in the village, I may say parish; to quote the language of some of our people, "Minister, we have been praying for a revival of religion, and now God pour out His Spirit, we are all 'frail for it.'"

There are, doubtless, many that have no sympathy with the movement, but the results are so astonishing, so wonderful, that they are awed into silence. A few scoffers are so besieged by those who profess to have felt the quickening power, that they have no rest from their importunity to cease their rebellion against God. The vilest and most abandoned are amongst the trophies of its power, and their conversion is followed by the most untiring labours on behalf of others, and the most stirring prayers for their conversion; so intent are they, that they forget the claims of the outer man, and literally exhaust themselves with uninterrupted efforts in this work. Hundreds of new converts and old members are going from house to house all the day long, frequently night, on this errand.

The work is characterised by the most awful and alarming conviction of sin, till one is almost ready to doubt his own conversion. I have witnessed those under conviction groaning on their knees for seven or eight hours, and even more; some are now in distressing agony for their souls, who have been in this state, almost without food or sleep, till we tremble for reason and life. The result of it all is, for the present, a total abandonment of sin, the most fearful confessions of backsliding on the part of members and officers in the Church, till one is bowed down in anguish, and compelled to cry out, "What can we do?" But when a sense of pardon is obtained, or as they express it, "they find peace," their joy is of the most ecstatic character. What the result of all this will be—the permanent result—God only knows: we may fear much will be spurious, but surely good will come.

The following is condensed from a very copious account written in a diary by the Rev. Th. Sonderman, a Moravian minister at New Fulneck, and which has been obligingly sent to us by the Secretaries of the Moravian Missionary Society:—

When I came to the Clifton district connected with New Fulneck, I inquired for the helper, and was told that he was at the meeting. I considered what meeting this could be; but riding on, I soon came to a crowd of people, and was greeted with the salutation, "O minister, the Lord has come amongst us!" Some were weeping for joy, others appeared under deep conviction of sin, and others sat considering to what all this would lead. Some had been smitten to the ground. The excitement was intense. I made an attempt to allay it, and partially succeeded. But when endeavouring to engage in prayer my feelings overpowered me, and I thought it best to leave the assembly, commending them to the direction of the Holy Spirit, who had worked so wonderfully among them. There is a general mighty upheaving of all hearts, a tremendous shaking of the dead and dry bones. The great feature of the awakening is prayer, and such prayer! People whose lips seemed only accustomed to curse and swear, now pray as if it had been the daily employment of their lives. Friday, September 28.—At nine o'clock the meeting commenced. After having sung a verse, and addressed a few words to the people, we engaged in prayer. There was no occasion to call on any one to do so, for no sooner had one finished than another began. Such prayer I never heard before. Little children took part in it. When one little boy began to pour out his soul before the Lord, a trembling seized on all. Tears were shed, cries for mercy ascended before the throne of God, and groans were wrung from the hearts of many hardened sinners. Among the rest, a little girl lifted up her voice, and uttered a heart-rending prayer. Such earnestness, fervency, and fluency I had never before witnessed. The Spirit came down "like a mighty rushing wind." Strong men trembled on their knees, as though they had been shaken by an invisible power. There was a general weeping, and I feared that the excitement would overstep all bounds of order and propriety. At twelve the meeting broke up, but the people assembled again at the school-house; many were smitten down, and prayers were offered which could only have been dictated by the Holy Spirit. In the meantime, I conversed in the Church with all those who had been brought under conviction of sin, and then all doubts as to the reality of this awakening were completely removed. Such confession of sin, such contrition of heart, such deep and earnest desire for pardon through Jesus Christ, such joy and happiness, could only be experienced by truly mourning and pardoned sinners. . . . The rum shops are all deserted. . . . The demand for Bibles and hymn-books is something wonderful. . . . You may perhaps feel surprised at one feature mentioned above, that children were permitted to pray in public. But I might as well have attempted to stop the river in its course, as to stem the stream of outpouring of heart which took place yesterday. God is, indeed, a God of order; but there are times when we find that he has an order of his own. . . . One feature in this awakening is very striking to me. This is the mutual love which pervades those who have come under its influence. Never was there greater order and decorum manifested in the Church than to-day. The prayer-meetings held in the neighbouring districts last night were attended by hundreds of people. Even now, late as it is, the sound of singing reaches my ears. . . . A gentleman told us that on Saturday an awakened person came to him, and, with much contrition, told him how many pigs, fowls, &c., he had stolen from him at various times. . . . Several persons have been awakened in their own houses by the instrumentality of their children who had been at the prayer-meetings, and gave their parents no rest till they had family worship. October 1.—I hear that this morning the powerful influences of God's Spirit showed themselves during a prayer-meeting at Y—S— (this place is described by the missionary as "that stronghold of Satan, that favourite den of unclean spirits with its hosts of the vilest sinners"). Two young women were struck down as if by lightning in the house of a third, who had previously experienced the same. One of them, under a deep sense of her desperate condition, confessed that she had long been secretly leading a life of the utmost villainy. What a revealer of dark deeds is a smitten conscience! I dread the awful things that are likely to come to light in that pre-eminently wicked village. October 4.—The teacher has just returned from the Y—S—prayer-meeting. Five young persons, two men and three women, were smitten down during the meeting. The young men were both struck mute, and one of them writhed as if in dreadful agony. One of the women was in a state which reminded me of what is recorded in Mark i. 23—26. The contortions of her body were dreadful. October 6.—Before rising from bed this morning I was startled by heart-rending cries of "Lord have mercy! O Lord be merciful to me!" Having hastily dressed, I went out and found about twenty people from Y—S— before the house, crying out and weeping on account of their sins. The word of conviction had pierced their hearts at the prayer-meeting yesterday evening and during the past night. I took them into the vestry and administered to each of them such comfort and instruction as the Lord enabled me to impart.

Interesting and striking as these details are, we must bring them to a close, although very much more still lies before us. We add only one additional testimony from the Rev. John Clarke, of Savanna-la-Mar, one of the oldest missionaries in the island.

In the town of Savanna-la-Mar, we are holding meetings for prayer and reading the Scriptures almost every morning, in private houses, where from fifty to one hundred readily attend. Many of these have seldom before visited a house of prayer, and the new light gradually coming upon their darkened understandings, as seen in its effects, is very pleasing to behold. It would be premature to particularise, except in a few cases, where the immediate good effects are manifest.

Very large numbers are giving their names to be published for marriage; and many are seeking for admission into the Church of Christ.

Several persons who were once united in marriage, but who forsook each other, and have long lived apart, and most of them in sin, are leaving their guilty paramours, and are, as sinners humbled before God, coming together again.

Backsliders are seeking pardon and re-admission to the Churches, from which, for their sins they have been separated.

The number of young people now under concern for their souls is greater than I have ever seen during the thirty-one years I have been acquainted with Jamaica.

The rum stores are not so much frequented, and on the roads and in the town there is more of quietness, and even seriousness in many, which was not seen until this revival commenced. At the Circuit Court, though a man was tried for murder, the idlers were fewer than usual; and on the roads, too, and from the great markets in the parish, the noise of the tipsy and quarrelsome ones is not now heard.

At one of our meetings a good man offered to read the Scriptures, when another objected and wished the singing to be continued; but this man was overruled, and the Word of God was solemnly read. Curiosity led to inquiry why any man should object to the reading of the Word of God. It was found this person, though married, was an adulterer, and had led many young females into sin; one had forsaken her wicked course, but found no peace of mind until she had put from her, for ever, the fine dress which she had obtained as the reward of her iniquity.

Another person was preparing dresses for the "Sett Girls," but she, with tears, has confessed her sins, and given up the folly in which she was engaged, and several others of the "setts" have given up, and we hope no display of the "setts" will increase the pollution of our community this year.

Some of our most intelligent magistrates, attorneys, and others, are satisfied the work is not of man, nor of the devil; yet they fear it will be abused, to produce evil; and that work may be neglected, if people are encouraged in what is enthusiastic.

Now, from the experience of the same excitement in Ireland and in Scotland, we may affirm evil will not arise out of it. We shall have a higher standard of morality, more of the power of pure and undefiled religion, greater industry, and more of honesty in the fulfilment of contracts; so that those who only love to see the degradation of the people by drunkenness, concubinage, litigiousness, &c.—and these we hope are few in number—will be disappointed.

We have no room for the reflections which these extraordinary narratives cannot fail to suggest, and indeed every reader will make his own. We shall wait for further communications with some solicitude, but with a prevailing hope that they will still more conclusively show that this is the finger of God.

Miscellaneous.

HOME.

TRICENTENARY OF THE REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND.

Two events stand out prominently in the history of Scotland as marking the epoch of the Reformation of 1560. On the 1st of August, in that year, the Scottish Estates, then assembled in their first free meeting, declared their acceptance of John Knox's "First Book of Discipline," and thus uttered, as the representatives of the Scottish people, the earliest formal protest against the spiritual tyranny of Rome. The second memorable event in the century took place on the 20th of December, 1560, when six ministers and thirty-four laymen met in Edinburgh, and laid the foundations of that Presbyterian polity which has since flourished so vigorously in the North, and has been universally recognised, under different denominations, as the distinctive type of Scottish Protestantism. These forty men constituted the first General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church; and to do honour to their memory, to recall what they were enabled to achieve, by inaugurating the work of the Reformation in their native land, and to recognise "the good hand of God" as having been upon them, by enabling them to bequeath so priceless an inheritance as that which they transmitted to all succeeding generations—numerously-attended services and meetings were held on the 20th of last month, in Glasgow, Edinburgh, London, and elsewhere. The former of the two events which we have mentioned, had been already commemorated, and the celebration was noticed by us at the time of its occurrence. We now proceed to give some account of what has just taken place in remembrance of the latter. This will best be done by presenting a report of the large, enthusiastic, and influential meeting held at Glasgow. After one o'clock on the day in question the majority of the shops in the principal streets of the city were closed, and continued shut during the remainder of the day, so that the city had quite a holiday appearance. At two o'clock nearly every church in the city was opened for Divine service, and each of them had a considerable attendance—in many instances nearly as numerous a congregation assembled as on the Lord's-day. A somewhat similar scene was presented in Edinburgh. Indeed, over the whole of Scotland, the day was more or less completely observed, and it is supposed that there was scarcely a Presbyterian Church in the country in which there was not a service suitable to the occasion. The celebration, however, was by no means confined to Presbyterians; other communions also took a prominent part in the proceedings.

THE GLASGOW CELEBRATION.

A great public demonstration took place in the evening in the City Hall, Glasgow, under the auspices of the Glasgow Protestant Laymen's Association. The services were conducted by representatives from all the Evangelical denominations in the city. "A larger audience," says a Glasgow paper, "it would have been impossible to pack into our large civic meeting place—there not being a corner in the vast building that was not completely crammed." At seven o'clock the chair was taken by JOHN HENDERSON, Esq., of Park.

After singing, reading the Scriptures and prayer—

The CHAIRMAN addressed the meeting as follows: Dear Christian Friends,—I thank you most cordially for the honour you have done me, in inviting me to preside on this great occasion. The Reformation from Popery, the tricentenary of which we are now met to celebrate, whether contemplated in its religious, political, or social aspect, was the most important event in the history of our beloved country, which gives that history a character which should fill us with the most devout gratitude to God. (Cheers.) I have only further to express the delight which I experience in presiding over such a large and influential meeting, where all the different Protestant Evangelical Churches are represented, where we have such a striking exhibition of the essential unity of those Churches in all the great doctrines of Christianity, and also of their entire sympathies and aims. And while united in our opposition to Popery as a system, because we believe it to be opposed to and condemned by the Word of God, I believe we are equally united in cherishing towards our Roman Catholic countrymen the sentiments and feelings which Christianity incalculates, and which its great Author so beautifully displayed. We desire their highest good, and we earnestly pray that they may be all soon brought to the same liberty wherewith Christ makes His people free. (Loud applause.) I now call on the Rev. Dr. Buchanan to speak. At the request of the Committee, it is desired that none of the speeches exceed twenty minutes.

The Rev. Dr. BUCHANAN (Free Church) rose and said: My text, if I may so call it, is—"The State of Scotland 300 Years Ago, and the First General Assembly"—a theme much fitter suited for a lengthened volume than for a half-hour speech. 1. First, then, instead of a free Parliament, chosen by the people, and to them next after God, responsible for its acts, the Scotland of those days was subject to the arbitrary will and despotic power of the Crown and to the still more arbitrary will and the still more despotic power of the feudal barons, whose word was law, and whose displeasure was death. 2. Again, instead of a free press, Scotland might then be truly said to have had no press at all. Although the art of printing had existed for a century previous to the Scottish Reformation, books continued to be among the rarest of all commodities in our native land. Even the monasteries and other great religious houses, where nearly alone books were to be found, were most scantily supplied. Their libraries were usually far enough, but their libraries were miserably lean. As a means of acting on the public mind, the press may, without qualification, be said to have had no existence. 3. Free discussion on the platform or any arena whatever could not co-exist with the tyranny which then prevailed both in Church and State. To question either the dogmas of the one or the policy of the other was to take the shortest way to the rack and the stake. 4. If next we ask how it fared in those times with the pulpit and with ecclesiastical assemblies, the briefest and the truest answer that could be given to the inquiry would be to say that neither the one nor the other had any place at all. Preaching, in the sense of expounding and applying the Word of God, was altogether unknown. "It is difficult for us," says the historian M'Crie, when treating of this subject, "to conceive how empty, ridiculous, and wretched these harangues were which the monks delivered for sermons. Legendary tales concerning the founder of some religious order, his wonderful sanctity, the miracles which he performed, his combats with the devil, his watchings, fastings, flagellations; the virtues of holy water, chirom, crossing, exorcism; the terrors of purgatory, and the numbers released from it by the intercession of some powerful saint—these, with low jests, table-talk, and fire-side scandal, formed the favourite topics of the preacher, and were served up to the people, instead of the pure, salutary, and sublime doctrines of the Bible." Discipline for any offence but that of refusing to fall in with the errors and abominations which the Church taught or connived at was unknown. Most of her dignitaries lived in open profligacy, and the priests followed their example. No wonder that, in such circumstances, society should have been sunk in superstition and vice. "Like priest, like people," is an old and true saying, and it was abundantly verified in these dark and disastrous times. As for free and open ecclesiastical assemblies, where false doctrines might be publicly assailed, and clerical corruptions exposed or condemned, then, as now, the Church of Rome would have none of them. Those who, like the noble Patrick Hamilton, or the eloquent, earnest, and devoted George Wishart, dared to lift their voice against those crying iniquities, and to appeal from a corrupt and apostate Church to Christ Himself, speaking in His own blessed Word, expiated their offence by being given to the flames. That was the short, summary style of argument in which Rome has in all ages chiefly relied for her supremacy; but the hour was drawing on when in Scotland it was no longer to avail. It was shrewd advice which one who had been marking the signs of the times gave to the persecuting Archbishop of St. Andrews, under whose auspices these atrocities were committed, when he said that if the Archbishop had any more heretics to burn, he had better do it in cellars or dungeons, for that "the reek"—as he called it in his good old Scotch—of these martyr fires was blowing into all men's eyes, and causing them to shed hot and angry tears.

5. If we speak of popular education as one of the grand distinctions of our own day, and turn to inquire what position it held in this kingdom previous to the Reformation, the result is only to deepen our sense of obligation for the inestimable benefits of which, under God, that great movement was the cause. Popular education in Scotland, and wherever else it exists in Christendom, dates from the Reformation. It is true, that in a few of the leading towns grammar schools had been instituted, and that three of our national universities had been founded previous to the Reformation. But the education thus supplied, such as it was, was for the few, not for the many. It was for the priesthood and for the gentry, but not for the people. John Knox, our great national reformer, was the real originator in this country of popular education. It was he who broached the grand idea, that "every several kirk have one schoolmaster appointed, so that religion and learning might go hand in hand," and that an error end might be put in this kingdom to the false and degrading maxim, that ignorance is the mother of devotion. That base dogma has been ever a favourite in the Church of Rome, but it is irreconcilable to the whole genius of the Reformation.

6. And, last of all, and chiefest of all, in speaking of the privileges, we, as a nation and people, enjoy, what shall I say of our free Bible? To the Scotland I have been briefly describing it was utterly unknown. The very priests and bishops themselves were in general wholly ignorant of it. The dedicatory address to James VI., prefixed to the first edition of the sacred volume ever printed in Scotland—an edition which issued from the press of Thomas Bassandyne and Alex. Arbuthnot at Edinburgh, in the year 1579—tells a truly significant and instructive story: "O what difference," it says, "may be seen between these days of light, when almost in every private house the book of God's law is read and understood in our vulgar language, and that age of darkness, when scarcely in a whole city (beyond the cloisters of the monks and friars) could the book of God once be found, and that in a strange tongue of Latin—not good, but mixed with barbarisms—used and read by few—and almost understood and explained by none. And when the false-named clergy of the realm, abusing the gentle nature of your highness' most noble grandfather of worthy memory, made it a capital crime, to be punished with the fire, to have read the New Testament in the vulgar language; yea, and to make them to all men more odious, as if it had been the detestable name of a pernicious sect, they were named 'New Testamenters.'" This remarkable document, while it emphatically proclaims the total ignorance of God's Word which prevailed in this country previous to the Reformation, proclaims, at the same time, not less clearly, that, for this ignorance, the Church of Rome was responsible. To the Reformation, under God, we owe it, that we are privileged to read in our own tongue the wonderful works of God—to search for ourselves, without let or hindrance, those Scriptures which testify of Jesus Christ, and in which we have eternal life. And who can over-estimate or adequately express the greatness of this blessing? Apart altogether from the saving knowledge and the spiritual benefits which through that book God confers upon us, it is the true source and origin of both our civil and religious liberty. It is as true of a nation as of an individual man—he is the freeman whom the truth makes free, and all are slaves besides. True liberty can never exist where the Bible is unknown—and hence Popery and despotism have ever been sworn and inseparable allies. On the other hand, from a people who have and love the Bible, liberty cannot be long withheld. Its mission is identical with that of Him who inspired it—it breaks every yoke, and bids the oppressed go free—it elevates men to a true sense of the dignity of their own being—in teaching them to understand and realise their position and their responsibility as under law to God—it puts a limit upon all human authority—a limit that strengthens and sanctifies law, but which saps the foundations of despotism. The Bible not only inspires the sentiment of liberty, but by the moral restraints it imposes, and the purifying influence it exerts, it qualifies men to use and enjoy liberty, it is strictly true to say that to our free Bible we are indebted not only for our free pulpit and our free ecclesiastical assemblies, but for our free system of universal popular education, our free press and platform, and our free civil Government. And what is it that has been God's great instrument in conserving, and teaching, and handing down to us this greatest of our national blessings? What but our Protestant Church, which is wholly founded on the Bible, and whose first assembly was held this day 300 years ago? Knox thoroughly comprehended how closely the existence of a free Church was bound up with the existence of a free Bible when he said, "Take from us our free assemblies and take from us the Evangel!" On that memorable day, forty men met in Edinburgh, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and took measures to organise the Protestant Presbyterian Church; of these forty men only six were ministers. But from that small beginning what immense results have followed. At this moment there are not fewer than 2,600 Presbyterian ministers in Scotland; and at this day, and after the lapse of 300 years—I am sure the esteemed brethren of other denominations now present will not take offence at my saying it—the stamp of that Presbyterian system of Church-government, and of that Calvinistic theology which Knox and his noble coadjutors impressed on the Scottish nation three centuries ago, is broader and deeper—and, to all human appearance, more indelibly engraven in the heart and mind of Scotland than ever it was at any former period of our national history. That glorious old Protestant and Presbyterian flag, which Knox and his noble coadjutors unfurled 300 years ago, has floated bravely out in many a conflict; it has stood both the battle and the breeze, but it has never been hauled down. It has been carried oftentimes through persecution's hottest fire—Nec tamen consumebatur. Like the burning bush which it bears emblazoned upon it, it is still unconsumed. Nor is it in Scotland alone that it rallies men around it. In England and Ireland, in Canada and in the United States, in far-off New Zealand and Australia, there are large and flourishing Protestant and Presbyterian Churches, that proudly trace their origin to Scotland, and to that memorable meeting of the General Assembly at Edinburgh which we are here to celebrate, and from which, as Churches, we ourselves have sprung.

Rev. Mr. M'DERMID (Reformed Presbyterian Church) next addressed the meeting on the "Supremacy and Sufficiency of the Word of God." After observing that the appropriateness of this subject for a little consideration on such a great commemorative gathering as this would be apparent to every one, he proceeded to ask—Was there in this world any authority supreme, exclusive, infallible—any authority before which, in religious matters, all men were commanded to bow? Was there anywhere upon this earth of ours a standard to be regarded as unerring and supreme in the decision of all questions that came within its scope? Was there under God's heavens a rule that could claim the right of regulating and governing the human conscience in those matters that every one felt to be the most sacred and the most spiritual? The Reformers asserted that such an authority existed—not in the State or in the Church—but only in those sacred writings that had been given to us by inspiration of God, and which we were warranted in regarding as verily the Divine Word.

A portion of the 19th Psalm was then sung by the meeting, after which Principal Fairbairn (Free Church) engaged in prayer.

The Rev. ALEX. FRAZER (Congregationalist) addressed the meeting on "The Influence of the Reformation on our Social Condition." After briefly describing the state of Scotland before the dawn of the morning of the Reformation, the reverend gentleman went on to say that, while the great object contemplated by the leaders of the Scottish Reformation was deliverance from the crushing despotism and deadly errors of Rome, and the restoration of Christianity, in its unity of doctrine and simplicity of worship, the result of their efforts went much further. It gave that stimulus to the human mind, and liberty of thought, without which there could have been no civil progress.

The Rev. Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD (Established Church) then rose and said: The last topic on the programme of speeches has been assigned to me. It is "The Unity of Protestantism." But before briefly addressing you upon it let me preface my remarks by returning thanks to the Church of Rome. I thank that Church for all she has done in time past to advance the civilisation of this country and the world. To her we owe learned universities founded in times of deepest ignorance. Many an august cathedral and beautiful parish church, erected in the midst of almost heathen darkness—many a safe and calm retreat provided by her in lawless times for the oppressed and the afflicted, and for the undisturbed pursuits of literature, science, and of philosophy; and to her we owe also many a saintly man who was a light and a life to savage chieftains and to barbarous nations. I do not wish to forget the mercy of God to us by means of the Church of Rome, through that Mighty Spirit who worketh how, and when, and where He pleaseth, but this night I specially return my hearty thanks to Roman Catholics for the blessed Reformation—the last and crowning gift of all, without which every other gift would have perished from the world. Let us not forget that to Roman Catholics themselves we owe the Reformation. It was no profane heathen, or old Jew, or infidel Turk, who opened the prison doors to the Evangelists, and set them free to revive and reform Europe, but it was the Roman Catholics—Huss, Jerome, Luther, Wickliffe, Melancthon, Zwingle, Calvin, and Knox. We thank God for these men—for their honesty, their courage, and their zeal. The very fact of the Reformation by such men, and at such a time, seems to me to vindicate its absolute necessity. The Church of Rome must indeed have become intolerable from its corruptions when the idea to reform it was entertained by the best of her priesthood and of her people. And now, after three centuries, we are warranted in believing that the Reformation and its results shall never perish from the world. It cannot be

"That this most famous stream in bogs and sands
Should perish, and to evil and to good
Be lost for ever."

Who believes now that Protestantism can perish? Who believes that it can perish out of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Prussia, above all, out of Britain, with her colonial kingdoms; or out of North America, from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific? Who can believe that Spain and Portugal now furnish the types of religious thought which shall prevail in the Europe of the future; that Tipperary shall be the teacher of Scotland and of England, or the Brazils and Mexico, of the United States, and of British America? One of the most scholarly, refined, intellectual, and eloquent of perverts to the Church of Rome—a man of whom they are justly proud, expresses his belief in all the miracles of the Church of Rome. Mr. Newman says: "At Rome there is the true cross, the crib of Bethlehem, and the chair of St. Peter. Portions of the crown of thorns are kept at Paris; the holy coat is shown at Treves; the winding sheet at Turin. Crucifixes have bowed the head to suppliants, and Madonnas have bent their eyes on assembled crowds. St. Januarius' blood liquefies periodically at Naples." Can this credulity form the type of the future belief of nations? He again says, speaking of the glories of Mary: "What shall be the fit accompaniment of one whom the Almighty has deigned to make, not his servant, not his intimate, but his superior, to whom he owes his life?" Is this to be the type of the future faith of nations? We have no cause to fear the progress of Protestantism during the next three centuries. Can Rome be so confident of her success during the next half century? In order to secure the permanence of Protestantism, we demand only what the nations of the earth must soon obtain—civil and religious liberty, education, and an open Bible. To secure the downfall of Popery we ask no more. But we are taunted by the want of unity amongst Protestants. It is said that the results of the Reformation have been a failure. But what kind of unity, let me ask, is demanded or expected? Is it the unity of a living Church or of a dead churchyard? The unity of life, with its necessary diversities of thought and action, or the unity of death, head to head, and heel to heel? For what is a man but a dead person, when he makes another person a substitute for his conscience, his reason, and his will? Which unity is desired? The unity of life or of death? I think we can be at no loss to determine in what that unity consists, which is alone worth striving after, worth living and dying for. It is the unity of life and character—the unity of love to Christ and our fellow-men, through faith in Himself, the Head of all and Brother of all. It was for this unity alone Jesus prayed when He desired "that all might be one." Now, Protestantism did not itself profess to secure this unity; it professes only to obtain for men the means by which, under God, this unity can ever be realised. It first of all protested against a system whose whole tendency was to destroy or prevent the real unity of spiritual life through faith in Christ Jesus, by substituting for it a fictitious unity. It protested against the authority, as a rule of faith, of unwritten traditions, whether they professed to have come from Christ or His apostles, and which according to the doctrine of Rome ought to be received with equal reverence and with equal faith, as the written Word of God. It protested also against Church authority and infallibility as opposed to the right of private judgment, or rather the duty of personal responsibility and the eternal necessity for our seeing the truth for ourselves before it can be truth to us. Having thus got an unshackled Bible and a responsible soul, it protested against the crowd of priests, sacraments, saints, penances, purgatory, mariolatry, and things innumerable which concealed from the worshipper, rather than revealed to him, his Father, his Saviour, and his Sanctifier—a present help to all who seek Him. And in this protest Protestants are, I take it, much more united than Papists would desire, for with united heart and soul in thus protesting against Rome are 20,000,000 of the most educated, most prosperous, most intelligent, and freest people of the nations of the earth. But while Protestantism professes only to secure the means of unity, I ask with confidence whether the grand result has not been attained in an incomparably greater degree through this means than through the Papacy? Only compare the faith in Jesus Christ as a living

Saviour, and the reality of love to Him and reverence for His laws—the Christian character, in short, of the clergy, the laity, and the families in Protestant and Popish countries, and in which will you find the greatest amount of this true unity? Now, if the theory of Protestantism fail from its nature to produce this spiritual unity, how, let me ask you, does Rome propose to attain this object? By what better process is the schism to be healed between man and God and man and man? Is it by concealing the Word of God? Is it by trampling upon human freedom and denying the holiest rights of conscience? Is it by the tyranny of priests and of kings—of the Antonellis and the Bombas of Europe? Is it by the horrors of the Inquisition, and by bloody persecutions—never confessed, never repented of by Rome—never confessed with shame or with sorrow by any of her popes or by any of her prelates. Is it by such means that unity is to be produced? Lest men should wander in the wrong path, their eyes, forsooth, must be put out, and a priest sent to lead them by the hand. Lest they should hear evil, their ears must be stuffed, and a dumb priest sent to instruct them. To Rome Papal we may exclaim as the old British chief exclaimed to Rome Imperial—" Ubi solitudinem, faciunt pacem appellant."—"They make a solitude, and call it peace." We maintain, therefore, that our Protestant congregations possess more than exists in all the world besides of the only kind of unity which mortal and responsible men can possess, and which enlightened Christians desire. But I cannot help expressing, before concluding, my unfeigned sorrow that we have so poorly used the glorious liberties which God has obtained for us as Christians by means of the Reformation. We are not to measure ourselves by any standards found in Roman Catholic countries. To us much more has been given than to them, and from us much more will be required; and if so, have we not shamefully come short in attaining that unity which we all recognise as our true and perfect ideal. We have loved Protestantism more than Christianity; our sect more than Protestantism, and ourselves most of all. But I hope better times have dawned upon us during this last half century, in which we have experienced a wonderful revival of the Church at home, and her extension by missions abroad. May God grant a greater and fuller outpouring of His Spirit on all Churches, Roman Catholic and Protestant, that long before the next three centuries all may be one in Christ, and that the whole world may unite as we do this night in thanking Almighty God for the blessings of the Reformation—"Not by might, nor by power, but my Spirit, saith the Lord."

The great assemblage next engaged in praise, after which Dr. Robson (United Presbyterian), offered prayer; and after the customary voices of thanks, the proceedings were closed with the Benediction.

Literary Correspondence.

Belfast, December, 1860.

Dear Sirs,—The Bishop of Cork having done me the honour to send me the letter which I forward, it at once occurred to me that it should not be lost to the public, and I have secured his Lordship's consent to its publication in your journal. The questions are so admirably put, that they lead on to the answers which should be given. I am not to offer the replies, which should rather come from the divines of Germany. In this country we have been in the habit, as the first step in religion, of attaining a conviction that the Bible is a revelation from God. This we reach by the same sort of mixed evidence as sways us in the common affairs of life—as that, for example, which assures us that Dr. Dorner is one of the great theologians of Germany, and that Dr. Fitzgerald is one of the great divines of the Church of Ireland. We arrive at it partly by external, but mainly by internal proof—that is, by the wonderful adaptation of this revelation to the facts of our moral nature, which facts can be gathered by induction and enunciated. Having attained such a conviction, we have a means both of quickening our souls into life (always by the operation of the Spirit of God, who uses the truths of the Word as an instrument) and of testing that life. Such is the process according to the great majority of British divines, who, however, have always allowed that it is only the theologian who is expected or required to state the process. The common Christian acts the process in his own way, without being at all able or disposed to analyse and express it.

I must not enter farther into this subject. But since I am writing, I may take the opportunity of stating that the view which I took in my letter to the German Churches, of the effect of the "Essays and Reviews," is receiving confirmation every day. My statement was that the movement must end, logically and historically, in a system of complete religious negation, analogous to, though not identical with, that of Strauss and Feuerbach, in Germany. The Westminster Review sees this, and is rejoicing in the aid it is now receiving from the divines of the Church of England. The article in that journal for October last is a most significant one. The writer rejoices that such "opinions are an open question, and may be boldly avowed and usefully taught within the very precinct and sanctuary of the Church." He exults in the fact that these professors, tutors, principals, and masters, still hold their chairs and retain their influence. No authorised rebuke has been put forward. He sees that all "attempts to show that these opinions are in accordance with Scripture, the Articles, or the Liturgy of the Church, have little practical value, and do no small practical harm. He tells them plainly that this recent adaptation by leaders in the Church of England is of all others the most "suicidal." He insists that the principles adopted be "pushed to their legitimate consequences," and announces what these must be. "When the public once begin to read their Bibles in that spirit, they will soon cease to read them at all, and the Hebrew Scriptures will take their place upon the bookshelf of the learned beside the Arabian and Sanskrit poets." "The simple believer must find all the bases of his creed undermined, the whole external authority on which it rests swept away," while "the mysterious book of truth fades into an old collection of poetry and legend, and the scheme of redemption, in which he has been taught to live and die, turns out to be a demoralising invention of men." The writer speaks with becoming scorn of the notion that men will retain their reverence for Christianity and the Bible after they have ceased to believe in their supernatural origin. "Our new teachers point out that their idol is but wood and stone, and wish mankind to retain it on the altar for its beauty and its age. They discredit the veracity of the oracles, and think mankind will still consult them for the poetry of the responses." He believes that Mr. Temple will not just tell his boys that a portion of the Bible is "a late legend formed on a misconception." But when a pious and learned divine, shaking his head, bewails some doubts as to the truth of Scripture, his less deliberate hearers soon cease to have any doubts at all."

Encouraged by the aid thus furnished, the Westminster Review school are now becoming very bold. In particular, I have reason to know that they are seeking to get all important educational institutions fitted to sway the learned youth of the rising generation filled with teachers who belong to their school, or who are likely, consciously or unconsciously, to help on their views. I have also means of knowing that the party espousing the opinions of the "Essays and Reviews" is just forming a New Reformation Society, of which you will hear more very soon. I am convinced that many will join it without seeing where all this is to issue. I perceive that the essayists are being commended for their candour. I have to complain of their want of candour. There is quite as much reticence in their statements as in the "Tracts for the Times," which did for Popery in the past age what these essays are doing for Deism in the present age—that is, leading the youths who follow them half-way, where some will stop and spend their lives wretchedly in ministering in a Church whose Articles (as they feel in the depths of their hearts) condemn them; while others, the more eager and sincere, will plunge down into the abyss which the Westminster Review school has prepared for them. Let those who may be seduced to follow them put themselves, ere they take any decisive step, this simple question—What religion has been left us by these men, for me and for my friends, for men in their strength, and women in their weakness, for maidens and little children, for the rich in their temptations, and the poor in their trials, for the self-righteous man in his pride, and the outcast in their degradation? But I have trespassed longer than I intended on your space.

Yours,

JAMES M'COSE.

Palace, Cork, Nov. 22, 1860.

Dear Sir,—Some one has sent me an Occasional Paper of the Evangelical Alliance, of Theological Correspondence with Germany. Though I am not a member of the Alliance, I have been much interested by its contents.

Would it not be a vital point to have an explanation of what test, if any, Dr. Dörner supplies of the difference (p. 5) between the testimonium Spiritus Sancti and enthusiasm. [See Evangelical Christendom, vol. xiv., p. 177.]

If there be no test at all, but all reduced to a self-evidencing light, here is certainly an end of religious controversy. Those that have it cannot be refuted, and those that have it not cannot be made to have it.

If the test be, as I suspect, the suitability of the Gospel scheme to our wants and wishes, is not this—

1. An A priori test.
2. Yielding only a regulative truth—i.e., showing only that such a scheme is necessary to be believed, if our wants and wishes are to be satisfied, but not at all that they are to be satisfied.
3. Assuming the correctness of our estimate of the true wants and reasonable wishes of human nature.
4. Assigning the same value to all books and discourses propounding the Gospel scheme as to Scripture.
5. Destroying all rational interpretation of Scripture, because often the greatest comfort is brought to the mind by texts in vernacular translations, of which the (critical) sense is wholly mistaken.

Certainly, if German theology is to be of any use to us, it must learn to speak plain, and in a "tongue understood by the people." We are plain, matter-of-fact people, bring things to short issues, ask terribly direct questions, and are impatient of obscure answers.

The question that the mass of the people will be soon asking is, Why are we to believe, as a matter of fact, that Jesus Christ was raised from the dead?

To this our divines used to answer, Because we can show you, by the proper evidence of matters of fact, that He really was so raised.

Have the German divines any different or better answer to give?

I don't think the English will be satisfied by being told, "You should believe it, because it will do you good to believe it;" and they will always be suspecting that those who give such an answer do not really believe it themselves.

As far as I can judge from the New Testament, the apostles answered the question proposed in the same way as our divines.

If we are on a wrong bottom, the sooner we know it the better.

It seems to me—

1. That the main truths of Revelation are matters of fact.

2. That matters of fact are not—

(a) Self-evident.

(b) Capable of scientific proof a priori.

(c) Proved true by merely showing that they ought to have happened.

If the self-evidencing light, &c., is to submit to be brought to the test of historical criticism, and finally tried by that, then, what is the difference between that and the old position?

I have searched many German volumes to get an intelligible answer to these questions, but have never found one.

Our divines believe, as a matter of revelation, in the inward operation of the Holy Spirit; but they think themselves bound to be able to prove "counsels" to be "good," "thoughts, holy," "works, just," and opinions true, BEFORE they can be justified in saying that they proceed from His influence or their own minds.

Can I say, "I feel that this thought proceeds from the Holy Spirit, and therefore I know it to be just and true?"

If so, how can I presume to try His testimony by an internal test?

Pray pardon this long intrusion, and believe me to be,

Yours faithfully,

WM. CORK.

What Dr. Dorner says about the pre-eminence of the ethical over the physical in the scheme of the universe seems very just, and what Bishop Butler has endeavoured to prove and illustrate by matter of fact.

THE KORAN AS EVIDENTIAL TO THE BIBLE.

The Testimony borne by the Koran to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. Second Edition. Published by the North India Tract and Book Society. Allahabad: Printed at the Mission Press. 1860.

WHEN Christianity became recognised as an element of power in the Roman Empire, and the old systems of idolatry prevalent at that time began to lose their hold over their followers, there arose two great divisions in the Christian Church as to the mode in which the assault against Paganism was to be maintained. Many able Christian writers considered that Paganism retained its sway by means of Satanic intervention, and that the spread of its doctrines and practices in the ancient times was owing to the power and inspiration of evil spirits, while on the other hand, other writers maintained that there was much truth even of deep Christian significance beneath the idolatrous rites of heathenism, and that the unveiling of their hidden mysteries would bring the heathen world to recognise the Divine origin and truth of Christianity.

Now these two parties are in existence, though under different designations, at the present day. Indeed, at any age these divisions must prevail among the disputants on the Christian side. In these discussions in the early times of Christianity there was error on the one side and on the other, and perhaps, also, truth in nearly equal parts on both. The Christian world has, however, learnt important lessons from those early controversies, and it is unlikely that the mysticisms of the Alexandrine school will again "darken the stars" in the firmament of the Church.

The latter line of argument is the conciliatory one, and a conciliatory mode of setting forward the truth, provided there be no concession to falsehood, is, without doubt, the more likely to be successful. Reason is in many important respects the "candle of the Lord within" the heart of man; and from the deductions even of unenlightened intellects, an able champion for the religion of Christ may derive the premises from which he may draw the conclusions that the Bible is the Word of God, and the religion of the Crucified Redeemer the only religion of the world which can with truth claim God for its author and heaven for its end.

To an ordinary reader of the present day the pamphlet which we have referred to in our foot-note presents little that would amuse or entertain. It might, perhaps, be deemed by him tedious, and thrown aside among the number of those pamphlets which lie unread and unheeded; for although our age is said to be utilitarian, the bulk of its literature savours rather of the "dulce" than the "utile," and the majority of readers look to books rather for amusement than for instruction.

It is, however, a good sign to see our mission presses in India beginning to issue publications such as this, and we do regard the pamphlet in question as a valuable addition to the works on the Mohammedan controversy.

Sale's Koran is to be found in almost every private library which can boast of upwards of 200 volumes. There is a natural curiosity to peruse a book which is owned by millions as the inspired Word of God. But we have found very few indeed who have read a dozen pages of the work; curiosity is soon sated, and the book is restored to its place, to rank among the long line of those which, so far, the ordinary class of readers are concerned, might be classified as "printed, but not read."

But the Koran does possess certain attractions, and though we may, perhaps, consider its style rather heavy in general, there are passages that rise to the level of poetry, and it affords us an insight into the manners and customs of that remarkable people among whom Mohammed arose.

Mohammed was one of those enthusiasts so frequently to be met with in the East, who, but for the times in which he lived, and the prevalence of idolatry alike among Christians and heathen, would probably have soon been forgotten, or remembered only as the founder of one of the many petty sects with which the East abounds. He had decided abilities in many respects, but in many others was not distinguished from the common mass. He was ignorant of what we now regard as the first elements of education, could neither read nor write—a circumstance which, though it might at first sight have appeared fatal to the success of his enterprise, his ingenuity made use of as a strong proof of his Divine mission. How could an illiterate man, unless by inspiration, produce a work of such power, containing passages which were at the time confessed superior to any in the literature of the nation? We have in a previous article expressed our belief, in part at least, in his sincerity. He did not himself possess an accurate knowledge of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, but he well knew that the Christians had departed from the primal truth of those Scriptures—viz., that God would not “give his glory to another,” and that idols were an abomination in His sight, while at the same time they maintained that He whom they professed to follow and obey had promised to send one who “should lead them into all truth.” It was not, therefore, surprising that Mohammed should imagine that he was to be that great teacher, and that his mission was to bring back the world to acknowledge the unity of the Supreme God. This is the more probable as many of the so-called Christians in that day held that the Trinity was composed of God, Jesus, and Mary, and the operations and work of the Holy Spirit had been lost sight of in the Christian theology of that period.

The Jews do not appear to have acted with candour towards Mohammed, nor, on several occasions, were they willing to dispute with him on certain points out of their own Scriptures. Naturally, therefore, he imagined that they kept back from him parts of their Scriptures, an assertion often repeated in the Koran, and which, owing to the character of his assailants, and his own ignorance, would not have been easily banished from the prophet's mind.

The method of argument adopted by the author of “The Testimony Borne by the Koran,” &c., is thus stated by him in his preface: “The single object in view has been to take advantage of the concessions, so frequent in the Corân, of the inspiration and value of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, and press them to their legitimate consequences from the stand-point of the Mahometan himself. Wherefore, avoiding all controversial matter, I have sought to prove that the believer in the Corân is bound to be equally a believer in the Old and in the New Testaments as now extant, and to warn the Mussulmans of the present day against incurring the doom pronounced, even in the Corân, against those who disbelieve and reject the previous Scriptures.”

The Mussulmans continually assert that the Jewish and Christian Scriptures have been corrupted, and therefore that their evidence is not to be relied on. But this assertion is nowhere made in the Koran. It maintains, indeed, that Jews and Christians conveniently concealed much, that they distorted the true sense of Scripture, that they quoted passages without regarding their context; but there is no ground from the Koran to assert that by the “concealing” of passages is meant their “erasure” from the MSS. possessed by either Jews or Christians. On the contrary, our Sacred Scriptures are said in the Koran to have been “revealed” by God, to be “inspired.” The law of Moses is called “a light and direction to mankind,” “a guide and an admonition to men of understanding heart,” that those who walk after the precepts of the Law and of the Gospel are verily blessed, while those who reject these revelations shall be burned in the fire. What can be stronger, for instance, than the following passage? (Sur. v. 74, &c.): “If they who have received the Scriptures believe, and fear God, we will surely expiate their sins from them, and we will lead them into gardens of pleasure; and if they observe the law and the Gospel, and the other Scriptures, which have been sent down unto them from their Lord [or rather, “and that which hath been revealed unto them from their Lord”] they shall surely eat of good things, both from above them and from under their feet [i.e., blessings both of heaven and earth]. Among them there are people who act uprightly; but how evil is that which many of them do work. . . . Say, O ye who have received the Scriptures [“O people of the Book”], ye are not grounded on anything, until ye observe the law and the Gospel, and that which hath been sent down unto you from your Lord.”

The Mohammedans, in general, are strongly prejudiced against the Bible, and speak of it in terms of opprobrium; it is, therefore, of the highest importance to show to them that, in acting in such a manner, they depart from the usage, and put themselves in direct opposition to the teaching, of their prophet.

Briefly the argument may be summed up thus: There is no question but that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were extant long before the time of Mohammed. From these Scriptures Mohammed quotes as from Divine revelation; they are praised and commended by him; the Koran is called "an attestation of the former Scriptures," and to these former Scriptures Mohammed appealed in defence of his positions. No doubt, indeed, that he was wrong in this appeal, and that the Scriptures did not favour his pretensions; no doubt, too, that a stop was finally put to the arguments of the Jews by the appeal to the sword; yet, with all this, the testimony borne by the Koran to the inspiration of those Scriptures is not the less valuable, and we must own that Mohammed had grounds at first for suspecting the honesty of his opponents, while we believe that, afterwards, he was little solicitous whether his tenets agreed with those taught in their Scriptures or not. Had he maintained that those books were corrupted, why should he have appealed to their authority? We can fairly press on the more enlightened Mohammedans the difficulty that, had the Jews and Christians really been guilty of corrupting the Scriptures, which were committed to them to keep, there would be little doubt but that substantial proofs would have been given of such corruptions by the Mussulmans of that day, seeing that in a few years they had overrun vast districts of Asia and other countries, and had thereby in their power numbers of MSS. from which the charge, if true, could have been proven.

Such is the argument laid before the Mussulmans of North India, and it is one which must have great weight with an inquiring mind. One fact which will be greatly in favour of this book is its thorough impartiality. All the passages that refer to the Bible are given, no matter what their import may be.

We might go further, but we forbear. The testimony to Jesus given in the Koran is of great interest. His divinity, it is true, is denied in several passages; but yet we almost think that He is placed on a higher footing than Mohammed himself. He is confessed to have been immaculate, to have been born out of the course of nature, and is called the Word of God. He is said to have wrought miracles and done mighty works. Short of His divinity, what might not be deduced respecting him from the Koran? And even the question is, whether on the point of His Divinity the Koran is not self-contradictory.

REVIEWS, PAMPHLETS, AND SERMONS.

British and Foreign Evangelical Review. No. XXXIV.

THIS number of one of the very best theological reviews published, is worthy of special notice. It contains some articles of various degrees of excellence, but all valuable. Of these five are reprints from American reviews, and two are original; one on "Zwingle and the Doctrine of the Sacraments," and the other on "Tholuck's Commentary on the Gospel of St. John." The first of the American articles is an able defence of Calvinism, founded on Dr. Samuel Baird's work, entitled "The First Adam and the Second;" the second is a refutation of Dr. Edward Beecher's fanciful and absurd theory of the sinfulness of the human race in a pre-existent state, which he gravely propounds to solve the mysteries attendant on their present state as depraved and responsible creatures. The speculations of Dr.

Beecher are to our minds indicative alike of the want of reverential deference to the Word of God and of philosophic sobriety of thought, and are both refuted and in a becoming manner rebuked by his reviewer. We pass over the two next articles, to notice that on "New England Theology," which gives, in the main, a fair and lucid account of the early history of the theological system which has acquired this descriptive designation. We agree with the writer when he says that, "as a truly Catholic theology, its history takes in the most divinely patient sufferers and the most heroic actors;" but we think that he neither does justice to the character of Roger Williams, nor to "the enlightened sentiments" of the present age, when he supposes that they will justify the severity with which he was treated by the Massachusetts colony. The fact is, Roger Williams was in advance of his fellow-colonists. They founded their government on the principles of intolerance which obtained in the old country, and which, unhappily, they carried with them. He revolted against them, and publicly professed doctrines both of civil government and Church polity which they were not prepared to adopt. This was the core and essence of his offence.

The Racking of Anne Askew. By J. G. NICHOLS, F.S.A. This is a worthy and successful attempt to establish the historical fact that Anne Askew was tortured on the rack. It has been denied by Jardine, in his "Reading on the use of Torture;" by Dr. Lingard, in his "History of England;" and by Julia Kavanagh, in her "Women of Christianity." It is easily understood why Romanists should labour to discredit it, but the evidence adduced in this pamphlet is conclusive.—Is 1867 the Year of the Crisis? By Partridge and Co. This brochure is designed to show that the interpretation of unfulfilled prophecy by Elliot and Dr. Cumming is altogether untrustworthy and unsound. The writer is content to demolish their theory without constructing one of his own; though he evidently belongs to the school of the Futurists.—Roman Catholic Schools: what is Taught in them, and who are the Teachers. The design of the writer is to awaken attention to the fact that large sums of national money are spent in imbuing the minds of the young with Popery. He shows that the Privy Council grants to Roman Catholic Schools are laid out, not in providing a secular education, according to the intention of the Legislature, and the accepted obligation of the recipients, but in teaching the dogmas of Popery; not in making "intelligent citizens," but "good Catholics." It is right that this perversion should be exposed, and if persisted in, it will justify the withholding of the grants. Men who break faith with the Government ought not to be supported by the public purse.

The Signs of the Times. By B. EVANS, D.D.; and The World at the Tribunal of the Church. By SAMUEL G. GREEN, B.A.

THESE are two admirable sermons delivered before an Association of the Nonconformist Churches in Yorkshire. They are replete with large-minded and judicious observations on the course of public events and the relation of Christians to them. The former of the two discourses is especially to be thus characterised, while the latter is a striking and somewhat novel, and, at the same time, scriptural view of the subject of which it treats.

Two Charges: one to the People and one to the Clergy; delivered at the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in July, 1860. By Rev. S. D. WADDY, President.

EXERCISING forbearance on account of what is intensely Methodistic, and disclaiming agreement in what is, therefore, so purely denominational in these charges, there is much sound advice, judicious counsel, and scriptural admonition in them suited to the clergy and the people of all Christian Churches. The fruit of much experience and observation is apparent on every page, and the whole is expressed in sober, straightforward, and forcible language, not unworthy of being imitated as a model, especially by the young ministers to whom so much of it was addressed.

The Vicarious Death of Christ the Fruit and Display of God's Love. Two Sermons. By Rev. H. H. BRAMISH, M.A.

THESE are discourses sound in doctrine, forcible in argument, rich in Evangelical sentiment, and well adapted at such a time to establish Christian minds in the good old truths of the kingdom.

Life of Count Zinzendorf. (Le Comte Zinzendorf.) By FELIX BOVET. Paris: Grassart, 1860. Two volumes.

AN admirably-written book, on a most deeply-interesting subject. The features of Count Zinzendorf's Christian character, which Professor Bovet depicts with most delight and sympathy, are those by which that truly pious and devoted nobleman anticipated, to a certain degree, the days and spirit of the Evangelical Alliance. The work exhibits the results of much research, without pedantry; it is full of comprehensive views, lofty thoughts, and brilliant passages, without affectation; and it brings the reader into the closest contact with the motives, feelings, and every-day life of one of those men of God who are heroes even to their valets de chambre, and this it does without the wordiness, the trivial and useless matter, which disfigures so many of our English biographies.

The Sunday at Home: A Family Magazine for Sabbath Reading. Vol. for 1860. London: The Religious Tract Society.

THIS admirable volume deserves a place in every Christian household. Its papers are so diversified—sometimes didactic and sometimes narrative, sometimes grave and sometimes lively, sometimes biographical and sometimes imaginative; and they are all written in a tone so theologically correct, and at the same time so unsectarian, that they are fitted to conciliate candid and Christian readers of almost all classes, and to do them good.

The Year of Grace: A History of the Ulster Revival of 1859. By the Rev. W. GIBSON. Second Edition. Edinburgh: A. Elliot. Pp. 406.

WE regard it as one of the felicities of the great Revival in the North of Ireland, that the history of it has fallen into the hands of one so competent to write it judiciously as Professor Gibson. He has treated the subject so wisely and well, with so much copiousness, and yet with such discrimination, with such accuracy and detail, and yet with views so generous and comprehensive, and withal in so catholic and Evangelical a spirit, that his volume, besides its present interest, possesses a permanent historical value. It will go down to posterity as a record of one of the most marvellous chapters in the modern annals of the Church, and be consulted by a future generation, just as when we want to acquaint ourselves with the great American Revival, in the time of President Edwards, we turn to the pages of that incomparable man.

The Sixty-eighth Psalm, as Prophetic of Messiah and his Church. A Translation from the Hebrew, with Explanatory Notes. By a Septuagenarian. London: Bagster and Sons.

THERE are two points which might tend to disarm criticism in a notice of this little book; the one, that it is the production of an old man; the other, that it seems to be the production of a Christian. And if it were only of the ordinary character of such productions, common-place and flat, we would gladly consign it to oblivion, out of respect for the age of its author. But the interests of truth forbid such a proceeding on our part. It abounds with too many perversions of Holy Writ to be altogether passed over in silence, and its author seems to have some curious notion of the state of the believing dead before Christ, similar to that set forth in the apocryphal gospel of Nicodemus. Into this question we will not enter, but we must say that the author of this little work is not qualified for making a good translation from the Hebrew. He is one of those who still hold to the exploded notion of reading Hebrew without the points. He mistakes a third person feminine for a third person masculine, and is indifferent to all rules of construction. Aladdin's lamp did not, when rubbed, produce more wonderful fictions than does this psalm when examined by our critic, and both alike are "the baseless fabric of a vision."

Service and Suffering. Memoirs of the Life of the Rev. John Morison, D.D., LL.D. By the Rev. J. KENNEDY, M.A., F.R.G.S. London: Ward and Co. Pp. 324.

THE subject of this memoir was a man and a Christian minister, worthy to be held in the loving remembrance of his contemporaries, and to have his example placed for their imitation before those that come after him. He laboured much, and much he suffered while he laboured in the Lord's service. His biographer has well drawn his portrait, and successfully; showing, in a striking manner, how much may be accomplished by active pastoral toil, and by the sedentary occupation of the editor and the author, under the constant pressure of disease, and amidst the pains and distresses of incurable affliction. "Soldier of Christ, well done!"

Lights of the Morning; or, Meditations for Every Day of the Ecclesiastical Year. From the German of FREDERIC ARNDT. With a Preface by the Rev. W. C. MAGEE, D.D. Advent to Whitsuntide. London: Bell and Daldy. Pp. 426.

THESE meditations—without being characterised by any striking properties—are pious, simple, and devout, and are pervaded with an Evangelical spirit. Dr. Magee's Preface cautions the reader against German theology, but makes an exception in favour of certain divines, such as Hengstenberg, Stier, and others. With regard to the first of these, however, although he stands opposed to the neologians, there is just now an apprehension, of which Dr. Magee does not seem to be aware, that his theological tendencies are at least Puseyite, and his active sympathies Papistical. Nor can we speak of his views on the interpretation of prophecy with commendation.

England's Daybreak. Narratives of the Reformation during the Fourteenth and following Centuries. By the Author of "Come to the Supper," &c. With a Preface by Rev. E. H. BICKERSTETH, M.A. London: Seeley and Co. Pp. 334.

IT is well that the narratives told with simplicity and interest in these pages should ever be kept alive in the memories and present to the eyes of British Protestants. Christian parents may, with much advantage, put them into the hands of their children. And they are written in so easy and captivating a style, that the youngest may read them with delight.

Evangelical Alliance.

INVITATION TO UNITED PRAYER.*

ISSUED BY THE COUNCIL OF THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, NEW YEAR'S-DAY, 1861.

ELIJAH'S PRAYER FOR RAIN.

IT has been our happiness for several recent years to address an annual appeal to our fellow-Christians on the subject of United Prayer for the Holy Spirit. In renewing this appeal now, there is no need of any formal definition or systematic defence of prayer, but, says a master in Israel, "as men of law look into reports of cases in order to become well acquainted with points on which they are consulted, and men of science study facts to furnish data for their experiments, so men of prayer should search the Books of Inspiration, to see how saints of old used to pray, that they, like them, may have power with God." With this view, dear brethren, let us seek fresh strength to our faith and fresh encouragement to perseverance in prayer, by studying the narrative given in 1 Kings xviii., 41—45—"And Elijah said unto Ahab, get thee up, and drink; for there is a sound of abundance of rain. So Ahab went up to eat and to drink. And Elijah went up to the top of Carmel; and he cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees, and said to his servant, go up now, look towards the sea. And he went up, and looked, and said, there is nothing. And he said, go again seven times. And it came to pass at the seventh time, that he said, behold, there ariseth a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand. And he said, go up, say to Ahab, prepare thy chariot, and get thee down, that the rain stop thee not."

* This address is not published separately, as in former years.

On some accounts, this passage may seem at first to be inappropriate as the topic of a New Year's address, because the scene it pictures is so entirely out of keeping with the bleak sights and sounds of the English landscape now around us. The images of Scripture drawn from natural objects may affect us in one season more than in another, and the mere poetry of the rain-storm may strike us more when the earth is covered with the glare of summer sunshine, than when it lies under the shroud of winter snow. But truth is never out of season, and at the present time we only call attention to what, in this passage, reminds us of truth the most momentous and sublime—truth in relation to the Holy Spirit.

We can easily see why the descending influences of the Spirit are called "showers of blessing." Rain is not more essential to the earth than these influences are to the Church. As there can be no substitute for rain, there can be no substitute for these. No human pleadings can be, for how can man's voice accomplish the creative work of God? No plans of usefulness can be, whatever their perfection of instrumental fitness; not even the Word can be, for it is not the power of the Word that can raise the dead, or revive the living soul, but only the power of the Spirit through the Word. This blessing, which would bring all other blessings in its train, the Hearer of prayer is ready to bestow in an abundance of which your receptive capacity is to be the only limit; this grand, unfulfilled prophecy of the New Testament is waiting for your prayer to fulfil it. "Ask ye of the Lord rain in the time of the latter rain, so the Lord shall make bright clouds, and give them showers of rain, to every one grass in the field."* Ask, only ask in Christ's name, for that best of all gifts which He, when on earth, made the subject of most precious promises and most emphatic instruction, and soon will you be able to silence all scorners, as did the Pentecostal preacher when he said, "This Jesus hath God raised up. . . . Therefore, being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear."† "Though God had said before," remarks Bishop Hall, "I will send rain upon the earth, yet Elijah must pray for what God doth promise. The promises of the Almighty do not discharge our prayers, but suppose them. Our petitions are included in His decrees."

To be allowed to take part in prayer for this Divine rain is a great honour, and we feel it to be so. "This honour have all the saints," but it is really shared by none besides. "Elijah said to Ahab, get thee up, eat and drink, for there is the sound of abundance of rain. So Ahab went up to eat and drink, but Elijah went up to Mount Carmel." It was just like the prophet; his own keen, ironical spirit glances in the sentence; it was only another way of saying to the worldly king, "Go, enjoy this world's good things; it is all thou art fit for. The land is waiting for a blessing, therefore thou art not wanted ; something great is about to be done, and therefore thou art in the way ; go, fulfil thine own vocation, eat and drink, for to-morrow thou shalt die !” Ahab might have congratulated himself on his freedom from the importunity of the prophet’s inconvenient zeal. He might have been glad that he had no invitation to join the prophet’s prayer. But he was not invited, only because Divine grace had not qualified him for so great an honour. When, beloved brethren, we ask you to become intercessors for sinful men, and to join in prayer for those showers which shall make “the wilderness rejoice, and the desert blossom as the rose,” we own you as the friends of the Saviour, and the benefactors of the world. We could not offer you greater honour ; and, on the other hand, to suppose that we ought not to address to you such an invitation, because from your spiritual indecision it would be an incongruous thing on your part to accept it, would be to suppose a calamity only to be thought of by you with burning sorrow and shame.

The prophet was encouraged to pray by hearing “the sound of an abundance of rain.” No other listener heard it, and, child of the wilderness as he was, having an eye for all the signs, a quick and sensitive ear for all the sounds of nature, it is probable that it was only by faith, and with the ear of the spirit, that he heard this predictive stir of the elements.

“Let it be,” said the Lord to David and his soldiers, when they were waiting in concealment for a battle sign from heaven, “let it be, when thou hearest the sound of going on the tops of the mulberry trees, that thou shalt bestir thyself.” Like the “footsteps of angels” lightly gliding over the rustling trees—like the boom of the storm over the distant sea, that reached in low murmurs the prophet’s ear, Heaven is vouchsafing to us all some gracious signals which should encourage us to prayer. Some of these signals are to be seen in the state of the Churches, others in the sphere of secular life. The swiftness as well as the greatness of the changes lately witnessed in “the kingdoms of this world,” and the startling importance of those which are taking place at this moment—event thundering on event, and surprise flashing on surprise—should induce all “the Lord’s remembrancers” to study and plead the promises afresh, and to give themselves with new eagerness to their high vocation of prayer. “We know not what a day may bring forth ;” but, judging from the history of the past year, this at least we know, that wars and political revolutions may suddenly open new and vast spheres for Evangelical service ; we know that existing agencies, used with only our existing measure of Divine life, seem as if they would prove inadequate to meet the new demands ; we know that the great instances of spiritual awakening lately granted, appear to have been granted as the pure result of prayer, almost without the intervention of other means ; we believe that He whose sovereign prerogative it is to bless, is ready in the same gracious way to bestow yet greater blessings still. “There is a sound of abundance of rain !” God is calling you to prayer ! He is reminding you in various ways that you must look to Him alone, and that vain is the help of man. Dear brethren, we wish to renew our appeal with heightened urgency, but the solemn thoughts that crowd upon us, only seem to leave us power to cry with the holy martyr, “Pray ! pray ! pray !”

Some important things are suggested by the prayer itself. For instance, it was a speechless prayer. “He cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees.” Not a word was spoken. Some seem to have a dim idea, or, at least, a vague impression, that language must be a vital part of prayer, and that he prays best who can best command a flow of devotional words. Not only does such an impression affect our thoughts of the prayers offered by others, but it may injuriously influence our judgment about our own, so that sometimes we may think that we are in a praying spirit, only because we are in the mood for fluent expression, and, at other time, we may have dreary thoughts about ourselves, and imagine ourselves to be prayerless only because we are speechless, or slow of speech. Let us be on our guard against these temptations, on the one hand to rash utterance, on the other to "restraining prayer before God."

It was a living, earnest prayer. Why was he speechless? Because his heart was too full for speech. "He prayed earnestly that it might not rain, and it rained not on the earth for the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again (in the same earnest way), and the heavens gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit."* He had thoughts and desires too deep for words or tears. Great results may be expected from prayers that are offered when "the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us, with groanings that cannot be uttered."

It was an inquiring prayer. There may be asking without inquiring. We may ask for a thing when we only offer a calm and cold request for it. We inquire when we keep on the outlook for a reply, going again and again to our friend with a repetition of our wishes, until our wishes are realised, or going time after time to the place where he would be likely to leave a message for us, persevering until the message has been left. When Elijah retired for prayer, he sent his servant to the highest crest of the mountain to look for the cloud that was to be the answer to that prayer; six times he looked in vain; the sky was a deep arch of glory; the sea, from the line of white waves on the strand, twelve hundred feet below him, right away to the clear line of the horizon, was one sheet of blue living light, without a cloud; but the seventh time, when he mounted the cliff to look abroad, the little cloud appeared, and, joy unspeakable! the prophet's prayer was heard. At one stage of the inquiry the servant might have said, "it is of no use, the prayer for rain is not heard, I have been six times to watch for a cloud—I will go no more!" We often act on this principle, and therefore, perhaps, miss the blessing; but let us from this time remember, that although God has promised us His Holy Spirit, He has subjoined the language, "I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them."

It was a lowly, self-renouncing prayer. Lowly in the dust he cast himself before the Holy One of Israel, and the attitude of his body fitly reflected the spirit of his mind. Low in the dust of self-abasement let us lie, like him who "did not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven, but smote upon his breast, and cried, God be merciful to me a sinner!" If we would hope for God to hear our prayer on behalf of others, we must utterly renounce dependence on ourselves. With a profound sense of our unworthiness, we must, from the depth of our hearts, plead the name of another, and His right to be heard must be the only ground on which we hope to be heard. "Then shall the earth yield her increase, and God, even our God, shall bless us. God shall bless us; and all the ends of the earth shall fear him." The effect of our prayer shall not be slight or doubtful, but, like Elijah's prayer, it shall cause the glory of the Lord to be revealed. There shall be a deluge of mercy, a storm of glorious blessing!

TRANSACTIONS AND MEETINGS.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL, DECEMBER 14.—The following resolutions were adopted:—

PRESENTATION OF A BIBLE TO GENERAL GARIBALDI.—"The Bible is the cannon which will liberate Italy," are the words of Garibaldi himself. It is intended to present the General with a fine copy of Bagster's Polyglott Bible, in folio (eight languages), handsomely bound. Two gentlemen, one military, will be deputed to convey it to Caprera and deliver it, with suitable inscription and address, into the General's hands. The expenses, including the volume, binding, circular, advertisements, and journey of the deputation, are reckoned at about £. If more money is contributed than is required (which it is hoped will be the case), the surplus will be applied, with the co-operation and advice of the British and Foreign Bible Society, to the purchase of copies of the New Testament for the Army of Italy in the service of King Victor Emanuel. It is trusted that the means may be afforded of offering a copy to every officer and soldier who does not possess one. The Sub-Committee for Foreign Correspondence of the Evangelical Alliance has made arrangements to receive contributions of ONE SHILLING AND UPWARDS for the purpose. Collecting cards for small donations are ready, and will be issued on application. Receipts will be given at the office in Adam-street for sums however small; and lists will be hereafter published of sums above 10s. contributed or collected. The management is entrusted to Colonel Walker, R.A., Chairman of Foreign Sub-Committee; Hon. Wm. Ashley; Sir Culling Eardley, Bart.; and the Rev. Hermann Schmettan, Foreign Secretary, who will thankfully acknowledge donations, and send out collecting cards.

Resolved—That this Committee have heard with unfeigned sorrow of the deep domestic afflictions into which their valued friend the Rev. Dr. Dwight, missionary at Constantinople, has been plunged, by the decease of his beloved wife. The Committee are desirous of assuring their esteemed brother of their heartfelt sympathy in this his mournful bereavement, and of their united and earnest prayer that He who in His wisdom has laid upon His servant this severe trial, may, in the greatness of His love, vouchsafe to him strength to bear it with devout submission to His own sovereign will. Such an affliction, heavy even under the most alleviating circumstances, falls with peculiar weight on a Christian family dwelling in a foreign land, and among an unevangelized people; but the Committee would venture to remind their sorrowing brother of the good hope he has that his own irreparable loss is the unspeakable gain of her whose departure he mourns, and they offer their fervent prayer, both that as the sufferings abound in him, so his consolation may abound in Christ, and that He who is wonderful in council and excellent in working, may overrule this severe dispensation for the advancement of the kingdom of Christ among a people for whose spiritual benefit their brother has so long and faithfully laboured.

THE LATE BARON DE BUNSEN.—Resolved—That this Committee has heard with deep and sincere regret of the decease of that distinguished Christian statesman and man of letters, the Baron de Bunsen, and desires the Chairman to communicate to his bereaved family their heartfelt sympathy in their affliction. Without expressing their concurrence in all the theological views of Baron Bunsen, of the personal excellence in all the relations of life of that distinguished man they can entertain no doubt; he had a warm affection for all the true servants of God of every sect and nation, and the friends of the Alliance ought never to forget the warm interest which he took in the Berlin Conference of 1857, and the readiness with which he responded to the call of his sovereign, the King of Prussia, to be present on that occasion.

Last Moments of Baron de Bunsen.

The foregoing Resolution delicately refers to Baron de Bunsen's questionable views on certain doctrines. There can be no doubt that, during the last few years, he had been carried too far away into speculations, which often lead men to a denial of positive belief. But it appears that in this dangerous atmosphere Baron de Bunsen's heart had not ceased to cling to Christ, his Saviour, and in his dying experience he expressed his faith in those great truths which are the very substance of Christianity. We gladly insert the following account of the last moments of this eminent man, whose personal piety and humble submission to Christ was acknowledged even by those who widely differed from him in the erroneous conclusions to which his speculative philosophical arguments sometimes led him:—

Baron de Bunsen was very anxious to have his life spared, that he might finish those literary works which had occupied him during the last eight years. One night, however, perceiving that this was not the will of God, he raised himself in his arm-chair and exclaimed: "O Lord, into Thy hands I commend my spirit!" He then sent for his family and said to them: "A great change has come over me—not with regard to my immortal soul, nor to Christ, my only Saviour, but as to my body. I feel that death is very close to me." After having blessed his children, and expressed, in the most touching words, his grateful affection the faithful partner of his life, saying that he had loved in her that which is eternal, he exclaimed : " Blessed be my country, and Italy, and her liberty ! Blessed be Germany, Prussia, England, the whole world ! " Having thanked his servant with sincere affection for his great care and kind services, he said, with a heavenly expression upon his face : " Notwithstanding all my feebleness and shortcomings, I have aimed at and sought on earth after what is noble. But my best and happiest experience is to have known Jesus Christ. I leave this world with no ill-will towards anybody ; no, no hatred ; hatred is damnable ! Oh, how good it is to look down upon this life from this elevation ! I now see what a dark existence I have led upon earth. Above ! above ! it does not grow darker, but always lighter and brighter. I am now in the kingdom of God. Until this moment it was but a presentiment. Oh, my God, how beautiful are Thy tabernacles ! "

On the 29th of October, when his friends pointed out to him a beautiful sunset, he said in English : " Oh, how beautiful it is ! God's love is in everything. May God bless you. " He then said in French : " Let us depart in Jesus Christ ! God is the life and the love ; the love that wills and the will that loves. . . . Christ is the conqueror. For Him to be is to conquer. There is no death in God. I see Christ and I see God through Christ. Christ sees us, He creates us, He must become all in all. I abhor to make any show, but I wish to say a few words, surrounded as I am by my dear children and friends. I am going to die, and wish to die. I wish that every good man might remember me with kindness. I offer my blessing — the blessing of an old man — to everybody who desires to have it. . . . Those who live in Christ, who live in loving Him, those are his own. . . . We exist only in proportion to our life in God ; we all are sinners ; but we live in God, and in Him we have eternal life. We have lived in this eternal life in proportion as we have lived in God. All the rest is nothing worth. Christ is the Son of God, and we are only, then, His children, when the spirit of love which was in Christ is in us. "

Just as Schleiermacher died, as a simple Christian, after having speculated much, perhaps too much philosophised, so did Baron de Bunsen. Schleiermacher in his earlier years was a member of the Church of the Moravian Brethren ; his end was that of a good Moravian brother, trusting alone in the blood of his Saviour Jesus Christ. Such deaths are more edifying than the profoundest metaphysical speculations.

MORTARA.—A preliminary meeting of Jews and Christians was held at the Mansion-house, London, on Friday, Dec. 21, to receive a deputation of the Universal Israelite Alliance from Paris. In consequence of the absence on official business of the Lord Mayor, Sir Culling Eardley took the chair. The subject having been introduced by the Chairman, the meeting was addressed by MM. S. Carvalho (Ingenieur des Ponts et Chaussées), S. Cahen (Professeur de L'Ecole Normale), N. Leven (Avocat à la Cour Impériale de Paris), constituting the deputation from France ; by Messrs. Isaacs (member of the Board of Deputies of British Jews) and Hart (member of the Board of Delegates of American Jews), and by Signor Fernandez, on the part of the Jews of Italy. It was stated that the Board of Deputies of the British Jews had met last night to receive the French deputation, but that owing to the absence from illness of the President, Sir Moses Montefiore, the decision on the subject of Mortara had been deferred for a few days. After long conversations, characterised by entire harmony of feeling, it was unanimously resolved : " 1st. That we, Christians and Jews of England, France, Italy, and America, having heard the views entertained by the ' Universal Israelite Alliance,' concerning new efforts to be made for the restoration of the child, Edgar Mortara, to his parents, take this the earliest opportunity of putting upon record our united conviction that the cause is one which, at the right time, and in the use of the right means, it is our duty to resume. 2nd. That as soon as the Board of Deputies of the British Jews have come to a conclusion upon their line of duty, the President of the Board of Deputies, and the Chairman of the present meeting, be requested to obtain the consent of the Lord Mayor for a further meeting to be held in the Mansion-house. 3rd. That our best thanks be offered to the Lord Mayor for his kindness in allowing the use of the Mansion-house for the present meeting. "

BARON BUNSEN'S DEATH AND THE "RECORD."

Our last month's number contained a paper of monthly transactions of the Evangelical Alliance, which, among other matters, included the following resolution on the death of Baron de Bunsen:—

Resolved—That this Committee have heard with deep and sincere regret of the death of that distinguished Christian statesman and man of letters, the Baron de Bunsen, and desire the Chairman to communicate to his bereaved family their heartfelt sympathy in their affliction. Without expressing their concurrence in all the theological views of Baron Bunsen, the Committee would express their sense of the personal excellence in all the relations of life of that distinguished man, and of the warm affection which he at all times manifested towards the true servants of God of every sect and nation. The Committee would also record their grateful recollection of the deep interest which the deceased Baron took in the Berlin Conference of 1857, and the readiness with which he responded to the call of his Sovereign, the King of Prussia, to be present on that occasion.

To this we appended some observations on "the last moments of Baron de Bunsen," quoting chiefly from an article in the Revue Chrétienne, by M. de Pressensé, which article we subjoin as it has been since published by the Times in full. From the statements of that article we felt justified in observing that, notwithstanding Bunsen's erroneous speculations, "it appears that in this dangerous atmosphere Bunsen's heart had not ceased to cling to Christ his Saviour, and in his dying experience he expressed his faith in those great truths which are the very substance of Christianity." And at the conclusion of the quotation from the article of M. de Pressensé were added the following words: "Just as Schleiermacher died, as a simple Christian, after having speculated much, perhaps too much philosophised, so died Baron de Bunsen. Schleiermacher, in his earlier years, was a member of the Church of the Moravian Brethren: his end was that of a good Moravian brother, trusting alone in the blood of his Saviour Jesus Christ. Such deaths are more edifying than the profoundest metaphysical speculations."

Assuming the accuracy of the facts reported, we consider that the inference was just, and, indeed, indisputable. And upon carefully reading over the entire communication, as it stands in our pages, amongst the reported transactions of the Evangelical Alliance, we verily believe that there are few ingenuous and loving hearts who would not derive pleasure and profit from the narrative. We think that the communication was edifying and seasonable, and a contribution to the cause of charity and brotherly kindness, without, in the slightest degree, trespassing upon the sacred demesne of truth. And we humbly and confidently believe that we shall not be generally condemned for having allowed ourselves the indulgence of generous and hopeful feelings and sentiments, while we rejoiced that a ray of peaceful glory, like a serene sunset after a doubtful day, should have gilded the death-chamber of a distinguished, though errant son of man, who, as we fondly hoped, had been made by faith a loving child of God.

No doubt it is open to any one who pleases to anatomise and discuss the value of the evidences upon which a charitable hope of this kind may be expressed in the case of a departed mortal. In such cases we fairly avow that we are not disposed to be ingeniously critical, in torturing religious expressions into a sinister or empty sense, if, by a fair and candid construction, they can be clothed with a sense evangelical. No dying man is expected to ring the changes upon theological formulas, or to depart in that awful hour from the natural character of his own ordinary expressions. To do so would be artificial, hollow, and unsatisfactory, in our opinion. Nor do we think that any person of competent judgment would expect that an educated German philosopher of the present day would, in such circumstances, adopt the specific phrases which in England have obtained a sort of conventional, or, perhaps, even sectarian, value, as in dicative of correct religious emotions. The dying thief on the cross, we may observe, was neither copious nor clear in his expressions, yet is generally held to have sufficiently evidenced that he had obtained grace, and a saving faith in the Lord of Glory. Accordingly, when we find the death-chamber of Baron de Bunsen to be serene with present peace, breathing a spirit of love, and radiant with the hope of eternal glory, we have at least a prima facie case for the legitimate indulgence of our happier feelings. We have heard, and believe, that Voltaire and Paine and Humo died very unhappy; and that Gibbon died at least gloomily, and without hope. We read in Scripture that there is "no peace to the wicked;" also, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." Still, we would not assert or admit that, without further evidence, a peaceful, happy and hopeful departure is alone sufficient to warrant us to presume the existence of a vital faith in the Saviour. But surely in the case of Baron de Bunsen it cannot be denied that there is much more? Whatever were his speculative errors (and they were great and dangerous, according to our very opposite notions), he, at least, was no scoffing or immoral infidel, but an amiable, moral, and religious man. And then, as to a profession of the true faith in dying, have we not, amongst something cloudy and German-like, much that is clear and hopeful, in the narrative of M. de Pressensé, to which at large we refer our readers? We shall instance some of those expressions, more particularly hereafter, which appear to us to be satisfactorily scriptural to this point; and meantime, we aver that the dying man who could sincerely and truthfully use such expressions, is not to be judged uncharitably, without peril to the living man who ventures so to judge. We are informed, on Divine authority, that "No man can say Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." We feel bound to accept the deathbed utterings of Baron Bunsen as sincere; indeed, there is a self-evident genuineness in these breathings of a departing spirit which is not to be mistaken; and if so, we submit to the general judgment of the Christian Church, and to all large and loving hearts wheresoever, that no case exists for that stern faithfulness (so called) to truth, which would compel Christian friends to pass over in "mournful silence" all mention of the death scene of Baron de Bunsen; or to freeze the genial pulse-blood of Christian sympathy and hope down to that miserable zero indicated by the verbal profession of abstinence from "arrogating the right to pass judgment on a sinner standing before God, the judge of all"—while we shake the head, and contradict our verbal profession by a manifest doubting if, indeed, it be lawful, in such a case, to hope.

The Record, we regret to say, has judged differently from us in this matter; and, urged by a painful sense of fidelity to God, has devoted more than a column to a severe animadversion upon the Evangelical Alliance for that resolution, which we republish above, and to which we refer our readers. To us that resolution seems a natural and cautious composition—natural, as expressive of sympathy and the memory of kindness received; and cautious, as guarding its framers and adopters against any presumed allowance of the erroneous theological opinions of a deceased friend, which are delicately disclaimed. But of that resolution the Record nevertheless declares—

We must be excused for expressing our opinion that it would have indicated more of heavenly wisdom, more of true charity to man, and of faithfulness to the God of the Bible, if it had passed over in mournful silence the death of one who, &c.

These are heavy charges against a religious society, no doubt. Defective "heavenly wisdom:" defective "true charity to man:" defective "faithfulness to God." The writer who gravely utters such accusations of the brethren, ought to be very sure of his own standing-ground. Much latitude, perhaps far too much latitude, has been usually conceded to conscientious defenders of the truth in regard to the sort of language adopted when attacking open infidels and heretics. Even in such cases there is room for some improvement in the ordinary style of polemical controversy. The sunshine opened the traveller's cloak, when the buffeting storm and the pelting rain had only made him draw it more closely around him. And, doubtless, even German philosophers have so much of human nature left in them as to be more accessible to the voice of true reason, when speaking in the accents of love, than when thundering in tones of fierce denunciation. But whatever may be the proper weapons to wield against those whom we may be so bold as to consider the enemies of Christ and of God, surely this is strong language as applied to a body of English Christian gentlemen in the columns of a friendly Evangelical newspaper. Were the rebuke just and well-founded, it sounds to us most harsh. And we doubt whether it will be generally admitted that these gentlemen in this instance were indeed deficient in heavenly wisdom, true charity, and faithfulness to God; or that the writer in the Record has illustrated his own more abundant possession of those Christian graces. Two points are alleged against the Evangelical Alliance: first, that it noticed at all, or at all events publicly, the death of Baron Bunsen, whose memory it ought to have passed over in "mournful silence;" secondly, that the word "Christian" is used in the resolution as descriptive of the deceased statesman and philosopher. On the first of these charges we have nothing to say. We are not called upon to defend the Alliance in the discreet or indiscreet exercise of its feelings and resolutions. As public journalists, we have only to deal with the documents before us, and we cannot see that any body of Christian English gentlemen have any cause to be ashamed of the generous, and loving, and hopeful spirit which dictated that resolution. But as to the epithet "Christian," is it really come to this, that English public opinion, or even the public opinion of the Evangelical English party, fairly appealed to, would withhold such an epithet from a man of whose dying hours the record is before us and under discussion? We cannot believe it would; and this brings us to the point in this case in which Evangelical Christendom seems criminated by the Record, we scarcely know how, or to what extent. The writer in that journal goes on to say:—

Our chief objection to the publication of Baron Bunsen's last hours in Evangelical Christendom, is founded on the fact that this narrative, associated as it is with the public resolution of the Evangelical Alliance, compels us either to discuss the value of the facts it professes to record, or appear to acquiesce in an authoritative opinion that a man may spend a lifetime in fighting against the authority of Divine revelation, and the creeds of all Churches, and then, without any change of heart or profession of repentance, depart in Christ.

We really feel somewhat at a loss how to deal with this extravagant paragraph, without appearing to violate Christian gentleness and courtesy. Where, we ask, is that "authoritative opinion" to be found in our columns, in which the Record fears he should have been appearing to acquiesce, if he had not undertaken the painful task of denouncing the Evangelical Alliance, inculcating this journal, darkening the memory of the dead, and wounding the feelings of the living family? Unless the use of the epithet "Christian" in the Alliance resolution can be called an "authoritative opinion," there is none in that document. The observations of Evangelical Christendom upon the narrative given by M. de Pressensé, can scarcely be regarded as an "authoritative opinion" at all; but if so considered, where, we repeat, is there in our columns any opinion whatsoever, authoritative or otherwise, ventilated, expressed, or implied, or by any torture of words to be extracted, that a sinner, "without change of heart or profession of repentance, may depart in Christ." If we gave any opinion, authoritative or the reverse, valuable or worthless, it is just the very contrary of the foregoing assertion of the Record. Our opinion may fairly be implied to be to this amount, that the evidence laid before us in the narrative of M. de Pressensé was sufficient to justify an intelligent Christian in hopefully believing and rejoicing that "Baron de Bunsen had not ceased to cling to Christ his Saviour, and that in his dying experience he expressed his faith in those great truths which are the very substance of Christianity." It is a simple question of evidence and fact.

Now, while the Record possesses the privilege, and might feel it a duty, to question the accuracy of M. de Pressensé's narrative; or to deny the sincerity of Bunsen's dying declarations; or to dispute the value of those declarations as evidential of a saving faith in Christ; we submit that a professing Christian journalist has no right to impute to us the folly or the sin of giving currency to an "authoritative opinion" so monstrous, as that any sinner whosoever, "without change of heart or profession of repentance, may depart in Christ." We do not wish to say harsh things, or to deal too exactly with a writer, whom hurry of composition, as much perhaps as an ardent zeal, may have caused to be overtaken in a fault. But really, even a zeal for God ought to be exercised without the inadvertence of forgetting that there is a ninth commandment, and that our neighbour too has his rights.

The great issue, however, in this case is far more important than any personal affair between two organs like the Record and Evangelical Christendom. Were it not so, we should not waste a sentence or a thought upon the matter. The point and kernel of the case is the question whether we were justified on the evidence in hopefully thinking that Bunsen died a Christian. In dealing with the evidence on this point we cannot acquit the writer in the Record of the charge that he has inaccurately garbled, and unaccountably suppressed, the better and clearer portions of that evidence. While he carefully collects all those more cloudy and German-like expressions, which convey to the English mind less distinct ideas, he with remarkable care suppresses those more definite and satisfactory utterances on which we might lay considerable stress. We allude to such expressions as these: "Christ my only Saviour;" and again: "But my best experience is that of having known Jesus Christ." Baron de Bunsen had said, "Notwithstanding all my weaknesses and shortcomings, I have desired, I have sought for, that which is noble here below." This the Record declares "in its connexion sounds too much like self-righteousness." But surely that charity which hopeth all things might, without peril of "unfaithfulness to the God of the Bible," have taken an entirely opposite view of the connexion in which that utterance is found. The words following immediately in connexion (which are entirely suppressed by the Record) are these: "BUT MY BEST EXPERIENCE IS THAT OF HAVING KNOWN JESUS CHRIST."

Who is there amongst us that would not wish to be able to say we had "desired and sought for that which is noble here below," and be happy to add, that nevertheless our "best experience is that of having known Jesus Christ?" To us this seems the natural connexion of the sentences; and this view is corroborated when we consider the further words: "I see clearly that we are all sinners." "We have only Christ in God." And again, these very last words: "CHRIST IS THE SON OF GOD, and we are His children only when the spirit of love, which was in Christ, is in us."

Peace be to his ashes! Let the writings of the days of his vanity under the sun (what he called our "obscure existence") be fairly criticised or fiercely denounced, as they may best deserve, or as best may suit the taste polemical; but if Bunsen knew Jesus Christ indeed, he knew and possessed eternal life. We defend no writings, we apologise not for errors; but we protest against the violation of the instincts of humanity, in the desecrated name of the Christianity of love. Why should German inquirers—why should the mistaken followers of German vanities at home—be needlessly repelled from approximating to English Evangelical religion—be made to feel that its spirit is repulsive, and indeed suicidal? The God of Grace and Revelation is the God of Nature also; and the Saviour came not to destroy, but to sanctify the natural sentiments of man. While, then, we hold fast, not only to the great verities of the Gospel, but to the form of sound words in which they are enshrined, we can recognise the fact that there are minds who differ from us as to the value of the form, and yet who have a vital hold, by faith, of Him who is the substance. And let whoso will assail the memory of the dead, or condemn the generous and gentle living, we shall endeavour rather to verify the hope that a wanderer had reached the fold. Who grudges that a jewel has been added to the Redeemer's crown? and if so added, why should the Redeemer's glory be concealed? Was the dying Bunsen, in truth, an excommunicated wretch, or a scoffing Voltaire, for whose memory "mournful silence" is indeed the only fitting mood? What are the proofs? Bunsen declared that he loved and trusted in God. Bunsen chiefly gloried that he had known Jesus Christ. Bunsen called Christ his only Saviour. Bunsen declared that Jesus was the Son of God. Bunsen expressed his firm faith in the resurrection. Bunsen breathed the spirit of love to all men. Bunsen received the sacramental memorials of his dying Saviour's love from the hands of the regular pastors of his Church. Bunsen died full of peace, of hope, of joyful anticipation. Was Bunsen a hypocrite? What shall we say then? Is it not written, "Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God?" "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." "And this commandment have we from Him, that he who loveth God love his brother also."

P.S.—Since the foregoing was written we have seen a letter in the Record from the Rev. T. R. Birks, who protests against the Alliance resolution, as unwise and unseasonable, and who warmly attacks the character of Baron Bunsen's writings, more especially as connected with the seven Oxford essays. Mr. Birks, therefore, thinks that the conveyance of sympathy, &c., ought to have been the private act of individuals, and not the public resolution of a religious body. This may be so. We have no commission to defend the discretion or the indiscretion of any public body. That is their own affair. As individuals, we sympathise with the act in question, but have at present no sufficient knowledge of the facts to lead us to form a judgment as to the weight or otherwise of the resolution as the deliverance of any considerable body. We also think that the Record, in discussing the narrative of M. de Pressensé and the writings of Baron Bunsen, need not have assailed the Evangelical Alliance at all, and went out of its way to do so. Much more, therefore, do we think that Mr. Birks, as honorary secretary of that body, would have acted more scripturally in telling to his brethren privately the error he thought they had committed; instead of hastily rushing into the public columns of a newspaper to hit his beloved brethren hard. Perhaps a little reflection may make him doubt his own superior wisdom in this case. The heart is often wiser than the head. But, however this may be, the arguments of Mr. Birks do not at all touch the question which we have discussed. Be the resolution of the Alliance discreet or indiscreet, the question is now whether Bunsen's deathbed scene, and Bunsen's dying declarations, gave ground for the hopeful conclusion that he died in the faith. That is the question for humanity and Christianity. And the secondary and inferior question for this journal is, whether it can be charged with justice as having given room in its pages to any opinion that, without such faith, a sinner may depart in Christ.

Since our article was in type, we have also seen the Record of 18th January, in which the subject is handled again in a somewhat similar manner. But the Record seems now to deny altogether and plainly that Bunsen could be at all termed "a Christian," and to assert that his dying declarations, as narrated by M. de Pressensé, do not refer to Jesus Christ, the sinner's Saviour, at all, but to a false ideal or imaginary Christ. The Record goes on to say: "Are Evangelical Christians to be so duped? Are we to take up with an imaginary ideal Christ?" Surely not. But did M. de Pressensé mean then really to tell us that this was the Christ who was Bunsen's "only Saviour?" Or did not he rather mean to convey a parallel opinion to that of Hooker concerning Romanists—viz., that although there be a mass of error mixed up with the object of faith in such cases, yet it can be charitably and truthfully allowed, nevertheless, that faith may grasp the true Christ in the midst? For ourselves, we cannot imagine a man receiving the sacramental elements of the body and blood of Christ from the pastors of the Church, and yet, under all the circumstances recorded, rejecting the Saviour. We leave M. de Pressensé to elucidate the matter, which seems now, so far as present facts are concerned, fairly before the Christian public; and we lean to the charitable hypothesis, without much apprehension that our character for Evangelical fidelity will be impaired thereby.

(FROM THE "REVUE CHRETIENNE" OF DECEMBER 15, 1860.)

All adherents to the cause of full liberty of conscience must deeply mourn the loss of one of its most illustrious defenders. Not alone by this title, but by many others of equal importance to us, do we lament the death of Baron Bunsen. All those who have had the privilege of knowing him, and of receiving the warm expressions of his expansive friendship—all who have seen that noble countenance, lighted up in old age with the fire of inward youth, regret him as a personal friend before regretting him as one of the most distinguished representatives of European Protestantism. Never was any man's heart less chilled by science than that of Baron Bunsen. His extraordinary activity had embraced the highest functions of diplomacy as well as the labours of a man of consummate erudition, at the same time that he never failed to throw in a word for liberty amid the conflicts of ecclesiastical and political parties.

It would be impossible in a few words to trace the noble and varied career of Baron Bunsen. The services which he rendered to his country in the high posts which he filled cannot be duly noticed here. We may, however, be permitted to say that liberty, taken in its highest sense, never had more fervent support. This aged diplomatist had a warmth of enthusiasm for every great cause rarely met with in our young men. Thus it was that he espoused with a generous passion the cause of Italian liberty. Having long resided in the very centre of clerical despotism, and in a position which enabled him to see things from a new point of view, he longed with juvenile ardour for the resurrection of Italy. Before even one could anticipate success, at the commencement of the crisis, he wrote to us, "Let us ask of God, my friend, the triumph of justice!" He was under no illusion as to the difficulties of the situation, and he well knew that chains long leave their impress on the limbs that have worn them, and that there will be much to forgive in those who have not received the hardy education of freedom. The events accomplished on the other side of the Alps, and, above all, the prospects thereby opened, were a source of joy to him in his last days. We cannot either enter into any detail regarding his immense literary labours. A few days before his death he was correcting the proofs of a new edition of his great work on "Egypt." The book which he wrote with Platner, on the "Antiquities of Rome," is the best guide any one can have who would travel not merely over ground, but over time, and retrace past ages in traversing the city of ruins.

The part devoted to Christian antiquities is treated in a superior manner, and his monography on the ancient Basilicas leaves nothing more to be said on the subject. His writings devoted to the critical history of the first ages of the Church contain the richest materials, in a somewhat confused order, but breathing a beneficent spirit, a spirit of piety and liberty. His treatise on the "Epistles of Ignatius," and his book on "Hippolytus," are thoroughly imbued with his admiration for the heroic past of the Church, at the same time that they attack without mercy the clerical and hierarchical tendencies which are sought to be grafted on this rich stock of the primitive Church. Recently Baron Bunsen published a vast work on the idea of "God in History," presenting in an extended development the general views summed up in his "Hippolytus." He was pursuing with indefatigable zeal his translation of the Bible with comments, and these gigantic labours did not prevent him from stirring all Germany, a few years ago, by his eloquent book on the "Signs of the Times," a book which inaugurated, with striking effect, the salutary reaction against the incorrigible and bigoted party of Old Lutheranism, and which stated, with a precision very uncommon on that side of the Rhine, the great principles of Church liberty. We should not be sincere if we were not to say that on more than one important point we regret the direction taken by the mind of Baron Bunsen on theological subjects. We have said it to himself, but have never ceased to feel the pulsations of his Christian heart, notwithstanding the strange forms occasionally assumed by his system. Indeed, to feel this it only required to be in contact with him, and to see sparkle on his features and to hear vibrate in his voice that noble love of truth and that loyalty to truth which was free from all dogmas of School or Church. His only desire was, as he often said, to throw a bridge between contempo-raucous thought, so disturbed by doubts, and Christianity. He cared little whether the bridge lasted or were destroyed, so that the passage to the other side were but effected. He passed through the great theological crisis of the times, and many of his ideas were affected by it, but at the bottom of his heart, and in the essence of his piety, he remained ever the same. He continued to be the man of fervent, mystic piety, who collected with such delight the most beautiful hymns of the Church of his country, and who never wearied of hearing them. His conversation, so rich, so animated, and so elevating, was completely imbued with that Christian salt, the strong savour of which cannot be imitated. I shall never forget the last interview I had with him last year, when I saw him in Paris, so full of moral youth under his crown of hoary hairs. He developed with rare power the thought that, setting aside Him who transcends all other men by the entire height of moral perfection, there is always a period of decline in the life of the greatest saints and the most illustrious teachers. He called it the catastrophe, the fatal sign of the incurable weakness of man. He applied this truth to some of the most eminent personalities of Church history, he applied it to the Church itself, and I still remember with what emphatic truth he remarked that with Origen the best period of the freedom of Christian thought ended. "After him," he added, "one may exclaim, 'Finit Polonia!' it is the end of great and fruitful liberty!" Alas! we shall see him, we shall hear him no more! or rather let us acknowledge with gladness that we have lost nothing, that all we possessed in him we still possess. How doubt it, when one has read the account of his death, which we have from a reliable source?

It is then that what is in the depths of the soul rises to the surface and its secret thoughts are revealed, for that which enables a man to die well is, after all, that by which he lives. The death-bed of Baron Bunsen was in every way admirable. We are happy in being authorized to record the recollection of it.

All the tender and noble sentiments with which his heart was filled were poured out in a last effusion. One feels that he was raised to that luminous height where the mind soars above our poor human systems, which know so little. The Christian father in his gentle dignity, the ardent friend of the German fatherland, the devoted partisan of liberty in the whole world, especially the Christian world, the Christian whose faith is being changed into life, each spoke by turns through his mouth, in the midst of cruel sufferings. Baron Bunsen desired his existence to be prolonged in order to accomplish the labours he had commenced. One night he understood this not to be the will of God, and rising from his armchair, he exclaimed, "O God, I commit my spirit into Thy hands!" He then summoned all his family, and said to them, "A great change has taken place in my thoughts, not with regard to my immortal soul; not with regard to Christ, my only Saviour; but with regard to my body. I feel that I am dying." After having blessed his children, and expressed his grateful affection for the faithful partner of his life in the most touching terms, saying that he had loved in her that which was eternal ("In dir liebte ich das Ewige"), "May God," he exclaimed, "bless my friends! May my country be blessed, Italy and her liberty! May Prussia be blessed, Germany, England, the whole world! I desire every blessing for the Prince and Princess of Prussia! Gratitude to Niebuhr!" It was Niebuhr, as is known, who introduced Baron Bunsen into the career he so worthily fulfilled.

After having thanked his servant for his care with the truest affection, he continued, with a heavenly expression on his countenance: "Notwithstanding all my weaknesses and shortcomings, I have desired, I have sought for that which is noble here below! But my best experience is that of having known Jesus Christ. I leave this world without hating any one. No, no hatred—hatred is an accursed thing. Oh! how good it is to look upon life from this elevation! One then perceives what an obscure existence we have led upon earth. Upward! upward! It becomes not darker, but always brighter, brighter. I am now in the kingdom of God. Till now it was only an anticipation. O my God! how beautiful are Thy tabernacles!"

The 29th of October, as his attention was directed to a brilliant sunset, "Yes," he said in English, "that is beautiful! The love of God is in everything." "May God bless you eternally," he added in French. "Let us part in Jesus Christ. God is life, love—love that wills; will that loves. (Wollendes Lieben, liebendes Wollen.) Christus recognoscitur victor, Christus est, est Christus victor. With Him to be is to conquer. There is no death in God. I see Christ, and I see God through Christ. Christ sees us, He creates us. He must become all in all. I wish nothing theatrical, but I wish to say a few words in the midst of my children and my friends. I am dying, and I wish to die. I commend myself to the recollection of every good man, and I beg him to recollect me with kindness. I offer my blessing, the blessing of an old man, to all who desire it. I die in peace with all the world. Those who live in Christ, who live in loving Him, those are His. Those who do not live by His life do not belong to Him, by whatever name they may call themselves, and whatever confession of faith they may sign. Belonging to a Church or sect is nothing. I see clearly that we are all sinners. We have only Christ in God. We only exist in so far as we exist in God and have eternal life. We have lived in this eternal life in proportion as we have lived in God. All else is nothing. Christ is the Son of God, and we are His children only when the spirit of love which was in Christ is in us."

There is the last utterance of that long and brilliant life. To love God in Christ is all; the rest is nothing. There is the theology of the deathbed, there is the science of the Christian's last agony!

We have been unwilling to leave out anything from his last words. We all need to learn to die, and these grand lessons are especially needed by those who are devoted to the absorbing pursuits of letters and science, and who are intoxicated with the most enviable of the glories of earth. They must learn to know that this glory is that vain smoke that darkens heaven, where we cannot enter, as into an academy, inhaling the incense of human praise, but by confessing, after the example of this great and noble spirit, that those only know how to live and die who have loved the Crucified One.

Nothing could be more touching than were the obsequies of Baron Bunsen. His coffin, borne by his sons, then by the students of the University of Bonn, covered with wreaths of flowers, according to the German custom, was accompanied through the town by the religious notes of those national hymns he had so loved. The pastors who had given him the Holy Communion a few days before pronounced at the open grave the words of eternal life, and those assembled retired saying one to another that Germany had lost a great citizen, science one of its most eminent representatives, and the Church a fervent Christian, who died confessing his faith in Christ. This faith remains as the effectual consolation of all those who knew and loved Baron Bunsen, for they repeat what he said with so much energy, "There is a resurrection!"

THEOLOGICAL CORRESPONDENCE WITH GERMANY.

No. III.

LETTER FROM PROFESSOR LECHLER, OF LEIPZIG.

THE following letter has recently been received by the Committee of German Correspondence from Professor Lechler, of Leipzig, in compliance with a request which they made to him some time ago to favour them with some account of what is well known in Germany as the Tübingen School of Criticism. His outline of its history and results, though not so full as the Committee had anticipated, will be found very interesting and instructive; and in particular it will be seen that the best days are already over in Germany of a school which is only now beginning to find disciples in England. Anglican Rationalism is only now beginning to make use of arms and ammunition which have already lost their force in the country where they were first invented and used. At all events, it will be seen from this letter that there is ample store of arms to be found in the arsenals of German theological science, to help us, if need be, in our warfare with this new form of disbelief, now that it begins to speak with an English voice and to appear with arrogant pretensions in the high places of our own land:—

Dresden, Dec. 18, 1860.

Respected Colleague,—Without wishing to detain you with apologies for my long delay in replying to your kind letter, I will only say that circumstances, over which I had no control, have hitherto prevented me from complying with the request which you did me the honour to address to me; and in now proceeding to comply with it, I must bespeak your own and your friends' indulgence, if my exposition does not turn out so complete and profound as I myself might have wished, on account of the little spare time which is at present at my command.

You have applied to me to give you an article on the "Tübingen School." You doubtless presumed that, for two reasons, I might be specially qualified to give you some account of it; first, as I myself received my academical education at that University; and secondly, because I have taken part in the controversy against that school. Permit me to remark, however, that I am conscious of the great difficulty of imparting to English brethren a proper idea and a just judgment with regard to a subject of this kind. For it is not unknown to me how strong, with the majority of English Christians, is the aversion and suspicion which is felt against "German Theology;" so much so, that in the province of religion "German" and "infidel" are often thought to be scarcely distinguishable. If this opinion prevails with regard to many learned men, whom we regard as believers and sound theologians, what will be said in England of a school which even we in Germany strongly oppose and attack? And what an evil reputation in the eyes of British Christians must he draw upon himself, who, though a believer in the Word of God, has yet a word of apology to offer in behalf of a school which he is in conscience bound to oppose! In this position do I now find myself. Whence shall I take courage and confidence, in spite of all this, to comply with your wish, and to attempt to give you an account of the Tübingen School? I answer: First, from the principle that the truth, of which one is convinced, ought not to be concealed, but honestly and sincerely avowed, even at the risk of giving offence to friends. Secondly, from the fact, that there are not wanting, even in England—especially since the labours of the never-to-be-forgotten Thomas Arnold—men who look upon our German theology with unprejudiced minds, and follow on this subject, as well as others, the scriptural rule, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Lastly, I derive consolation from history. At the present day England looks with aversion upon the theological science of Germany. But it has not always been so. I know a time when it was the reverse. There was a time when a spirit of innovation, an inclination to bring everything into question, prevailed in England. I allude to the long period in the seventeenth century and the first half of the eighteenth, when Deism was in full bloom. Pardon this allusion in one who happens to have accurately studied precisely this part of the theological history of England, and who has written a "History of English Deism." At that time the minds of German divines were directed as suspiciously and anxiously upon England as at the present moment British Christians look upon German theology. I doubt whether people in England can have any idea at the present day in what light most of the English theological works, which came over to us at that time, were regarded by our forefathers. And if the seed of freethinking and Rationalism, and in the end of a destructive criticism and speculation, has ripened on German soil, our brethren of Great Britain will not overlook the fact, that the first seeds of this crop were carried originally from their country to us. All the more do I believe I may hope for a mild judgment in regard to things which, at the first glance, may appear highly offensive to an English eye.

In approaching the subject itself, I begin with the fact, that the founder of the Tübingen School, Dr. Baur, died on the 2nd of the present month (December, 1860). The more do I consider myself bound (having been his pupil) to violate neither truth nor natural duty in giving you an account of some part of his activity.

It is not longer than fifteen years since the critical School of Tübingen appeared in its full character. David Friedrich Strauss had produced a general sensation by his "Life of Jesus," in 1835, and by his "Doctrine of Faith," in 1840, before his master, Baur, drew the eyes of all upon himself, as the founder of a specific school. And yet he had long before put forth the first elements, which he gradually developed into a comprehensive system. I distinguish three periods—viz., 1st, from 1830—1845, the period, so to speak, of crystallisation; 2nd, from 1845—1853, the period of systematic exposition; 3rd, 1853—1860, the period of further development.

The commencement of Baur's critical investigations on the subject of primitive Christianity may be dated from the publication of his Article, "Die Christuspartei in der Corinthischen Gemeinde," 1831. After a number of similar essays, and a series of works which comprehended parts of Church history and dogmatical history—as, for instance, "The Religious System of the Manicheans," 1831; "The Christian Gnosis," 1835; "The History of the Doctrine of Reconciliation," 1835; of the Trinity, and of the Incarnation, 1841—there appeared, in 1845, the book, "Paul, the Apostle of Jesus Christ," in which the relation of the Apostle Paul to the original apostles, and the author's critical judgment on St. Paul's epistles, as well as on the historical value of the Acts of the Apostles, were developed in the manner in which they have ever since been received and held by the school which bears his name. A centre of crystallisation was herewith gained; the object now was to bring his peculiar views into a complete system; and this was done between 1845 and 1853. For all that Baur believed himself to have discovered at the centre of apostolical life and working he developed partly retrospectively, in respect to the Gospels and the life of Jesus; partly prospectively, in respect to the apostolic and post-apostolic times. The close of this second period is marked by the book, "The Christianity and the Christian Church of the First Three Centuries," 1853 (which has reached a second edition), in which the whole of Baur's investigations on the subject of primitive Christianity are concentrated. The continuation, up to the time of Gregory the Great, has been published later. From this time forward we observe nothing but a further working out of the system, and a struggle for its defence and vindication.

Thus much concerning the history of the system and the works of the master. I shall have occasion to refer to the disciples who followed in his footsteps and to their most important writings, when I speak, as I now proceed to do, of the principles of the system.

The peculiarity of this school consists, as it seems to me, in this—that it applies a historical criticism of the freest kind to the history of primitive Christianity and to the books of the New Testament, in such a manner, as chiefly to bring out to view, and lay stress upon, the differences which existed among the several apostles and the principal circles of the apostolic and post-apostolic Church, treating the whole subject upon the principles of Hegel's philosophy.

The principal results of this method are the following:—

1. Between St. Paul and the original apostles there existed a decided opposition of sentiment, which was never reconciled.

2. Before Paul's conversion, the apostles and the first Churches occupied a narrow Jewish standpoint; they were thoroughly Ebionitic in their views.

3. It was Paul who first recognised Jesus as the Son of God, the work of Christ as redemption, and thus raised Christianity essentially above the level of Judaism.

4. The struggle between the original Judaical and the more liberal and higher Gentile-Christian comprehension of Christianity was continued through several generations, so that it was not till after the middle and before the end of the second century that an union of the two tendencies was effected by mutual concessions and compromises—whence the old Catholic Church, in the time of Irenaeus, took its origin.

5. In connexion with these ideas stand the following views regarding the Scriptures of the New Testament:—

(a) The Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians and Galatians are the only genuine productions of Paul—all the rest ascribed to the authorship of the apostle of the Gentiles, are of more recent origin, and have been falsely attributed to him.

(b) All the epistles of the New Testament attributed to other apostles are spurious.

(c) The Apocalypse is the genuine work of the Apostle John; but

(d) The fourth gospel (as well as the three Epistles of John) was not written by the apostle, to whom it has been attributed. It was written as late as the middle of the second century, in the way of "free composition"—i.e., without regard to historical truth.

- (e) Even the three first gospels were not written by the persons whose names they bear, but much later.
- (f) The Acts of the Apostles were not written by Luke, neither the third gospel. The unknown author had for his object (in the second century) to unite Pauline and Petrine Christians. For this purpose he has represented Paul as much as possible as speaking like Peter, and Peter like Paul, without adhering accurately to historical truth.

No inconsiderable number of learned men have co-operated with the master in producing the works whose critical results I have thus briefly sketched. I mention as the most known among them the following: Eduard Zeller, of Marburg, author of "Die Apostelgeschichte nach ihrem Inhalt und Ursprung kritisch untersucht." Schwegler, "Das nachapostolische Zeitalter." Kœtlin, "Lehrbegriff des Evang. Johannis." Hilgenfeld, of Jena, "Commentar zum Brief an die Galater," "Die Clementinen und Recognitionen," "Die Apostolischen Väter," and several essays. Lastly: Felchmar, of Zurich. Eduard Reuss, of Strasburg, has also been much influenced by the views of the Tübingen School, especially in his "Histoire de la Théologie Chrétienne au Siècle Apostolique," 1842.

It is no matter of surprise that faithful Evangelical Christians and friends of Scriptural truth, should have been startled by the results at which this school has arrived. For it is evident that the faith in Christ Jesus, the true Son of God and Saviour of fallen mankind from sin, death, and damnation, is incompatible with these results. If the first apostles, men like Peter, James, John, and Andrew, are to be believed to have differed from the Apostle Paul in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, in its very kernel and essence, and that to such an extent that (in the words of Schwegler) there has never since been any divergency of doctrine in the Church equal to it, then the unity of the Spirit, which we cannot but believe to have existed among the apostles, is denied; yea, Christ himself is divided (against 1 Cor. i. 13), and the very basis of our faith is subverted. If these men be right, then Christianity is no longer what it was in the beginning, and Christianity will not be in the future what it is now. All this has been felt strongly in Germany, and therefore a lively contest has arisen against this school. And not only have many controversial writings resulted from this movement, but a good many independent works have been published in consequence of it, by which theological science has been much advanced. And not only German Evangelical theologians, but also Roman Catholic divines of Germany and foreign theologians, especially in Holland, have taken an active part in this controversy.

It was natural that the controversy should have followed the various phases in which the hypercritical school gradually developed itself. As long as this school was yet in its first elements, and had not become fully conscious of its own principles and tendencies, the controversy against it was limited to combats upon single points at the outposts—especially with regard to the parties in the Pauline Churches, the genuineness of several of the epistles of St. Paul, and the historical character of the Acts. Among the works of this period I would mention: Dietlein, "Das Urochristenthum," and Heinrich Thiersch, "Kritischer Versuch;" both published in 1845. Works, not only of larger dimensions, but also of higher importance with regard to positive results for theological knowledge, appeared in great number during the second and third periods of this controversy. I would mention, in the province of critical research and investigation into the Scriptures of the New Testament: Leksbusch, "Die Composition und Entstehung der Apostelgeschichte." Niermeyer (Professor in Leyden), "Über den Brief an die Epheser, und über die Aechtheit der Johanneischen Schriften." Wieseler, "Chronologie des Apostolischen Zeitalters." Luthardt, "Das Johannis Evangelium." Baumgarten, "Apostelgeschichte." Wieseler, "Galaterbrief." In the province of exposition of the apostolic doctrinal system I would mention: Kook (a Dutch divine), De Petri Theologia Weiss, "Der Petrinische Lehrbegriff." Lutterbeck (Roman Catholic theologian), Die Neu Testamentlichen Lehrbegriff. Messner, Die Lehre der Apostel. Gess, "Lehre von der Person Christi." On the post-apostolic age the following works have appeared: Schliemann, Die Clementinen. Weitzel, Der Passastreit. Ritschl, Die Entstehung der Altkatholischen Kirche. And my own book, called forth as the prize essay of a learned society in Holland, "The Teyler Society:" Lechler, "Das Apostolische and das Nachapostolische Zeitalter." To which must be added two works of ecclesiastical history, treated with reference to Baur's criticisms: those of Lange (of Bonn), and Professor Schaff (of Mercersburg, North America).

I believe that an insight into the rich literature of this controversy, of which I have mentioned but a very few works, will show not only that the German theologians have zealously made a stand against the subversive errors of hypercriticism with the arms of science; but also that, in consequence of this controversy against the Tübingen School, some progress has been made in biblical knowledge. Formerly the orthodox theology was accustomed to regard primitive Christianity as an undivided unity; the differences which existed between the apostles and the primitive Churches, the variety of gifts which is manifested in the doctrinal teachings of the several apostles, were not rightly understood. Its insight into the human and natural side of the development through which primitive Christianity passed was therefore deficient. Baur and his school have endeavoured to discover the course of development of the primitive Churches; and for this purpose they have attended particularly to the differences which existed among them. Their error has been that they regarded the differences as amounting to an irreconcilable opposition, that they believed a great gulf to be fixed between the different apostles and apostolic Churches; "so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot, neither can they pass to us that would come from thence" (Luke xvi. 26).

Thus it has come to pass that the authority of the Word of God, its Divine inspiration, and the divinity of the Redeemer, have suffered violence. Help can only be brought by the weapons of sound theological science; and, as I mentioned before, science is always advanced by such controversy. The flourishing period of the Tübingen School has doubtless already passed away, and since the last five years, with the exception of discussions upon single points, scientific theologians have turned their strength to other subjects.

With sincere respect and esteem, and begging to be recommended in the kindest terms to the friends of Christian intercourse between England and Germany,

I remain yours,

G. V. LECHLER.

NOTE.—We observe in the Record of the 16th January a quotation from the German correspondent of another journal, who professes to give an account of the last end of Dr. Baur, whose erroneous views and labours have been exposed in the above article by Professor Lechler, of Leipzig. The writer, who gives this account of Dr. Baur's sad end, uses these words: "He prayed once—'Herr gewähre mir ein sanftes end' (Lord grant me a peaceful end). Even he who had always looked down upon the idea of a personal God-man with the utmost contempt, felt that there was no salvation in any other but in Jesus. We might wish that the Lord would have heard his prayer." (!) This limited and somewhat grudgeful aspiration is characteristic. "Might wish," forsooth! Surely we do wish that the Lord did hear that poor wretch's prayer? Surely we do wish that we had more grounds for hoping, that even at three-quarters past eleven of the twelfth hour, a miserable sinner had sought and found refuge in the Rock of Ages? Do we or do we not? What sort of new and savage gospel is this—"cribbed, cabined, and confined"—that seems to limit the possibilities of heavenly mercy, and to curdle the best blood of Christianity? For our part, we should rejoice to hear from any faithworthy quarter that even Baur at last had sought and found acceptance through the merciful God-man, whom he had too long resisted, "kicking against the pricks." No strong ray of hope does, indeed, beam around that deathbed, as reported in this paragraph in the Record. No hopeful expressions (as in the case of Bunsen), that the dying sinner had found Jesus Christ the only Saviour, for whom Baur seems, by this report, to have been blindly groping, as after an unknown God. But howsoever this may turn out to be, we shrink from this style of thing. Let us earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. Let us scientifically expose error, and firmly assert dogmatic truth. But let us not forget that the persons of men are distinguishable from their errors; that compassionate love towards those that are without, as well as forbearing love to the brethren, are not incompatible with faith unfeigned; and are as godlike, as well becoming miserable sinners like us, who "once had not obtained mercy" ourselves.—[EDS. EVANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM.]

THE TESTIMONY OF THE SPIRIT AND PRIVATE JUDGMENT.

Two communications have reached us on this subject. The first relates to a correspondence with Professor Dorner, and is as follows :—

The last number of Evangelical Christendom, containing the Bishop of Cork's letter to Professor M'Cosh, of Belfast, was forwarded to Dr. Dorner by the Secretary of the German Correspondence Committee, and a note has recently come to hand from Dr. Dorner, in which he states that he is at present engaged upon an article on Dr. Mansel's Bampton Lectures, and the controversy which they have called forth, in which it is his intention to include a reference, and reply to the queries set forth by Dr. Fitzgerald. It is expected that this article will appear in an early number of the Jahrbücher für Deutsche Theologie; and it is Dr. Dorner's wish that so much of it as relates to the queries should be translated and published in your journal as soon as the article appears, which the German Correspondence Committee will take care to see done without delay. They are much gratified to see the interest which this correspondence is beginning to excite in the theological mind of the country. It is something new to see an English Bishop and a German Professor comparing theological ideas with each other, and a discussion upon such subjects in such hands can be productive only of good. It was precisely such an interchange and comparison of thought that the correspondence was intended to facilitate and promote; and, doubtless, the pointed and well-weighted interrogations of the Bishop will call forth equally well-weighted and pointed answers from the Professor.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE OF GERMAN CORRESPONDENCE.

The second communication we have received is the following letter, with a request for its publication. The subject is so important, that we lay it before our readers, although we do not perceive any substantial difference between its writer's views and those advocated in the article in our last month's number; nor do we see that any very new light is thrown upon the subject, though the question is somewhat differently stated. We still prefer our own more guarded statement—viz., that, "in a certain sense, therefore, and in certain various degrees, there may be a self-evidencing light which puts an end to controversy; and yet this may be, for all practical purposes, distinguished from enthusiasm, in the injurious meaning of that word." Mr. Leitch says that this admission is of little use, and that there is no alternative but to admit "the self-evidencing power of the truth, in the most clear and unambiguous and absolute form."

Of course TRUTH, to the Divine, or to an angelic mind, free from infirmity, must be self-evidencing, absolutely, not partially. But we were speaking of the inward teachings of the Holy Spirit, which, though absolutely true, might be misapprehended by our impaired perceptions. Yet, we added, there could be no doubt but that "this Blessed Person will really lead the humble, patient, and watchful believer into all truth, according to the promises."

Mr. Leitch seems to us to assert just the same thing, only in other words. And as "humility, patience, watchfulness" (our words), and "honesty, diligence, due care, and candour" (Mr. Leitch's words), are all terms expressing qualities which are capable of degrees, so, we apprehend, there will be "various degrees" in the results to man of the absolute teaching of God.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Sirs,—Will you allow me to offer a few remarks on the article in your last number, entitled "The Testimony of the Spirit and Private Judgment," in connexion with the correspondence of Dr. Dörner, Dr. McCoish, and Dr. Fitzgerald? The question that has been started is this: How can we maintain the testimony of the Divine Spirit, even in the most illiterate believer, to be valid and even infallible, and at the same time avoid the extravagancies of enthusiasm? This inquiry is one of the most vital in the whole circle of religious experience, and is peculiarly pressing in the present circumstances of the Church.

To resort to the distinction between the practical and scientific aspects of the matter is vastly important, but is by no means sufficient to meet the difficulty in full. Allowing that historical evidences and critical arguments are in their own place valid and valuable, yet it is undeniable that they cannot be rendered palpable and satisfactory to the mass of mankind, while in fact they do not form the usual means of conversion, even in the case of learned men themselves. Scientific investigations are at the same time far from being useless; but, on the contrary, are beneficial, and even necessary, for giving additional confirmation to our practical conclusions, and leading to their full developments.

Practically and popularly, then, the question is simply this: Allowing most unequivocally that no man believes in the Bible as the Word of God, and in Christ as his Saviour, without the gracious and powerful aid of the Divine Spirit, how is any individual, who so believes, to know that he is not under a deception? How can any one be reasonably assured that what he thinks is the work of the Spirit within him, is in reality that work, and not a counterfeit? No question can be more direct or weighty than this.

If, on the one hand, nothing can guard against delusion here but the refinements of philosophy and the arcana of history, then practical Christianity is impossible for the masses. And if, on the other hand, there be not something definite and tangible on which reliance may be placed, there is no protection against the wildest sallies of superstition assuming the name of Christian piety.

To refer the individual to his own future life, as the test of the present work of the Spirit on his heart, is useful for many purposes, but is entirely irrelevant as an answer to the question before us. I believe, or think I believe, in Christ now. If the genuineness of this belief can be known to myself in no way but by the holiness of my future life, then I am deprived of all present comfort from my belief. Joy in believing is thus excluded.

We seem, thus, to be shut up to the conclusion, that the experienced adaptation of the statements of the Bible to the facts and feelings of our responsible nature is, not simply the main evidence, but in reality the only available evidence for the majority of mankind. This harmony, therefore, between Scripture and conscience, must be held to be ample and unassailable evidence on which to rest an assured confidence. It appears to be of little use to admit "a self-evidencing light," only in a certain sense, and in certain various degrees; unless that sense be most distinctly specified, and unless those degrees be exactly measured. There is, as it seems to us, no alternative but to admit the self-evidencing power of the Truth, in the most clear, unambiguous, and absolute form.

But a formidable difficulty now emerges. While the teachings of the Spirit are undeniably true, is our perception of those teachings not liable to error? How then, can a man avoid error? How can a man be sure that he is free from error? The only possible, and only satisfactory answer to this all-important and searching question is, that thorough honesty and diligence can save, and alone can save, a man from error on any question, and give him assurance that he is right. If due care and candour, when exercised in regard to any point, cannot keep a man from going wrong, nothing else can. And what can guide him aright on one question, can save him, not from ignorance, but certainly from error on any question.

The Holy Spirit is promised to lead us into all truth. This promise is emphatically and absolutely true. But whom does the Divine Spirit lead into a knowledge of the truth? He leads those only who are docile and earnest; nor is our argument affected in the slightest degree by adding that He leads those only whom he makes docile and earnest. The sole and unalterable condition on which the guidance of the Spirit of grace is vouchsafed is diligence and candour. The presence of these secures, in so far as they are present, true knowledge and heavenly wisdom. Action in the absence of these in any degree implies a corresponding degree of error and folly. The conscious possession of these in investigating any question can alone give the conscious assurance of being right on that question. It is not till a man has this testimony of his own heart that the Holy Spirit bears witness with his Spirit. (See Rom. viii. 16.)

This statement of the case does by no means imply that the same value belongs to all books and discourses propounding the Gospel scheme as to Scripture. Holy Scripture claims to be Divine, which no teacher of the Gospel since the primitive age has done. Nor does this view destroy all rational interpretation of Scripture; on the contrary, to admit that any one individual may, on the very topic on which he puts forth his energy as an honest and diligent inquirer, mistake truth for error, or error for truth; or that, when he thinks he finds the truth, he cannot be sure that he has found it—is to destroy not only all rational interpretation of Scripture, but all use of reason whatever.

This is not the place to vindicate or develop at length the principle which has now been announced. But after reading the number of Evangelical Christendom for the present month, I felt a strong call to direct the attention of your readers to this point in a sentence or two. As the writer may be expected to give his name, since the names of your other correspondents are not withheld, he subscribes himself,

Wigton, Cumberland, January, 1861.

ALEXANDER LEITCH,

DR. DONALDSON'S JASHAR.*

Six years have passed away since Dr. Donaldson amazed the Christian world by the publication of his "Jashar." The book could not fail to attract some notice, from the very extravagance of the theories propounded, but it has very seriously and deservedly injured the reputation of its author, both as a scholar and theologian. We are sorry to see a second edition issue from the press, but it bears on its front almost unmistakeable proof that it is only the first edition, cooked up anew with a new title, new preface, and a few additions at the end.

We do not know that the book has made way in any quarter, and one thing we are convinced of is, that in a very few years it will be totally forgotten. One art its author certainly does excel in, and that is in the art of reviling. His antagonists are described as "ii qui propter panes et pisciculos se in ignominiosam bibliolatrise servitutum venundederunt."

All readers of the Bible are aware that there are certain books, not now extant, to which reference is made by various of the sacred writers, such as the book of Jashar, the book of Iddo, the book of the Wars of the Lord, and others. An account of a curious forgery under the first name is given in Mr. Horne's Introduction. The reader who has not heard of Dr. Donaldson's work may be informed that it has nothing to do with that forgery. What the book of Jashar did really consist of no one knows for certain. Twice it is quoted in the Old Testament—viz., in Joshua x. 13, and 2 Sam. i. 18; and from the fact that both these quotations are in verse, Gesenius not improbably conjectures that it was an anthology of Hebrew poems. The name "Jashar" signifies "straight," "upright," and as an adjective is used with various shades of meaning repeatedly in the Hebrew scriptures. This is Dr. Donaldson's text, from which he draws a number of unwarrantable conclusions, such as: "Jashar" means "upright;" the Israelites are the chosen people, therefore Jashar must needs be a name of Israel. The book of Jashar was therefore a collection containing all those fragments which handed down the rule of religion, the marrow of the law, or which exhibited the nature of piety or uprightness, spoke of the victories of the pious Israelites, and announced their future happiness. All the passages that treat of these topics in the sacred writings of the Jews are "remains" of the book of Jashar, and the rest of these writings, as Dr. Donaldson elsewhere expresses it, are mere "bark and leaves," not to be eaten along with "the fruit from the tree of life."

* Jashar. Fragmenta Archetypa Carminum Hebraicorum in Masorethico Veteris Testamenti textu passim tessellata collegit, ordinavit, restituit, in unum corpus redegit, Latine exhibuit, commentario instruxit JOANNES GUILIELMUS DONALDSON, S. Theologus Doctor; Coll. SS. Trin. apud Cantab. quondam Socius. Editio Secunda aucta et emendata. Londini et Edinburgi: Prostat apud Williams et Norgate, 1860.

How our theologian came to this conclusion, and how he proves these points, we are not informed. His critical acumen has, at length, in his own estimation, discovered the word of inspiration; and we presume, as few persons would consider it worth their while to try to prove to others that they do exist, being fully conscious of the fact themselves, in like manner, Dr. Donaldson can only state his own belief in his restored book of Jashar, and there leaves the question, unproved and unprovable.

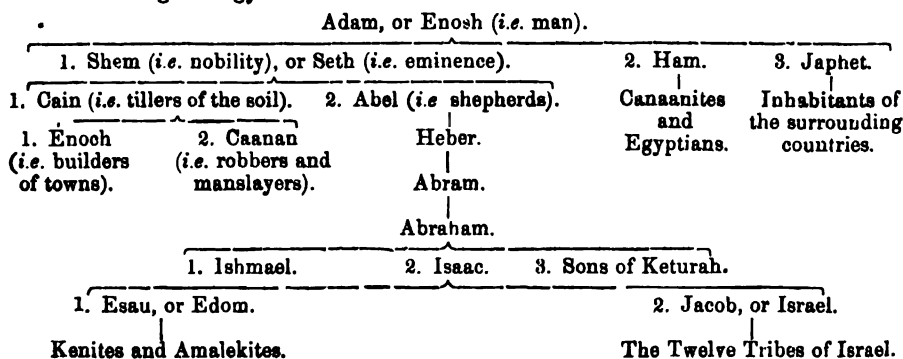

The most concise statement of the object of the work is given in the November Catalogue of Messrs. Williams and Norgate's publications, which, as it appears to have been written by Dr. Donaldson himself, we present to our readers:—

In publishing a new edition of this work, the author wishes to state its scope and purpose, which have been gravely misrepresented. Its immediate object is to restore approximately the oldest religious book of the Jews—"the book of Jashar," i.e., of the ideal true Israel—which, according to the best critics, was edited in the reign of Solomon. The inquiries to which this restoration leads establish the momentous fact that the Mosaic religion, as it existed in the time of David and Solomon, was in its spirit and principles coincident with Christianity, and that the Levitical system, with its ceremonies and sacerdotal machinery, was an innovation of much later date. It is impossible to overrate the religious and moral importance of a result which brings the law of Moses into strict harmony with the teaching of the great prophets, and justifies the rational expectation that the Jewish and Christian systems, being both Divine, must have agreed absolutely in the essentials of Divine truth on which they rested.

How the publication of this work can attain the end proposed in the last sentence better than the works of our great Reformation divines, we know not, but we would call attention to the fact, that the Divine origin of the Levitical law, and of the sacrifices it enjoined, is here denied, and, as a consequence, the work of Christ as our great High Priest, and sacrifice, and atonement, must necessarily be abjured also.

Having convinced himself of the nature and contents of the Book of Jashar, Dr. Donaldson proceeds to inquire into its age, and to unite the "disjecta membra poetæ." Assuming that the genealogies are mythical, and that it is only the signification of the names that gives us a clue to their meaning—a fact which he considers so clear, that he is afraid of his reputation as a critic, should he attempt to prove so self-evident a point—he gives us the following rather startling genealogy as the correct one: "Adam, after he was driven out of Eden, had three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet," "and Shem begat two sons, Cain, the elder, and Abel, his brother" (Dr. Donaldson must pardon us for putting these names into the shape in which they can be recognised by the unlearned).

Thus his genealogy stands:—

But how, in the first place, can Dr. Donaldson prove that Shem and Seth are the same? In the following way: Shem means "renown," "glory," and Dr. D. connects שֵׁם (Seth) with שִׁמְעַי (ש and ש being quite a matter of indifference to him), and thereby the signification dignity, majesty, is extracted, which is, of course, equal to "glory;" and he remarks, as if the writer of Genesis meant to connect the two, we have the announcement, "In the time of Seth men began to call on the name (שֵׁם) of the Lord!!!"

With respect to the distinction between שֵׁם and שִׁמְעַי, Dr. Donaldson tells us that it could not have existed before the diacritical points were invented. Although, however, the distinction in sound was not expressed in writing, that it actually did exist, may be seen from the fact that both in Arabic and Ethiopic there are distinct characters for each of the sounds. Similarly, the doubling of the letters takes place in Samaritan and Ethiopic, though not expressed in writing, owing to the imperfections of their mode of orthography.

Shem and Seth being thus identified, he next endeavours to prove that Abel was a designation of the family of Abraham. אָבֶל (Abel), according to the correct derivation, means "vanity," and is used frequently in the Hebrew writings in this signification. But idols are designated as "vanity" in the Scriptures, and therefore, argues Dr. Donaldson, the name of "vanity" could not be given to the first man, of whom it is said that he offered an acceptable sacrifice to the Lord. Some other meaning must accordingly be sought for the word. He supposes, therefore, that אָבֶל=אֶבֶר=חָבֶל, and from this, by dint of critical torture, he extracts the meaning of "he who offers an acceptable sacrifice to the Lord;" and forasmuch as Abraham's sacrifice was the most remarkable of those recorded in the Old Testament, therefore Abel is in reality the same as Abraham, mythically described in the restored book of Jashar as his progenitor!!

By a similar process of "begging the question," Noah is identified with the people of Israel, and the flood is no more than a poetical description of the march of Israel into the land of Canaan, somewhat incrustated over with Masoretic additions! The story of Jacob at Peniel really signifies the building of the temple! The contents of this part of his work Dr. D. sums up thus: "The pious Israelites, coming out of Egypt, after forty years consumed in the desert, and many other vicissitudes of fluctuating fortune, consecrate a temple to Jehovah in the land of tranquillity, under their peaceful king, Solomon!" "The raven," or black messenger, denotes the ten unbelieving spies!! "the dove," Joshua and Caleb!

The critical discernment of the editor is seen by his frequently discovering that one verse in a chapter is a lost feather of the book of Jashar, while all the rest of that chapter may consist merely of Jewish additions.

And what is the ultimate result of all this? Matter equal, perhaps, to about eighteen or twenty chapters is given us as a substitute for a great portion of our sacred Scriptures. No valid argument is assigned, no proofs worthy of the name are given, but a rash critic opens his mouth to give vent to his vagaries, and ventures to put forward a book of his own devising as all we require of the Word of God.

We have touched slightly upon the critical portion of the work; we pass by altogether the theological. We cannot enter here more largely into discussion. We will not pollute our pages, nor the minds of our readers, with a comment on Dr. Donaldson's theory of the temptation and the fall, and we would not have even alluded to his work, were it not that we think it useful to exhibit the absurd reasonings of some critics who depart from "the faith once delivered to the saints."

Foreign Intelligence.

THERE are many points of interest to which the readers' attention may be especially directed in this department of our present number.

The French article opens with a condensed review of the principal aspects under which France may just now be contemplated in her religious condition. The quasi threat of a French Patriarchate, it seems, is not deemed likely to prove a reality, although the Pope still does what he can to provoke the Emperor. The accounts which are circulated in France to the disparagement of England and her institutions, do equal credit to the ingenuity and the malice of their Jesuit propagators.

Letters from the Spanish brethren, some of them still dated from prison, exhibit the fortitude and patience of the ancient martyrs; and reveal the advancing progress of the Gospel in the face of the persecution.

Our German correspondents furnish warm panegyrics, and, as we believe, well-deserved, on the late King of Prussia. Although two of them write copiously on this subject, we have not suppressed the communication of either, since each writes, as the Germans say, from his own standpoint, and both furnish many different, but equally interesting, particulars.

A story of quiet, unostentatious, and practical female usefulness in Switzerland, reminds us of "English Hearts and Hands," as it relates to Christian efforts for the benefit of the same class of men.

The letter from Constantinople is chiefly remarkable for the curious information that an English clergyman, bearing credentials from two English bishops, has been trying to bring about a sort of union between the old Armenian Church, notwithstanding its gross corruptions, and the Church of England.

Our American friend presents but a gloomy state of things in the United States. Earnestly do we commend our Christian brethren in that country to the prayers of God's people in this; that to them and their rulers wisdom may be given in this terrible emergency; that civil war may be averted; and that while Government shall put down rebellion, justice may triumph and THE SLAVES BE SET FREE.

FRANCE.

France, January, 1861.

RETROSPECTIVE GLANCE AT THE RELIGIOUS CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

In beginning my first letter for this year, it may be well to take a brief review of what has occurred in France of the greatest importance, relative to religious matters, during the preceding twelve months.

The advocates of Pantheism and antichristian opinions generally, among whom M. Renan occupies a prominent position, have continued to publish books and pamphlets. A periodical entitled the Revue Germanique is the principal organ of this movement, which aims at producing a vague, incomprehensible religiosity, without positive doctrine, and without external worship. A few learned and talented men have put their hands to this work of demolition, but they exercise very little influence. The age of Voltaire is decidedly past. Attacks upon Christianity no longer excite men's passions, or even their interest. Frenchmen, in the present day, are too much absorbed in their business occupations to bestow much attention upon this sort of controversy. It is indifference, and not infidelity, in the proper sense of the word, which prevails among us.

Another movement, which threatens to end in a schism, or a National Catholic Church, would seem, in certain respects, to have a greater chance of success. The struggles which are constantly occurring between the Court of Rome and the French Government have certainly produced great irritation in the public mind. The illiberal and retrograde principles of the Ultramontane faction disgust the friends of liberty, and it is natural enough to seek a remedy for these grave conflicts in an ecclesiastical separation. The pamphlet on The Pope and the Emperor, by M. Cayla, has had a large number of readers. Some influential journals have pronounced the word schism, and have demanded the establishment of a French Church, with an independent patriarch. We see in the recent Papal Allocution, that these tendencies have excited serious apprehensions upon the part of the Roman Court. I do not believe, however, that there is any probability of a schismatical Church being constituted in this country. When your King Henry VIII. instituted a communion separated from Rome, religious questions occupied a larger space in men's thoughts. Every intellect and every conscience, in those days, was agitated by the Reformation preached by Luther; the soil had long been prepared, and the question arose whether England was to be despotically governed by the Papacy, or whether Popish tyranny should be abolished. The France of our day is in a totally different position. Truly religious men are few in number. Neither doctrine nor ecclesiastical discipline is the object of any real discussion among the majority of the nation. The bad temper of the Pope and his cardinals is a matter for laughter rather than dread. Where are the elements of a solid and durable schism? In order to constitute a new Church, living members of that ecclesiastical institution would be required, and we should seek them in vain. Napoleon III. will commit no such mistake: he has neither the power, the means, nor the intention to do anything of the sort.

But if the idea of schism is a chimera, the repeated repulses encountered by the clerical party are a reality. St. Peter's Penes and the Roman loan have had very poor results. The flaming appeals, the vehement solicitations of the Popish bishops, have hitherto remained almost without an echo. Certain heads of aristocratic families have given insignificant sums, and that from political motives rather than from devotion to the Pontifical See; they hope, with the help of the Papacy, to obtain the restoration of their old privileges, and the success, once more, of the Legitimist principle. At the other extremity of the social scale, a few poor, ignorant, bigoted peasants have brought their petty gifts to the village priests. That is all. The middle classes and the working men in the towns have met the requests of the clergy with cold and disdainful insensibility, and the financial distress of the Roman See is not lessened. Pius IX. is so destitute of money, in consequence of the expenses he has incurred in order that he may have an army, that he has been forced to get up a lottery, the prizes in which are the costly presents which have been given to him by European sovereigns! Is not this a warning to the clerical faction, and a proof of its extreme weakness?

Upon questions of another class, the Romish episcopate, as I wrote you lately, have made their complaints and even threats heard against the French Government. Cardinal de Bonald and several other bishops said, in haughty language, that the application of the common law or the stamp-tax to the publication of their pastoral letters would encounter insuperable difficulties. They declared themselves persecuted, as their constant phraseology is, because they were made to obey the same laws and comply with the same duties as other citizens. But the Minister of Worship, in a circular forwarded, a few days since, to the members of the episcopate, has maintained the proceeding adopted by the Minister of the Interior. When the printed letters of the bishops relate simply to religious subjects, and are circulated only amongst the rectors and their curates, they will be exempt from the stamp, as heretofore. If, on the other hand, those reverend personages, under the pretext of fulfilling their ecclesiastical duties, publish political pamphlets, and offer them for sale, they must pay the stamp-duty, like laymen. Is not this just? And will the dignitaries of the Romish Church understand, at length, that they must submit to the common law?

Some of the bishops, in despair of any other remedy, addressed themselves directly to the Emperor, thinking to obtain from him, by personal application, modifications in the general policy of the Government. Napoleon III. received the prelates with courtesy, and lent an attentive ear, if I am well-informed, to their remonstrances; but he has made no change in his plans or his mode of proceeding. This is a proof of his foresight. In fact, Rome and the Popish bishops are his irreconcilable enemies. They can disguise their hostility, assume a humble attitude, and employ kind and conciliatory language; they are accustomed, under critical circumstances, to assume every mask imaginable; but in the depths of their hearts, and in reality, the princes of the Romish Church will never pardon the Emperor for having fought beside the Italians for the independence of their country. They see in him the most formidable adversary of the Papacy—a new Julian the Apostate. The King adopted by the priests in their secret thoughts is the Pretender, Henry V., the heir of the old Bourbons, and the natural ally of the old Church; and if Pius IX. had the power, he would immediately overthrow the man who has been raised to the throne by the suffrages of the people. Napoleon III. is aware of this clerical feeling of dislike towards him, and he therefore keeps upon his guard—and he does well.

I shall conclude this retrospective review by a few words upon a pamphlet entitled Rome and the Bishops. The author has not revealed his name. It seems that it is the work of a priest, M. Laine, one of the Emperor's chaplains. It appears also that Napoleon III. read the pamphlet before publication, and that certain passages in it were suggested or corrected by him. These circumstances have given to the work an importance it would not otherwise have obtained. The anonymous writer declares himself energetically against the temporal power of the Pope, and he reminds us of the simplicity and the glory of the primitive Church. He blames the bishops for having subordinated to worldly interests the holy cause of religion, and he counsels the Roman Pontiff to renounce his dignity as a prince, in order that he may exercise singly his spiritual supremacy. You may judge what furious outcries this pamphlet has called forth in the clerical camp!

In a word, last year was not a good one for the partisans of the Papacy, and the new year threatens to be still worse. All Italy is, as it were, upon a volcano; troops are being raised with feverish activity, and the city of Rome is the true capital of the regenerated country.

REFLECTIONS OF THE FRENCH PRESS ON THE LAST ALLOCATION OF PIUS IX.

We come to still more recent events.—I have already mentioned the Allocation which Pius IX. delivered in the secret consistory of the 17th of December. This address, like all the Pontifical harangues, is filled with the grossest abuse. The responsible officials of the Roman Court are ignorant of the language of well-educated persons; they descend to the style of the most scurrilous libellers, and think they are showing how forcible they can be, by employing terms which it is really a disgrace to use. The malady would really seem to be quite incurable.

But we say no more of that. One thing in this Allocation that has particularly offended the French press, is that Pius IX. has not, by a single word, expressed his gratitude to the French Government, which incurs heavy expenses at Rome, in order to protect his crown and person. If our troops were to quit the Vatican, it is certain that the authority of the Papacy would not last twenty-four hours, whatever assistance might be rendered by the Pontifical gendarmes and volunteers. It is to the soldiers of France that Pius IX. owes it that he is still seated upon his throne. This service well deserves a few words of thanks. But no: the Papal Allocation preserved complete silence on the point.

This is not all. Some days later—on the 29th December—the Roman Pontiff said to two hundred volunteers, who had received the communion from his hands, "I, a poor weak old man, bereft of everything, alone, without help, without support, I yet make my enemies afraid, and am a strange difficulty to them. . . ."—The Siecle newspaper publishes, on this subject, the following remarks: "We are astonished to learn from the mouth of the Pope that he is alone, without help, without support. What! even the clerical papers acknowledge that the French troops are the only obstacles presented to the complete, immediate, instantaneous overthrow of the Government of the cardinals; and the Pope pretends that he is alone and without support! This admits of but one good reply: to take him at his word." Perhaps this counsel will be followed. The Italians are impatiently calling out for the possession of Rome, and Napoleon III. will grow weary of protecting, for an indefinite time, a Pontiff who responds to his good offices only by disdain and ingratitude.

VACANCIES IN SEVERAL EPISCOPAL SEES.

I spoke, on a former occasion, of the refusal of the Pope to confirm the nomination of a bishop (Evangelical Christendom, Oct., 1860). At that period only one episcopal see was vacant—that of Vannes, in the province of Brittany—and the Abbé Maret, selected by the Imperial Cabinet to occupy the dignity, may have been, from his Gallican opinions, an object of suspicion to the Court of Rome. But, since then, the evil has sensibly increased. Five or six bishops have died in the interval. The episcopal sees of Troyes, Soissons, Perigueux, Anancy, &c., have been deprived of their occupants. The French Government have nominated other priests to these sees, and have published their names in the Moniteur. They have been careful to choose ecclesiastics who would not be objectionable to the Ultramon- tanes. These nominees are most honourable and religious men, and known to be most completely devoted to the Roman See.

Well, to the present hour not one of these ecclesiastics has been able to obtain from Pius IX. confirmation, or canonical investiture to his charge, and certain functions, exclusively episcopal, cannot be performed in six or seven dioceses. The Pope persists in not fulfilling the part which belongs to him in the appointment of bishops; he prefers rather to satisfy his resentment than to provide for the religious wants of the population. What will be the issue of this conflict?

A Ministerial journal, La Patrie, has inserted a very moderate and judicious article on the affair. It reminds us that Popes Innocent XI. and Alexander VIII., in the reign of Louis XIV., pursued the same course, and that one-third of the episcopal sees in the kingdom of France were vacant. In vain did Louis XIV., in order to show his courtesy to the Pontifical See, revoke the Edict of Nantes and depopulate his kingdom of his best subjects; the Popes remained inflexible, because they were dissatisfied with the four famous propositions adopted in 1682, with the consent of the King and Bossuet, in the assembly of the clergy. At length, Pope Innocent XII., more peaceable than his predecessors, consented, after a series of painful efforts, lasting twelve years, to confirm the bishops who had been nominated.

Roman Catholicism in France suffered, a second time, the same privation in the reign of Napoleon I. Pius VII. had systematically resolved not to confer canonical investiture upon any bishop, and he remained faithful to his decision in exile and imprisonment. You see this is a terrible weapon that the Papacy has in its hands. When Pius IX. asserts that he is a weak old man, he is mistaken; for not a Romish bishop can exist in the world without his formal approbation; and when, in this skilfully constructed system, there is a want of bishops, all ecclesiastical proceedings are impeded.

What, then, should be done? There is a radical defect here. The Pope should be compelled to institute the bishops at the end of a given time, or at least to indicate the reasons on account of which he refuses them his sanction. But no such obligation is imposed upon him: he is master, absolutely and irresponsibly; and he has the sovereign right of doing nothing and saying nothing. Happy the people whose religion is not subject to the political calculations or the caprice of a foreign ruler!

OUTCRIES OF THE JESUIT PARTY AGAINST THE ALLIANCE BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

The Ultramontanes and the Jesuits, dissatisfied with the events which have occurred in France and Italy, continue their crusade against England. We have every morning fresh diatribes, in the style, and with the logic, which distinguish the disciples of Ignatius Loyola. I open, hap-hazard, a number of the Monde, the successor of the Univers, and, I am sure, before I look, to find such sentences as the following, which I copy textually, for the entertainment of your readers: "It is the unanimous opinion of sensible men that the social condition of England is rapidly descending from one stage of decay to another (subit une décadence rapide et progressive); frigid selfishness, individualism, and the worship of the golden calf, prevail there, without being shared by any other object; poverty is, in England, a crime, which has no other refuge than the workhouse, with its lingering death-struggle; gold is the first necessity, and no criminal act is spared to procure it. Socialist doctrines will obtain in that country a certain victory. . . . The English aristocracy has sacrificed everything to its boundless ambition and to its insatiable thirst for wealth. The scourge of humanity, it has carried discord and civil war to every shore; there is not a corner of the globe where it has not inscribed its name in characters of blood. . . . The people, whom this aristocracy ought to protect, to feed, to civilise, it has reduced to the condition of the brute. The day when this vast scheme for making a pecuniary speculation of the human race shall cease, civilisation and Christianity will raise a shout of triumph, and the world will bow, without a murmur, at the justice of God."

Such are the daily amenities of the Jesuits towards the English nation. And why all this? In order to break, if possible, the alliance between England and France. That alliance is a perpetual nightmare to them; it is their Delenda Carthago. The inhabitants of Great Britain are heretics; that is the first crime that the Jesuitical faction cannot pardon. Then they everywhere support the principles of civil and religious liberty; here is a second grievance. And lastly, they are rich and powerful, which is a third cause of irritation. If our political destinies were in the hands of the Ultramontanes, a sanguinary war would be declared against England to-morrow, and France would unite with Austria. But these transports of passion are impotent and contemptible. Intelligent men in this country feel deeply that social order in Europe and civilisation are intimately dependent upon a continuous good understanding between the two great Western States.

EVANGELICAL EFFORT IN THE HIGH ALPS.

There is at Geneva a Society for Scattered Protestants, and its sphere of activity extends over several provinces of France. It held its annual meeting, which was numerously attended, on the 16th of December. Some very interesting reports were presented, especially the account of a tour of evangelisation performed by M. Marchand, a theological student, in the valley of Queyras, in the High Alps.

Everybody who has read any of the biographical notices of Felix Neff, is aware that that apostle of modern times visited, for many years, these uncultivated regions. He there found hundreds of mountaineers, who, having been converted to the true faith by the reading of the Bible during the middle ages, had persevered in the profession of the truth, notwithstanding the atrocious persecutions to which they were subjected by the Romish Church. They are the French Vaudois, who communicate, across the glaciers of the Alps, with those of Piedmont. The intrepid Felix Neff exhausted his strength and early manhood in their service, and he died prematurely, like a martyr—preaching to them the Word of Life.

These Protestants of the High Alps have no stated worship conducted by pastors. Their climate is so severe, and the means of communication so difficult, that few ministers of the Gospel have the courage to encounter these difficulties. M. Marchand visited the mountaineers from house to house; he made himself acquainted with their religious condition; recommended to them the practice of domestic worship, and insisted on the duty of their bringing up their children in the thorough knowledge of the truth. These visits and appeals were received with the most cordial good feeling, especially by the young people, who accompanied the evangelist over the snowy sides of the Alps, singing hymns. These little flocks of Protestants have not forgotten the fervent exhortations of Felix Neff; they take a lively interest in the things which relate to the salvation of their souls. Several families expressed their firm resolution to read the Word of God regularly every evening. Some Sunday-schools were established. M. Marchand presided over a numerous meeting, on the summit of the Alps, 8,000 feet above the level of the sea. The service lasted more than two hours; all were very attentive. May God bless these pious efforts!

THE PRINCIPLES AND THE WISHES OF THE ORTHODOX FRENCH PROTESTANTS.

I have repeatedly spoken to your readers of the crisis of the Protestant Church of France, in view of the audacious negations of the new school of theology. The Rev. M. Grandpierre, editor-in-chief of the Esperance paper, which is the organ of the orthodox of our communion, has thought proper to publish a sort of solemn declaration, which gives a summary of the principles and wishes of his brethren, as well as of his own. M. Grandpierre's profession of faith is firm and decided; his language is clear; and this demonstration will produce, upon serious minds, a good effect.

The worthy Parisian pastor testifies that he believes in a direct revelation from God, contained in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. He sees throughout the Bible the divinely-inspired Word. He declares that Jesus Christ united in His person true humanity and perfect divinity, and that He truly died for our sins, in order to reconcile us to God by His atoning sacrifice. He professes the necessity of personal conversion and regeneration by the power of the Holy Spirit. As to his ecclesiastical principles, M. Grandpierre demands the re-establishment of the Presbyterian system, with its local synods and its General Assembly.

Let us hope that this manifesto will be one step towards the reorganization of our Church upon stable foundations, and in conformity with our traditional convictions.

SPAIN.

FURTHER PARTICULARS RELATING TO THE RECENT PERSECUTION.

Measures are still in progress to effect, either by law or diplomacy, the deliverance of Mata-moros and Alhama from the grasp of their persecutors. It will be seen, by the letters we subjoin, that the former left his prison for Malaga on the 26th December last. By the pecuniary aid furnished from this country, he was able to provide himself with a place in the steamer. Efforts are making to procure for him the best legal advocacy that can be obtained when he is put on his trial. In the meantime, it is very gratifying to observe, both that he continues to manifest the Christian steadfastness which his letters exhibit, and that, as was the case under similar circumstances in earlier times, his bonds and imprisonment are turning out for the furtherance of the Gospel.

Since the interview with Lord John Russell, which we mentioned in our last, Sir C. E. Hardley has addressed and published a letter to his lordship, the design of which is to show that a feeling in favour of Religious Liberty extensively prevails among the Spanish people. Testimonies to this effect have been collected by him from various quarters, from which we make the following extracts:—

“The Rev. A. C. Dallas, Rector of Wonston, who served as an officer in the Peninsular war, and who occasionally re-visits Spain—knowing the language well, and taking a lively interest in the people—writes:—

“Undoubtedly there are large numbers of Spaniards who adhere to the ancient Castilian notions regarding the religious unity of the kingdom; but it is equally undoubted that a vast number of Spaniards are influenced by a hearty desire for religious freedom, and the liberty of worshipping God according to their consciences, who have been much enlightened by the private but extensive circulation of the Scriptures. The uniform testimony of all those persons who have taken pains to overcome the reluctance of Spaniards to place themselves in difficulty, by expressing their true feelings, tends to prove that the preparation of the people to receive the truth, and to leave their constrained connexion with the Church of Rome, is very great indeed, and that there is great ripeness for the reception of Religious Liberty. I was in the South of Spain in 1857, and having lived long in Spain in my earlier years, and speaking the language, I had a facility in discovering the feelings of the people. I took pains to do this, and I never got any Spaniard into quiet and private conversation without finding that there was more or less of a desire for the power of expressing religious opinions freely. . . . I believe that a vast multitude are deeply dissatisfied with the present state of things in respect to religion—that many have embraced the truth of scriptural doctrines in their hearts who dare not avow it, and that very many more are in a state which may be called “ripe for the reception of the principles of Religious Liberty.”

“Samuel Hanson, Esq., who has large transactions with Spain, sends me a letter from a trustworthy correspondent in that country, referring to your lordship's observations at the interview at the Foreign-office. The following is an extract:—

“Except a few bigoted and ignorant priests, there is now but little religious bigotry left in Spain. The newspapers in Madrid which go as far as they are permitted by the Government in advocating Religious Liberty have a larger circulation than those which are opposed to it, and these newspapers are almost entirely in the hands of the priesthood. Religious fanaticism has passed away in Spain, a proof of which may be seen in the coolness with which they have looked on the Pope's misfortunes, and indifference has taken its place. On questions of morality there is no such thing as “public opinion,” and in the case in point, if the Government were to release D. Manuel Matamoros and José Alhama, they need fear no opposition from the people, while on the other hand, both may rot in the dungeons before the Spanish people ask their release. If anything is to be done for them, it must be done in England.”

“The Rev. Dr. Rule, Wesleyan Minister in Gibraltar and Cadiz for many years, writes to me:—

“I have known Spain either by residence in the country, or communication with it, ever since the death of Ferdinand VII., in 1833. The overwhelming reaction of public feeling which then took place, resulted in the suppression of monasticism, the confiscation of the Church property, the final abolition of the Inquisition (now attempted to be imitated by “the Tribunal of the Faith”), and even in the suspension of ordination to the priesthood during seven years; thus proving to the world that the Spanish people are not reconciled to priestly tyranny. It is my conviction, from all I have ever heard, up to the present time, that the intelligent Spaniards all over that country regard the priests with enmity, as the main support of Government in every measure of repression; and I cannot but fear that they will be the object of vengeance whenever another revolution shall take place.”

“Dr. Tregelles, of Plymouth, the well-known scholar and linguist, who passed much of this last summer in Spain, and who had the opportunity of intercourse with Spaniards of various classes and in many parts, tells me, that while rigid adherence to the Romish system, and intolerance of all other forms of worship, are still very marked, there are many Spaniards, not merely amongst those avowing Protestant principles, but also amongst those in other respects attached to the Romish faith, who deeply deplore the existing restrictions on liberty of worship, and the consequent persecutions. Such members of the Roman Catholic Church earnestly desire to see in Spain Religious Liberty. Dr. Tregelles is acquainted with several of this class himself, and he knows of many others. Those who hold Protestant principles are scattered throughout Spain, and their numbers are far greater than is commonly supposed, while there are also many wh are hindered from the avowal of their sentiments by the restraints under which they live. All these would rejoice in any effort to confer on Spain the blessing of liberty of worship; and to such the frank expression of sympathy on the part of this country would not only be acceptable, but practically useful, from the moral effect that such expression would have on Spain in general.

"But these English testimonies are as nothing compared with evidences derived from distinguished Spaniards of opposite parties.

"The first I shall mention is the report upon the state of Spain, published in the *Civiltà Cattolica of last month (November), communicated to the editors by their own Spanish correspondent. The Civiltà Cattolica, your lordship may be aware, is the literary organ of the Church of Rome in the City of Rome itself. It is conducted with remarkable ability, and is very much to the clerical party in Italy what the Revue des Deux Mondes is to the literary and scientific party of progress in France.

"The Spanish correspondent, under date of October, writes:—

"This year we have had no tumults; but instead, an intense agitation of those passions from which tumults and revolutions arise, an agitation much intensified by the terrible effects produced by the late lamentable events in Italy.

"Whoever looks into our ultra-Liberal periodicals will be horrified and scandalised in seeing with what shameful audacity the Holy Father, the Roman Church, and whoever shows himself devoted to the laws, the throne, and the dynasty of Isabella II., are attacked."

"This is strong proof of what Spanish opponents of religious freedom think of the state of the public mind in their own country.

"A still more curious paper (on the opposite side of politics) has been put into my hands by a British merchant in London, largely engaged in Spanish trade, and who assures me that he knows it to have been signed by numerous and influential personages.

"Allow me, however, first to tell your lordship that the Evangelical Alliance has no sympathy whatever with revolution, and that in quoting this paper I have no intention of homologating, to use a Scottish expression, the views and hopes of Don Juan de Bourbon. What every Christian Englishman desires for any country deprived of religious freedom, I take it bonâ fide to be—not a violent change of dynasty, but the conversion of the reigning family to better, wiser, and more Christian views. With this explanation, I make the following extract from the document in question, which is an address to the Pretender to the Throne of Spain, now residing in England [Prince Juan de Bourbon].

"I omit the political portion of the address. On the religious question the memorialists say:—

"But the motive which induces us especially to offer you to-day our homage of sympathy is the proclamation of Religious Liberty. The law of Religious Liberty is a monument of respect which reason raises to the natural law of a free conscience. On this account this law has been so easily admitted and adopted in all civilised countries, including even Rome.

"In Spain only they have not adopted this. Whilst religious worship is freely practised in Tetuan, and tolerance is imposed by force as far as Fez and Cochín-China, numerous associations of nuns are organised in the Peninsula, under the protection of Queen Isabella. Through their influence on the education of the fair sex, they dexterously contrive to conduct us to the most horrible epochs of inquisitorial fanaticism. A measure which would withhold from us these new calamities would attract, in the political sense, great advantages to the riches and the prosperity of the country. Many opulent strangers of all nations and countries would come to enrich ours with their ideas, their knowledge, and their capital, and to enjoy our soil and our havens, if our religious prejudices did not keep them at a distance from beautiful Spain.

"We can assure you, Prince, that such are the ideas and aspirations of the Spanish people, counteracted only by the Jesuitical influences which surround the throne of Isabella II. Thousands of all classes and conditions have manifested their adhesion to them, and thousands of signatures would be added to those who sign this declaration, if considerations, easily to be understood, did not induce them for the present to abstain from contracting engagements which circumstances do not permit them to perform.

"May heaven and mankind give you support and fortify you courageously in the generous ideas which you have proclaimed.

"Madrid, Nov. 25, 1860."

[Here follow the signatures.]

We now add two letters addressed by Matamoros from his prison, the one to N. Alonzo, the young priest whose conversion occasioned the persecution, and the other to our friend Mr. Greene. The memorial enclosed in the latter will afford great encouragement to all who are helping forward the cause of Protestant truth in Spain:—

"National Prison, Barcelona, Dec. 13, 1860.

"Dearest Brother in the Lord,—You have done well, dear brother, in writing to me. My thoughts have been constantly fixed on you since I left Granada. I have not forgotten you for a moment. I have prayed constantly to the Lord for your well-being, for the steadfastness of your faith, and for upholding you in every Christian grace. . . .

"God will not forsake us, dear brother; His Holy Spirit is constantly with us. In our poor country, tyrants rejoice in our sufferings—all their energies, all their desires, all their highest aims, are to augment the fetters which bind down our liberties and blight our hopes. They labour, agitate, and hasten to present to us, with inquisitorial cleverness, horrible scenes, to annihilate us. But, unfortunate people, they do not understand that we are peaceful, satisfied, and proud of our lot. Rejoice, brother, for since the day of my imprisonment the enthusiasm in Malaga has increased, as in my letters I have exhorted them not to be weary. At first their hearts sunk at the rigour of the tyrants; but since they have understood that they must go forward with a double speed, and they have done so. Thirty-seven new converts have been added to the Church, and the spirit of grace is every day more comforting and more deeply rooted in the hearts of that Christian band. Many prayers ascend daily for the deliverance of our Church, now so fiercely persecuted by these enemies of Christ. They are bringing an action against them and me in Malaga at the present time, and notwithstanding, this only serves to increase our numbers, and to inspire us with new courage. Yes, dear brother, my physical forces are sinking rapidly: my weak flesh fails me, and the thread of life appears nearly spun out. The dampness of these prisons is killing me: but, dear brother, every step I take towards the tomb, every grain of sand that falls through life's glass, is a powerful—yes, an indestructible force, which strengthens my faith and my joy, and enables me to anticipate my last hour with rejoicing, and with a peace I was a perfect stranger to until I found Christ.

"Oh! how I praise the supreme Creator for this benefit of His inexhaustible love. Dear brother, I have always felt an indestructible love and fear to the Lord before and since my imprisonment, and if it could serve in the least to forward our holy cause, I beseech the Almighty that He would prolong it to the end of my days. I beg you, also, dear brother, will pray for this. Do, for I do not desire the well-being of my body, which is destined to death, and my greatest consolation would be to know that my sufferings had been beneficial to humanity. What signifies one day more or less here below? What signifies one more pang? Nothing, when it is for the greatest, for the only holy cause.

"Your letter gave me great comfort. I rejoice to see the just tribute which English Christians have rendered to your virtues and those of Alhama. But I deserve it not, and all that you say with reference to myself only makes me ashamed. I do not deserve such honour as these noble brethren have conferred upon me. I have done only what it was my duty to do. During the last fortnight there have occurred here things worthy of special mention. The Society of St. Vincent de Paul has exhausted every possible means to induce me to retract my declaration. The chaplain of that establishment, the notary in my case, and the president of that inquisitorial institution, have offered me their most cordial support for the recovery of my liberty, if I will retract my declaration, and I have complained to the governor of their barbarous abuses. I rejected their propositions with contempt. I have told them plainly that they were insulting me, and that if they repeated their unworthy act I should feel obliged to refuse to admit them into my dungeon.

"I also sent a communication to the papers, which they have not inserted. You can hardly imagine with what sagacity and skill they have made these proposals to me. They were careful not to wound my delicacy, and made their offers hypothetically; but I, understanding their object, rose and answered them in strong and suitable language, and retired without even taking leave. They began by reminding me of the orphanhood of my family, the state of my health, my resources, and the sorrowful future that lay before me. 'I am only sorry on account of my family,' I told them. 'The rest, gentlemen, is of so little consequence, that I would lay down not one life alone for the benefit of the Gospel cause, but one thousand, if I had them.' They answered me with sagacity, and made the proposition to which I replied as I stated above.

"In spite of the state of my health, I must go shortly to Granada. I am only waiting a letter from Mr. G—, and from thence I shall write to him at length, giving him every intelligence. I must remain here no longer. I am injuring the brethren imprisoned at Malaga, and above all, Alhama, and I am determined to go, but I do not think my health will improve. I am waiting to be called before the Superior Tribunal with anxiety. I shall present myself before them as the law permits, and shall defend myself energetically. I desire to prove to them why I have cast away tradition, the only support of the Church of Rome. I desire to prove to them that my conduct is worthy of a true Christian, and I will send you my defence, which I shall write from Granada; and yet, dear Alonzo, I am sorry to leave this place. My room is a little focus of Gospel light. I have three converts among the prisoners, whose protests I hold, and who will, I trust, be virtuous Christians. Oh, how much an energetic evangelic propaganda is needed in this house of crime! The chaplain of the prison is satisfied with celebrating the sacrilegious and unbloody sacrifice of the mass. God rejoices in the conversion of the most miserable. Our Lord came not to save the righteous, but sinners; and in these prisons His Holy Word should be preached with double fervour. Be dili-humble pastors received by the King, invited to his table, and there met with those who bore the most illustrious names and sustained the highest dignities! In an easy conversation with them he would put a host of questions, which would make him acquainted with the moral and religious condition of the countries in which they lived. This, to him, was evidently the great subject, the important point, which excited his interest.

Among these visitors, a great number came to recommend to the Royal benevolence Christian efforts, in which he took a considerable and active part, not only in Prussia, but in other countries. And observe how he received them. One example among a thousand others, taken from the best source, will suffice. It was a little after the terrible political storm of 1848, which broke Frederick William's loving heart. A young minister of the Gospel, M. Z——, the pastor of a little German congregation, in a maritime city in the South of France, established and supported, to a great extent, by the bounty of the King of Prussia, for the promotion of the interests of his charge, made a visit to Germany, his native country. His principal object was to reach Berlin and the generous patron of his congregation. He went to Sans-Souci, and presented himself to the Minister of the King's household, at that time the excellent Count S——, who said to him, "You have arrived at an unfortunate moment. There is a grand dinner at Court, and his Majesty cannot receive you. Wait, however, in this room." In a few minutes afterwards the King entered; he had quitted his company in order to spend at least half-an-hour in conversation with the young pastor. Having informed himself of the welfare of his poor little flock of sailors, to the minutest details, he said to him, "I have not forgotten either you or your poor folks, but I cannot do all that I wish; for," he added, with a smile, "you know it is no longer I who hold the purse-strings (alluding to the recently-established constitutional system of government). However, be quite at ease; I am going to give my orders for you." And those orders were not long in being executed. Would not those who have to do the rough work of collecting be happy if they were often received in this manner? The history of the extensive charitable establishments of M. Fliedner, at Kaiserwerth, and M. Wiehern, at Hamburg, and of a hundred other philanthropists, who have been engaged in alleviating the sufferings and burdens of our poor humanity, will reveal upon every page, the name of the King of Prussia. He showed his wish to imitate these men of God himself, by founding at Berlin, at his own cost, the noble establishment called Bethany, for the relief of poor persons in sickness.

Pious and charitable, however, though he was, the King was not without his faults, some of which were the more apparent as they resulted from an energetic character and a most ardent temperament. Such were his irritability and hasty temper. But these he was humble enough to acknowledge and decidedly Christian enough to lament and to endeavour to correct. To this work of sanctification he gave himself in intimate religious communion with that excellent consort whom God had given him—the Queen Elizabeth. On his accession to the throne he said to her, "The King must, in future, know nothing of the bursts of passion of the Prince Royal, for they might have the most deplorable results." A little while afterwards the King gave an audience, which seemed far from being agreeable to him; for the loud tones which reached the ears of the Queen, in an adjoining room, gave unmistakable evidence of a relapse. She entered the audience chamber, as though looking for something, in order that her presence might remind the King of his forgotten resolution. "Elise, was suchst du?" he asked, impatiently. "What are you looking for?" "I am looking for the King, and I can only find the Prince Royal," answered the Queen, in a low voice, passing near him, as she proceeded to leave the apartment. The King pressed her hand, and the audience ended in peace. Alas! one who struggled yet more powerfully against the tendencies of his evil heart, said, long ago, "The good that I would, I do not: but the evil that I would not, that I do."

Piety, charity, humility, all these traits of the religious character of Frederick William are well known. What are less so, especially in foreign countries, are his broad, generous, liberal principles in relation to the government of the Church. In politics he may have preferred a personal system of government—immediate relations between himself and a people to whom he was ardently attached—though, even when the reaction having triumphed, all power was in his own hands, he faithfully observed the oath he had sworn to the constitution. As to the Church, of which, as in the case of every other sovereign in Germany, the law constituted him the supreme bishop (summus episcopus, as the term, borrowed from Romanism, is), his first wish was to give up all control over it to those to whom it belonged (in die rechten Hände was his own phrase); that is to say, to the Church herself. He did not swerve from these oft-repeated declarations; he proved the sincerity of them by a number of acts, dating from his accession. He hastened to put an end to the struggle which had taken place during the preceding reign, with the Roman Catholic episcopate, on the subject of mixed marriages; he gave full religious liberty to the Lutheran Separatists; put an end to the oppressive proceedings by which a new liturgy was imposed upon the Churches, &c. He did more than this. In 1846 he convened a Constituent Synod of the Protestant Church of the whole kingdom. The plan of a constitution was carefully prepared, in every article of which might be traced the deep, enlarged Christian spirit of the venerable Dr. Nitzsch, who had the largest share in drawing it up. In 1860, in order to separate the affairs of the Church from those of the political administration, he created a Superior Ecclesiastical Council, to which he summoned men the most eminent for their piety and wisdom. On the same day he published a parochial constitution, which was put in force only in certain provinces. It is this work in which M. von Bethmann-Hollweg is still engaged at the present time. At length, in 1856, as a last attempt, the King convened at Berlin a numerous conference of men of greatest mark in the Church, to submit to them the question of the convocation of the General Synod. The report made by the conference was in the negative! "Scarcely in any State whatever," says a distinguished Württemberg writer, the author of a remarkable History of Presbyterianism, "has the State done so much for the independence of the Church, and no prince has more decidedly expressed a wish not to use his rights as supreme bishop, in order that the Church might, by her own vital power, raise herself to a condition of self-government."*

Why did not so many generous efforts secure the end sought? That question we are about to answer, and this will enable us to indicate more clearly than we have hitherto done the King's position in relation to the religious affairs of his age.

Everybody is aware that the powerful reaction of the Evangelical faith against Rationalism which marked the first half of the present century in Germany, assumed, on the one hand, a character to a great extent scriptural, under the influence of the Neanders, the Nitzschs, the Tholucks, and their noble school; and, on the other hand, a strictly orthodox, confessional character, having for its standard the journal edited by Hengstenberg, and for its party that of Ultra-Lutheranism. But while in other German countries this extreme Lutheranism has been developed as a purely theological, ecclesiastical, clerical tendency, in Prussia it has made an alliance with political principles and a political policy completely despotic. Despotism in Church and State, ruled by the same sceptre, under the same monarchy—such was the scheme; in other words, a Christian theocracy, somewhat after the fashion of the theocracy of the Hebrews, but much narrower than it ever was in Israel, with whom the priesthood, under the sanction of the Mosaic law, was independent of secular rule. Thenceforth every political or social improvement coming from the heart of the nation, and every ecclesiastical improvement coming from the heart of the Church, fell beneath the same anathema. Nothing was true, nothing was Divine, but what came down from the throne. These principles found their politico-religious organ in the Neue Preussische Zeitung, with its cross prominently displayed as a device (which led to its being commonly called the Kreuzzeitung, or Cross Journal), with the motto encircling it, "Onward with God, for King and Country."

Now what was the King's position relatively to this party? As respects his religious views and sentiments, he never belonged to it; but he yielded to it, and during his reign it had the ascendancy. This may seem a contradiction, but thus it was, and how, it is not very difficult to explain.

While the King personally cherished his broad and generous Christian sentiments; while he loved every truly Evangelical section of the Church; while he selected from them all the preachers for the Berlin Cathedral; while he sympathized with the great Evangelical Alliance movement; welcomed the Alliance to his palace at Berlin, at the moment when all the party journals poured upon it a torrent of anathemas, calumnies, and abuse; while, in a word, he endeavoured, as we have seen, to raise the Church to the independence which belongs to her, his Government pursued the opposite course. Why? At first, because the King's political sympathies lay in that direction (he believed, as we have said, in a personal system of government), and the Ministry, to whom he had given his confidence, were in favour of the tendencies of that party. Then he found that several men of that party were possessed of real piety, not to be questioned, and who gained his confidence, while unhappily, in Germany, liberal principles are generally associated with more or less decided opposition to vital, practical Christianity. We may add that the King, with all his brilliant qualities, was not the vir tenax propositi, and that he was always deficient in consistent firmness. Especially was his tender heart, his delicate, sometimes over-anxious conscience, too accessible to the scruples which it was an easy matter for others artfully to insinuate into his breast. "What, Sire, you wish to emancipate the Church, to assemble a synod, to order elections to take place in all the parishes in the kingdom? Why you are stirring up an agitation of the question of representative government; you are arousing democracy in the Church; the infidel masses will give you a synod of their quality, who will make a Church after its own image. . . ." And in the National Church system who does not see that these objections are well-founded? Then the King resorted to his Ecclesiastical Council, to which he summoned men very much opposed to the dominant party, who frequently obstructed or altered his measures, and who even ended by achieving a victory over him. The retirement of Dr. Stahl had no other meaning. Thus the remarkable inconsistency between the King's personal sentiments and the course pursued in religious affairs was very deplorable, but it is to be explained only too easily. In other circumstances and in peaceful times, the reign of Frederick William, conducted in full harmony with his own ideas and with the feelings of his heart, would have been distinguished in history as among those which have, since the Reformation, contributed most to liberty of conscience and the independence of the Church. As it is, the faithful historian, in narrating it, will say: The King, even when he erred, wished to do right; and not a little that was right he really did.

* Dr. Leebler, in the great work entitled, "Real Encyclopédie für Protest. Theologie u Kirche" (ed. ii.), p. 166.

In the inscrutable wisdom of God, a heavy affliction was in reserve for him during the concluding years of his life. An incurable malady, the seat of which was in the brain, and the crises of which were similar to those of strokes of apoplexy, gradually weakened and at length extinguished that brilliant intellect. All that the august invalid retained of it appeared to be concentrated in his heart's affections, which overflowed in words of love towards those whom he tenderly loved on earth, and towards his Divine Saviour. His mental faculties, often obscured with reference to other ideas, were always able to minister to the wants of his soul, as he imbibed consolation from the Word of God, and fed upon the promises and hopes of the Gospel. This it was which constituted his strength and life during the three long years of his painful trial. The clergy of the cathedral and of the Royal household, M. Strauas, M. Snethlage, and M. Hoffmann, were in constant attendance upon him, reading the Scriptures, offering prayers, and informing him of facts relative to the advancement of the cause of God, in which he never ceased to take an interest. Thus he was acquainted with the religious revivals in America, in Ireland, and in Scotland, and felt and expressed the utmost joy that they had taken place.

To the last hour, calm contemplation and prayer were the marked characteristics of this Royal deathbed. The official Prussian journal (Staats Anzeiger) rendered this noble testimony before the entire nation on the morrow of the King's death: "The greatest consolation for his faithful subjects," it said, "is to know that, to the end, he kept the faith; that he constantly derived submission from the Word of God, which was abundantly dispensed to him, and that upon it he rested for his eternal salvation, through the sole merits of his Saviour Jesus Christ." Then enumerating all the attendants who, in tears, surrounded the King's couch, the same journal again mentions M. Snethlage, "whose fervent prayers accompanied the departing spirit in its latest earthly moments."

If these recollections are, as the official journal justly remarks, the greatest consolation of all those by whom Frederick William was beloved, what must they not be to the heart of that pious widow (the Queen) who, during her husband's long affliction, never ceased, for one instant, to lavish upon him the most tender care and devoted attention, notwithstanding the fatigue and exhaustion resulting from enfeebled health? She is left to finish her earthly journey alone. May the same merciful God, the same Saviour, the same Friend of the afflicted, who so powerfully supported the King, be very near her, until the end!

THE DEACONESSES IN SYRIA AND THE SYRIAN ORPHANS AND WIDOWS.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

London, Jan. 21, 1861.

Dear Sirs,—The following statement was transmitted to me by Dr. Fliedner, of Kaiserwerth, with the request that I would give it as much publicity as possible, in order to acquaint British Christians with the work which the Deaconesses have undertaken in Syria. The fearful moral destitution and degradation of the Syrian orphans, maidens and widows has called a part of the Deaconesses to the work of Christian education—while others are devoted to the superintendence and management of hospitals. The field of labour is so great, and the necessity of Christian help so urgent, that Dr. Fliedner will send out shortly some more sisters. It is especially the spiritual destitution which strikes the sisters. Miss Nightingale, in asking a friend to assist, if possible, the work of the Deaconesses, writes: "Far more than with the temporal, the sisters are struck with the spiritual misery. 'That these should be Christians!' they say. The impossibility of convincing the women that anybody can be wishing to do them good is so strange. I hope you may be able to help them in their efforts. I know the practical usefulness of these Deaconesses so well!"

The Society for Promoting Female Education in the East has lately made a grant of 25*l*. towards the Deaconesses' work in Syria, and has kindly consented to receive contributions for this object. The following appeal was issued by them at the time of the outbreak of the massacres: "The recent distressing outbreak and massacres in Syria have deprived thousands of children of their natural protectors. The Committee of the Society for Promoting Female Education in the East are most anxious to send to these destitute ones, not only the meat which perisheth, but that meat which endureth unto everlasting life. They now appeal for funds to enable them to assist well-qualified and devoted workers, who are on the spot, to open orphan schools for them. The Committee will undertake that, for every 10*l*. contributed, one child shall be immediately received into a home, and placed under Christian influence and instruction. It is a time of great emergency, and never has there been such an opening in Syria for disseminating the seed of God's Word. This appeal is made in the earnest hope that many will gladly give of their abundance, not only to save perishing bodies, but immortal souls. The call is urgent; help, ere the children die!"

I feel sure that many of your readers will strengthen the hands of the Deaconesses in Syria—who, while nursing and feeding and clothing the poor orphans, maidens and widows, do not forget to give them the bread of life, and to bring them up in the ways of the Lord.

I hope you will be ready to receive contributions for this object. I am authorised to say that the Hon. Secretary of the above society, Miss Emma Lyeoester, 19, Wilton-crescent, London, S.W., and the Secretary, Miss Webb, 15, Shaftesbury-crescent, Pimlico, S.W., will be happy also to receive and to transmit to Dr. Fliedner any contributions.

I remain, dear Sirs, yours, &c.,

HERMANN SCHMETTAU.

Kaiserwerth, Jan. 2, 1861.

We can again, God be thanked! give joyful tidings to the friends of the Syrian orphans from Pastor Disselhof's letters from Beyrout, written the 3rd, 7th, and 16th of December. On the 30th of November he had already collected 50 orphan girls; 17 of these he brought with him from Tyre and Sidon, where he had been on the 15th of November with Sister Emily and Pastor Krämer. In Sidon he found even worse distress amongst the 5,000 fugitives than at Beyrout. There is no hospital yet established for the many sick by the Anglo-American Committee, but only a doctor appointed, who provides medicines. In this "Khan," as in Beyrout, the fugitives lay together in a wilderness of confusion—women, men, children, old men, &c., &c.—only in worse smoke, dirt, and stink, from cooking and washing, from emptying all the cooking and washing utensils in the rooms, and from the perspiration of the sick who lay among the healthy, particularly of children sick of scarlet fever and small-pox. On the stairs, and in the corridors before several doors, there was a regular mire, so that one had literally to wade through it up to the ankles. Everywhere the rooms were black with smoke, dark, and infected by bad air. Everywhere, together with the sick and orphans, were idle men and women, cowering quietly in the mud, laughing childishly, showing their sick, and begging. Sister Emily distributed medicine largely amongst them: afterwards she was obliged to go alone through the "Khan" to collect orphans; she would not raise suspicions by taking companions.

Roman Catholic Sisters of Mercy have a hospital in Sidon, but it is shunned on account of the number of deaths occurring there. It is underground, and damp.

On Nov. 22 Pastor Disselhof presided over the distribution of clothes amongst these fugitives—principally woollen articles. Here the roughness and indecency of the Arab women surpassed all description. First they pressed against the doors of the distributing room, and then rushed in like a wild sea. Words did not avail to maintain order. Ten men with clubs had to drive them back, and even this did not always succeed. Many were seized and ejected by force. The American missionary, Mr. Ford, was obliged thus to rid himself of a good many. In the midst of all this the ear was torn by shrill Arab cries.

Naturally these gifts lose thus the character of charity; for neither the distress nor the assistance can exercise a hallowing, but rather a demoralising influence. Missionary Ford and friends complained of this as being also the case at Beyrout. The more necessary it is to attend to the souls of these unhappy people. In Tyre, Pastor Disselhof found 2,000 fugitives, and much misery and distress amongst them—many sick with dysentery, fever, and small-pox, &c. One mother told him, with streaming tears, that her five sons had been killed before her eyes. The Anglo-American Committee have not here, either, any hospital—only a doctor. Sister Emily found here a large field in which to distribute medicines; and she collected fifteen orphans, who were mounted on donkeys and taken to Sidon, where they were joined by two more.

Many mothers would not give up their children; because the more they could show at the place of distribution, the more clothes they received. Sister Emily conveyed the orphans safely to Beyrout, whilst Pastors Disselhof and Krämer went back by Lebanon in order to see the town Deir-el-Kamar. They only found heaps of ruins, the houses all burnt, and between the walls torn and tattered religious books, broken sacred vessels, broken crosses, skulls, bones, and traces of blood! On his return to Beyrout, Pastor Disselhof found, to his great delight, fifty orphans assembled. Missionary Zeller, who had come from Nazareth to look for orphan boys, and to take them back with him, came also to our orphanage and asked the girls in fun to go with him to Nazareth. Most of them were alarmed and began to cry—loud screaming filled the house. This spread like wildfire to their relatives in the town; and before the sisters were aware, thirty children had gone—some had run away, and others were dragged away by their relatives. The poor sisters were in great consternation, and saw immediately the great antipathy there was to the children leaving their own country, and that they must be cared for in Beyrout itself. In a week's time forty children were collected together again; only the bad ones remained away, and several new ones came. The matter thus turned to good, a clearing of bad ones followed, and the faithful ones now formed a reliable staff. It also happened that, through the kindness of Consul Weber, a second house, larger and more healthy, was hired for an orphanage. It has larger, higher, and more airy rooms, with a tolerably big court and garden for the children to play in; and it is surrounded by a high wall. The house is to be called the

"DEACONESSES' ORPHANAGE ZOAR."

As the Lord saved a small family at Zoar from the judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah, so here, with His blessing, a little orphan family is to be saved from the judgment which has fallen on the inhabitants of Lebanon. From the terraces there is a beautiful view over the sea and towards majestic Lebanon. Not far from the house is the Prussian Consulate, the flag of which can be seen. The orphans are already a great source of pleasure to the sisters; they have become much more cleanly and better-mannered, and take pleasure in learning. At first one called Habube was so wild and untractable, that they thought they must have given her up. But subsequently a great influence was obtained over her, and she is now quite the pet of the house. . . . The children are becoming fond of needlework and singing. Several beautiful hymns may be heard sung by the children in the evening. The Arab teacher is now occupied in explaining to them the birth of our Saviour; she teaches them also some Arabic sacred songs. The children are also instructed in house-work and cooking; they inhabit the upper floor—the ground floor is occupied by the maidens.

THE MAIDENS' ASYLUM.

Such an institution is much required, because the daughters and widows of the murdered are exposed to great temptations through the presence of the immoral soldiery, especially the Zouaves. These girls, from the age of fourteen to twenty, who cannot be kept among the children, are collected into a particular family. They live apart from the children, under the direction of one of the sisters. Here they are taught reading, so that as soon as possible the Bible may be given them. Besides, they are thoroughly instructed in knitting, sewing, mending, washing, ironing, and cooking, and a taste for order and cleanliness is implanted in them. This internal discipline will open the way for the discipline of the mind. Under God's blessing, this education will enable them to become skilful servants, and good housewives and mothers. The house which was rented at the beginning has become

THE WIDOWS' ASYLUM,

and is called the "Widows' Asylum" (Zarpath).

Nine widows have been admitted; among them one very old and totally blind, who was found to be entirely forsaken. Under the superintendence of a sister they are employed in female occupations; the younger and more gifted ones among them undergo a course of instruction. This is certainly a difficult task, with such spoiled and unrestrained persons. The Widows' Asylum is at present absolutely needed.

At Sidon a suitable house is taken by Pastor Disselhof for a hospital, where some of our ~~ten~~ deaconesses, stationed there, will undertake the nursing of the sick. Of the deaconesses who were sent out lately, two are to be placed in the hospital at Alexandria, to release two Arabic-speaking sisters, now stationed there, who will be sent to Beyrout. After long deliberation, the Anglo-American Committee has at last offered to the sisters the management of a second hospital at Beyrout.

Pastor Disselhof bought, on the 15th of December, a suitable piece of land for the erection of an orphan asylum or a school at Beyrout, at the foot of Lebanon. The purchase sum amounts to 550*l*. The plan is ready, and they will soon commence building. The building expenses of this house will not be less than 3,000*l*. The Roman Catholic Sisters of Mercy were to lay the foundation-stone of one of the three Roman Catholic orphan asylums at Beyrout, for which the Catholics have placed at their disposal a very large sum for the building and endowment. Should our Evangelical Church not raise the sum of 3,000*l*., and a fund for the endowment of this orphan asylum, so that the blessing of Christian education for the poor Syrian orphans may be a lasting one?

The Evangelical congregations of St. Petersburg have kindly undertaken to pay for the land. Should the rest not be easily raised among our Protestant brethren of various countries?

Therefore we would say to all the dear benefactors, who have hitherto so kindly contributed towards the work of Christian education of the Syrian orphans, in the words of the English proverb—consider nothing done while aught remains to do, and will remind them of the word of the Lord—"He who soweth plentifully, shall reap also plentifully."

Yes, we have the assurance that the Lord, who has, through you, begun this good work, will carry it on to His glory, to your joy, and to the blessing of many souls.

Dr. FLIEDNER,

Director of the Deaconesses' Institution of Kaiserwerth.

P.S.—In November last a whole village of 400 or 500 inhabitants, half-an-hour distant from Nazareth, joined—together with their priest and teacher—the Evangelical Church; so Pastor Disselhof is informed by the missionary Zeller, of Nazareth.

PRUSSIA.

EULOGIUM ON THE LATE KING FREDERICK WILLIAM IV.

Berlin, Jan. 16, 1861.

The new year has commenced with an important event. The death of the Supreme Bishop of the Evangelical National Church of Prussia, King Frederick William IV., although not expected, has, now that it has taken place, deeply moved the hearts of those in Christian circles who knew how to value his rare worth. Should posterity ever enumerate the kings who valued their heavenly crown above their earthly, and sought, before all things, to be faithful, humble servants of their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, Frederick William IV. will not be the last in the rank of Christian princes.

Allow me to give you a brief sketch of the unusually rich, and yet tragic, life of our deeply-respected and departed King.

Frederick William was born October 15, 1795, and baptized on the 28th. Among his sponsors were George III. of Great Britain, and his queen, Sophia Charlotte. The young Prince grew up in a family so pure, so noble, so ideal, as is seldom to be found on earth, and still seldom on thrones. His mother, who will never be forgotten by a Prussian, Queen Louisa, from his tenderest infancy, formed with the hand of maternal love the unusually rich and lively mind of her eldest son, and endeavoured, above everything else, to lead him to the Lord Jesus, to whom she had dedicated herself. The year 1806 opened, throwing its shadow over the life of the youthful Crown Prince. He fled to the outermost bounds of his future kingdom, and there shared for a long period the simple citizen-like life of his Royal parents, continually hearing of battles lost, fortresses capitulating, and treacherous friends, while his eyes daily witnessed the grief of his father, and the tears and pious resignation of his Royal mother, who was soon called from earth by a blessed death. Truly this was a strange yet good school of trial and experience for a future king, a striking proof that even kings are but dust and nothingness without the protection of the Lord of Sabbath. But now followed the joyful, spirited movement of the Prussian people, who, animated by one spirit, the recollection of which will long be our pride, hesitated at no sacrifice, offered blood and property for King and fatherland, and so from deep abasement rose to new honour, and the young Crown Prince was ever in the foremost ranks of battle. In the bloody fight near Gross-Görschen, he exposed himself so rashly to the enemy's fire, that it required the immediate call of his father to bring him back.

The peace came. And in the arts of peace, the Crown Prince, who had the advantage of the instruction of Germany's most learned men, took, without dispute, one of the first positions among his people. With rare gifts of mind, and of imagination, taking interest in all varieties of art and science, the Crown Prince was an example in writing and speaking, and was equal to any of his contemporaries who shone as lights among the arts and sciences; the first of whom he drew around him. He loved intellectual contest, and rejoiced to see German spirits flourishing. To wrestle and be stirring was life to him, and so ripened the youth of Frederick William into manhood.

In 1823 he married the pious Elizabeth, Princess of Bavaria, to whom he remained bound during the whole of his life by the tenderest ties of wedded love, purified and ennobled by their mutual love to the Lord. In this year—when everything was so full of splendour, hope, enthusiasm and poetry, for the Crown Prince, Frederick William; when his clever speeches, his striking witticisms, and his amiability, were the subjects in the mouth of all his people—in this year the Crown Prince, now grown to manhood, gave his heartfelt homage to him who is King of kings. And on this firm foundation rested all his subsequent acts as King. Numberless proofs occurred during his reign, making it clear to all the world that the chief aim of all he did was to promote the increase of the kingdom of God upon the earth. And the first sign which proves that a soul has sought and found grace—the humility of the heart—gleamed from his eye, and was delightfully apparent in his words and conversation. That this man was in prayerful intercourse with his God and Saviour was evident from his natural cheerfulness, his sparkling wit, and his overflowing spirits; it was legible in his countenance, especially when he was seen in the house of God.

This man, so noble, so pious, so witty, ascended the Prussian throne on the 7th June, 1840. Seldom has an ascension been expected with greater suspense, and rarely greeted with more joy. A romancer on the throne of the Cæsars, so said our notorious David Strauss, in a work published by him somewhat later. In this antithesis, indeed, lay what was tragical in the life of Frederick William, the fatality which made his reign tearful and sad. A mind so multilateral; contemplations so fertile in new ideas; a spirit so easily excited and moved; a disposition so harmless, benevolent and trusting—were not fitted to wield the sceptre in such difficult and stormy times; he lacked that firmness and consistency which, deciding on a course, pursues undeterred the way to the object. And so it happened. Never did a Prince ascend the throne with purer designs, more self-denying benevolence, or more glowing love to his people; yet this same Prince had to experience the sound of insurrection raging before the gates of his Royal palace, and see the people, for whose happiness he was conusually striving, rise in rebellion against him. Then his heart broke—his kingly heart. It was not on the 2nd January, 1861, but on the 18th March, 1848, that he received the deadly wound which was never healed. A heart so full of trust, so full of love and self-devotion, could not bear to be so misunderstood and so ungratefully treated by a people who were always borne upon it in prayer.

There is, indeed, no doubt that the affection of the brain, from which he suffered the last three years of his life, so shadowing this clear, bright spirit, was the effect of that revolutionary time and the agitation occasioned by it, which could not fail to leave a deep impression upon a mind so easily excited.

And yet he had himself from his throne promoted these free-thinking efforts. Previous to his accession, the strictest Absolutism reigned in Prussia, mitigated, it is true, by the capacity and the noble mind of the Prince, but yet felt as a hard oppression in face of the ever-prevailing ideas of a new time. Frederick William IV. was himself in far too great a degree a son of this new time—far too much penetrated with free opinions—not to admit that there was much which was right in them. He, therefore, broke down the dams and let the waves roll in, recalled the banished, opened the closed chairs of learning, and gave free scope to discussion, thus putting weapons into the hands of his opposers in pure Royal noble-heartedness, trusting to the power of mind at his command victoriously to conduct the intellectual contest. He could not comprehend that his people would use other than intellectual weapons against him, and so this revolution grew over his head. But though the political efficiency of the late King may be open to great blame, his influence on the Protestant Church has been so blessed as always to surround his throne with the most fervent and grateful prayers of all Evangelical Christians. In order to estimate all the importance of his influence in this respect, it is only necessary to compare the present internal condition of the Evangelical Church in Prussia with what it was in 1840. For two decenniums Rationalism, and the unchristian philosophy, as particularly set forth by Hegel's school, reigned in undisputed sway over the Prussian land. The Church herself was unconditionally subordinated to the State. Her ministers were obliged to re-marry any persons who desired, who had obtained a divorce by the State, which they might do on sixteen different grounds; missionary societies were supported by just a few Christians here and there; indeed, there was little or no Christian activity. On the other hand, severe measures were enacted against those belonging to other religious confessions.

Frederick William IV., upon succeeding to the throne, found two Romish archbishops confined in fortresses, and the Church of the Separate Lutherans garrisoned with soldiers; the soldiers were made to leave the church; the archbishops were set at liberty.

One of the most important tasks the King set himself to was taking care that the theological professorships in the Universities should be filled by learned men of Evangelical opinions, and that the most influential ecclesiastical offices should be closed against Rationalists. And thus, under his government, the whole atmosphere of theological society became altogether changed. What was formerly the exception is now become the rule. In almost every pulpit the crucified Son of God is preached, and even students of theology are ashamed to be Rationalists. That Bible-faith which in the year 1840 was so generally despised, and only looked upon as fit for women and enthusiasts, has now become a power in Prussia. It is indeed related of the departed monarch, that one day, in the latter period of his illness, standing at a window, and seeing a multitude move to a religious festival, and yet apparently so little inwardly consecrated, he was overcome with grief on account of his poor people, and complained that his government had not yielded the fruit of true salvation and conversion. And when a clergyman, who was near, reminded him of the manifold good which he had willed and effected, the King bowed his face in his hands, and exclaimed, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" But though twenty years cannot repair the unbelief of a hundred, yet the good which has been effected, and the honour which has been given to the Crucified, will elicit the sincerest thanks to the departed of every true friend of the Evangelical Church. And the seed which he has sown with his Royal hand will—God grant it may not be long first!—continue to increase and bring forth fruit. It is him we have to thank that the instruction now given in the national schools is altogether of an Evangelical spirit. Every child in Prussia remains at school until his fourteenth year. And now no child is left without Bible history, proverbs, hymns and catechism, being firmly fixed in his memory, and, if God give His grace, in his heart also. May it not be hoped that th power of the Word of God may again animate and penetrate the next generation?

And, looking away from these general acts, where is a corner to be found in the Prussian land where some Christian act of benevolence of the King cannot be related, as soon as he visited it, either in erecting Evangelical Churches and schools, or setting them in new order? How many Christian institutions owe their existence, supplies and promotion to him! How carefully, only to mention a little, did he cherish that work of love, the Deaconess Institution. The Deaconess House Bethany, in Berlin, where the magnificent is united with every possible accommodation, is a clear proof of this! Just the same is the Johannis Institution, in Berlin, where a number of deacons labour in the prisons, and especially among those unhappy persons who, released from prison, unless sought out by Christian love, would fall again irremediably into their old sins. That Christian care should approach the prisons, and that the Gospel should be preached in these places of misery, was one of the King's chief cares. He has, through the renewing of the Johannis Institution, brought together the noble of the land and engaged them in works of charity, and numerous hospitals have already arisen in all the provinces of the land. As the King was especially anxious that religious life should be awakened in his capital of Berlin, the many churches which he has built there are his standing memorials; and also the noble Dom-Candidate Institution, from whence qualified candidates go out in companies to lead the poor and miserable of Berlin to the Lord.

And while he diligently built up the kingdom of God in his immediate neighbourhood, he also kept an oversight over all his land, and embraced the whole Evangelical Church, which was likewise dear to him, and especially the English branch.

As near the commencement of his reign he, together with the Church of England, founded the Evangelical bishopric of Jerusalem, so one of his last acts, before his illness of three years, was his Royal solicitude for the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance at Berlin, whose protectorate he so gladly accepted. The words which the King then spoke to Sir Culling Eardley were these: "Believe me, that when these gentlemen from various nations lately spoke to me so kindly at Potsdam, I felt myself truly humbled. I assure you that it is no idle phrase when I say this. Then, when all met around the one centre, I felt the thanks given to my person as inappropriate." Such words give a deep insight into this Royal heart, which so sincerely bowed to the highest King. "Happily I have not lost my baptismal grace," were other words written by the King, in a letter, now become famous, to the German poet Ernst Moritz Arndt, and which in a time of wildest political agitation he gave as his supreme reason why he could not do what appeared to him wrong. And to give a third speech, by which another glance may be obtained into this rare heart of a Christian King, we quote the words spoken by him at the commencement of his last illness to his chaplain, when he yet hoped for recovery: "How much better would one reign with a broken heart."

His hope of recovery was not granted. Upon his clear, versatile, clever mind the hand of God lay heavy. More and more seldom became the moments of consciousness. But even this long illness of the Royal sufferer was a loud sermon to his people; the untiring, self-sacrificing care and loyalty of his Royal consort, has shone out as an example of true Christian wedded love into all houses, great and small.

There was not granted to the deceased a clear moment in his death, in which to confess aloud Him whom all his life he had served. But after his death there was found among his papers the following: "How I wish to be buried," written August 6, 1854. It commences with the words: "If God the Lord shall please that I end my earthly course quietly in my house, and should, as I pray God on my knees, my warmly and ever-loved Elise survive me, this paper shall be given her immediately after my death. Whatever she may alter shall be obeyed, as though written here. Her commands shall be my commands. I wish to rest in the same tomb with her, as near her side as possible." It was the King's wish, further, that his heart should be buried in the mausoleum of his Royal parents at Charlottenburg, and his body interred in the Church of Peace, at Sans-Souci, with the following inscription: "Here rests in God his Saviour, in the hope of a blessed resurrection and a merciful judgment, founded alone on the merits of Jesus Christ, our most Holy Redeemer and only Life, the late," &c., &c.

So acknowledged the Royal confessor even in death his heavenly Lord. His weary body already rests in the Church of Peace built by him; he himself is gone to a nobler and everlasting peace, after which, in his long, heavy affliction, he so often longed. May the Lord in His mercy grant to His Christendom many such kings as he was!

SWITZERLAND.

ITALIAN LABOURERS ON SWISS RAILROADS.

Italy is the order of the day—the most interesting topic as far as the outer world is concerned. Telegraphic despatches, letters, newspapers, conversations, all turn upon Italy. Among those who are specially interested in the advancement of the kingdom of God, Italy is also an object of warm sympathy and many prayers.

Its millions of inhabitants, now for the first time allowed to read the Bible, ought to be on the hearts of all Christians. How God's blessed book is to be placed in the hands of as many as possible of the Italians, and how their hearts are to become disposed to read it, are the next important questions. May God's Holy Spirit give wisdom to those who are sowing the seed! and let them remember that none but that same Spirit can make it grow. God alone can convert hearts. Let us, therefore, all pray that He who has opened those beautiful countries, and allows to His children the privilege of spreading there the Word of Life, will also bless its influence on the hearts of the Italians.

In the course of this last autumn, during some weeks spent at Clarens, near Vevey, on the borders of the Lake of Geneva, I have been much interested in watching a missionary work going on among Italians on Swiss ground. Railroads, you know, are making in many parts of Switzerland. Nature seems to present almost insurmountable barriers to their construction; but, notwithstanding, they have already been made in many parts of the country, and in others they are in progress.

Switzerland has had to draw largely on the North of Italy for hands capable of doing the work for her, and thousands of Italians have, during the latter years, poured into the Canton de Vaud, and worked on the railroad which runs along the northern and eastern coasts of the Lake of Geneva. Different sorts of workmen have come at different seasons, always returning to their Italian homes for months at a time.

While in Switzerland they were like sheep without a shepherd, a lawless set, feared by the inhabitants, cared for by none, it really seems strange that, in a Protestant country, and one that possesses amongst its inhabitants so many serious Christians, zealous in good works, nothing should have been done for these poor foreigners. Yet so it was. There was, however, One who had compassion on them. God, who had given His only Son to save sinners, and to be a friend of the friendless, had, with an all-foreseeing eye, for years been preparing an earthly friend for this people.

Thousands of miles from the country of which we are speaking, on the other side of the Atlantic, a young girl had been growing up into womanhood, the daughter of a British officer in Canada. The history of her early training would be so interesting to those who love to mark God's ways even in little things, that it is almost a pity that motives of delicacy forbid us to reveal any part of it. Suffice it to say that she was an only child, educated by a father who made the Bible his only standard of faith and rule of conduct; that she had the privilege of partaking early in works of Christian benevolence; that though she mixed much in what are generally called the higher classes of society, she always felt a great interest in conversing with and studying the common people. All this preparatory work was going on in Canada. At that time, certainly, no earthly being could foresee that she was destined to befriend people in another quarter of the globe, and that all the deep interest that she felt in the lower classes, and all the intercourse that she had with Roman Catholics, was to be of use to her in the work that was given to her subsequently. Years after, when an orphan, and rich in experience as regards trial and suffering, she came to Switzerland, and remained there some time, in one of the numerous "pensions" on the borders of the Lake of Geneva. She came there on account of illness, and made a stay of some months, but when improved in health she thought of leaving the place, as she felt, moreover, rather in want of some useful occupation. She had in Canada been accustomed to work in Sunday-schools and in the distribution of tracts. The life that she was leading in Switzerland was not at all satisfactory or congenial with her active habits; she gave notice at the pension that she was going to leave. One day, however, she went into Vevay on some business. Returning by the steamer, she saw on board some men looking like railway labourers. Just before leaving the boat, a peasant woman, a stranger to her, came up to her and said: "Oh, will no one take pity on those men? Will no one speak to them? Will no one put the Word of God into their hands? Do, Madame, do something for them!" Miss — was astonished, and did not at all respond favourably to this appeal. The woman, however, only went on fervently expressing the wishes of her heart, begging Miss — to speak to these poor men—to give them the Word of God, and adding, "I will constantly pray for you if you do!" The woman vanished, and Miss — has never seen her since. The impression left by her words, however, did not vanish; it remained on the mind of the hearer. She saw numberless difficulties in the way; the difference of language; the position of a lady as coming in contact with these rough, reckless men; in fact, the idea was new to her altogether, and in praying for a work to be done for the Lord, certainly she had not contemplated anything of this sort. She determined, however, to try. She knew Italian very imperfectly at the time, but she procured a few tracts and Testaments in that language, and went and sat down on a stone at the roadside. Italians passed by and she gave away her books. Some of them were thankfully received. She felt encouraged. But then she found that numbers of these Italians could not read, and even if they could, she could not go on buying books and tracts to scatter them in this way by the roadside; she had not the means of doing so. She resolved, however, on staying some time longer at Clarens, waiting for the will of God to show itself.

Little by little she came to the conviction that this was really her calling. She went on quietly doing the little she could by herself; then others became interested, wished to assist her with contributions in money, and after some time she was brought into connexion with the Italian Committee at Geneva. She acts quite independently of that committee, but they do what they can to assist her, wisely seeing that it is well to encourage any one acting from the impulse of an inward calling, though the individual so acting be not under their control.

One of the first things on her heart was to establish an Italian service in the neighbourhood, so as to give the men an opportunity of every Sunday hearing the Gospel preached. She got an evangelist to come from Geneva who knew Italian. But difficulties rose in all quarters, some most unexpected. The local authorities, who had never stirred a finger for the benefit of these poor strangers, who had been for years working on their railroads, now took the alarm. Miss — had with much difficulty got the loan of a schoolroom for the services. But no sooner did these authorities hear of it than up they started and accused her of belonging to a popish propaganda!

Her friends had to sign a paper, the contents of which went to prove that this was not the case, that she was a true Protestant, and only wished to promulgate Protestant principles. This blew over, but then she was annoyed by the Roman Catholics; in fact, she has had many vexations to go through, but the Lord, in whom she has trusted, has faithfully helped her through them all.

Miss — has now been in the same neighbourhood three years. She has never left the "Pension Perret," and her work has grown considerably. There are now services every Sunday at four places—Montreux, Bex, Vevay, and Roche. The localities for these services change as the railway labourers change, and are shifted from one place to another.

I wish that you had been present with us at one of these services at Montreux. They are now held in a Barack as it is called—a wooden house, or rather shed—with a room at one end for the people who take care of the place and provide the meals of the Italians. The room in which we were had rather a comfortable appearance, the walls consisting of deal boards, with very ample crevices; the furniture long tables and benches. At one of the former, the evangelist from Geneva, Signor Frannoni, formerly a Roman Catholic, was sitting, with his Bible before him; men in blouses had sat down around him, in all possible attitudes of attention—some really much engrossed—and serious. Others had, perhaps, a slight play of satire at the corners of the mouth, but all were polite and attentive, and ready to read their Bibles when opened for them at the different places alluded to in the exposition. The chapter read was the eighth of Romans, but many other texts were referred to. It was really an interesting sight, and the poor fellows behaved so well, and were so pleasant and friendly in their manners. They were free to ask any questions, or to state any objections that might occur to them, and they did so several times. Books they seemed to accept with much gratitude. You know, I suppose, the Amico di Casa (friend of the house), which is published every year at Turin, on the same plan as the Almanach de Bon Conseils published in Paris, containing various useful information—short biographies of Christian men, anecdotes showing the power of the Gospel, &c. It contains no controversy, and is thus spread among Roman Catholics, who in it may gain some knowledge of Evangelical truth, which may be blessed to their souls. These books, when more than a year old, would not be acceptable as almanacks. Miss — gets hundreds of them—yes, thousands I may say—that she employs in the following way: All the almanack part is torn away, the rest put in a nice little paper cover, and given away as a tract. These stories seem very acceptable to those who can read, and those who cannot may always find some friend willing to do so. Is not this very practical?

Then there are evening schools at Montreux and other places, where the men are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. These are well attended.

You will ask me where the money comes from to defray the expenses that must be incurred by all these arrangements. I can only answer you that it comes from a purse in Miss —'s hands. She gives what she can herself, her friends give; in fact, God does not allow that purse to be empty. She has never hitherto made any appeal to the public, but should it please God to incline some hearts on reading this to wish to further a work which is so simple, so genuine, and so scriptural, I am sure that you, dear Sirs, would forward any such gift. You know the direction.

Besides these schools already mentioned, Miss — has one herself every week-day evening at the "Pension Perret." About seven o'clock or towards nightfall, Italian labourers are seen coming from various quarters. They all enter a good-sized room on the ground-floor, and there Miss — reads the Bible with them, and they learn to read, to write, and to cipher. On seeing these tall, dark-eyed fellows quietly enter the house at dusk and mysteriously vanish through the door of their school-room, one would rather conclude them to be men going to a gaming or drinking party, or hatching some foul conspiracy, than believe them to be what they are, school-boys coming to be taught peaceable occupations. They are in fact learning their letters, to write, and to cipher. The writer of these lines met the other day Miss — on her way to Vevey. "Can you guess what I am going to town for?" she asked in her usual cheerful manner. No, it was rather difficult. "Why, I am going to buy a little picture-book for François," and she laughed heartily. "The little boy, he fancies that he can learn to read if he has a pretty book with pictures in it, just such as he has seen some children have!" The little boy François is a tall Lombard, some three or four-and-twenty years of age, but childish, as some of those Italians seem to be in a wonderful degree. Sometimes they will quarrel about who is to sit next to Miss — at lessons, and at other times they take to washing their faces, dressing very smartly, and oiling their hair, all in compliment to their kind teacher. She is not at all insensible to these attentions, though they are sometimes trying to her risible inclinations. Miss — loves her work, though it brings her many and serious trials. There are often great discouragements, and there are few positive encouragements. She is often asked, "Do you have many conversions?" Invariably and honestly she answers, "No." And for this I respect her, and think more of her work. She pretends to nothing but prayerfully placing the Word of God in the hands of the men. He has sent her, to tell them the truth, and then to leave the rest to Him. One poor little fellow, an old man of the name of Bartolomeo, does seem to be in earnest, and he does attend at the Sacrament in the Swiss Church, but otherwise she has set her face against all forming of Churches where there are no living members. Should any one really give evidence of being a converted character, and evince a desire of becoming a communicant, she would only be too glad to encourage such an individual; but as it is not the case, she must wait patiently till the day when all shall be revealed, to know what the fruits may have been of the mission which it has been the pleasure of God to give her, and her privilege to carry on.

It is in the meantime delightful to think that during these last two years hundreds and thousands of these Italians have come to some, if even a very slight knowledge, of the Bible. This stream, which has been running to and fro between Switzerland and Italy, must certainly have carried back into the latter country some grains of gold, though we do not venture to say that they have been "the pearls of great price" spoken of in Scripture. But who knows? Not till the day of judgment shall we know what these little beginnings have come to. The fresh ideas that have found their way into minds, till then sealed up by priestcraft and darkened by Popish superstition, who knows what those ideas may grow to when once those stagnant minds are set in motion? The books, the tracts that are thus brought into Italy, even should the bearers not be benefitted by them, who knows to whom they may be useful? The mere simple fact that a number of these men have learned to read and write, is a hopeful one. We can only say, Godspeed to the work, and may the Italian pupils, under the care of their kind English teacher, make great progress, not only in regard to the alphabet and the copybook, but in reading and understanding the Word of God, so that it may become to them the light of life!

MEETINGS FOR UNITED PRAYER—PROGRESS OF THE TRUTH AMONG THE ARMENIANS—ANGLICAN AND ORIENTAL FRATERNISATION—BULGARIAN DEMANDS UPON THE PORTE—FINANCIAL AFFAIRS OF THE COUNTRY.

Constantinople, Jan. 8, 1861.

We are now in the midst of the week of prayer. Meetings are held every day, in the native languages, in different parts of the city, and a spirit of prayer seems to prevail. The English-speaking part of our population, who are comparatively quite few, and composed chiefly of English and Americans, are scattered over so wide an area, that it is impracticable to have a general gathering of all, every day. It has, therefore, been arranged to have three public meetings during the week, besides those on the two Sabbaths; and, on the intervening days, to have what may be called neighbourhood meetings, as far as practicable.

The first public meeting was held yesterday, and it was well attended, and decidedly interesting. There was something truly inspiring in the thought that so vast a number of Christian believers were uniting together in prayer, with one accord, all over the world at the same time, so that during this week every hour and every minute of each day would hear the earnest cries of some of the people of God, unitedly supplicating Him for an abundant outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The entire circuit of the world will be belted with prayer-meetings! And O! will not the God of heaven hear?

If the daily united prayer of a mere handful of Christians, in that single spot—the “upper room,” at Jerusalem—could call down from heaven so great a blessing as that of the Pentecost revival, what may we not expect in answer to the prayer of millions, going up in one volume to heaven, from thousands of different points all over the world?

And was there ever a more appropriate time for prayer; when events of such magnitude are taking place on the earth; and many and large nations are being shaken to their foundations; and men feel their impotence to direct or control the disturbed elements; and all are waiting in anxious, helpless expectancy to see what will come next? Surely Christians, who believe and know that the God of heaven rules and governs in this world, are called upon to cast themselves on Him, and most earnestly pray that He may order all for His glory, and the ultimate triumph of His Church!

From every part of this land we have cheering news of the progress of the truth among the Armenians. It is, for the most part, a still and quiet work, like the leaven, which, without noise or show, gradually leavens the whole lump.

Another effort has just been made by certain individuals, who are considered by the people here, and apparently by themselves also, as representatives of the Church of England, to open friendly relations with the Eastern Churches, with a view to bring about some sort of a union and co-operation between the English Church and these Oriental bodies. A certain English clergyman, who is called in the Armenians papers “Sir George Williams, a priest,” from the University of Cambridge, has lately been to Tiflis, in Georgia, on his way to Echmiadrin, the seat of the Catholicos, or Patriarch, of all the Armenians, with letters of recommendation from the Bishops of Lincoln and Oxford, with the above object in view. It seems that Mr. Williams, having got as far as Tiflis, found himself not very well, and also he found that his time of absence had almost expired, and so he turned back to England, without going to see the Catholicos at all; which was certainly very strange, seeing he had come so far for this very purpose! However, he had some very pleasant interviews with the Armenian Archbishop of Tiflis, and very friendly words were spoken on both sides, the representative of the Church of England expressing fully his acknowledgment of the Armenian Church, as a true, orthodox and apostolic Church; and the Archbishop thanking him for his generosity, and expressing a thousand good wishes for him and his people, and here the matter ended, for the present. I forgot, however, to mention that a proposition was made to the Archbishop to send some Armenian young men to Cambridge for an education, which I believe the reverend prelate did not promise to do, though, of course, he received the proposition with true Oriental politeness. I wish you to understand that I do not vouch for the truth of any of the statements here made. As I find them published in a native journal here at the capital, I communicate them to you; for I think it is well that you and your readers should know that such a story has been put forth here, and, of course, it is generally believed to be true.

As to the orthodoxy of the Armenian Church, it is as truly orthodox, perhaps, as the Church of Rome, though some might doubt this from the fact that it has never received the Council of Calcedon. Evangelical Christians (if that is not tautology), I should think, would be slow to acknowledge the orthodoxy of a Church that has not Christ for a mediator in any article of faith, or in any prayer; that practices the invocation of the saints; that pays for the dead; that holds to the doctrine of Transubstantiation; that uses pictures and relics in worship; that teaches the intrinsic efficacy of the sacraments to cleanse the soul from sin; and that holds that the priest has power from God to pardon sin. There is really no more affinity between the doctrines of the Church of England and those of the Armenian Church, than there is between those of England and those of Rome.

The Bulgarians are very resolute in demanding from the Porte a full separation from the Greek Patriarch, and a separate organization of their own, and a very high degree of excitement now prevails among them because their request has been negatived. A few have gone over to Popery; but the majority stand firm, and are determined to gain their rights. Many large bodies of them, with ecclesiastics among them, declare that if their petition is not granted, they will become Protestants. It is also a singular fact that in the large town of Broussa, several hundred Greek families have just now requested to be enrolled as Protestants, because of the oppressions and wickedness of their bishop. Such wholesale conversions, for political reasons, do not amount to much, though the way may thus be more effectually opened for preaching the Gospel to the people.

The financial affairs of this country were never worse. The deepest distress prevails at the capital and in the provinces, and it is difficult to see what remedy can be provided. Our earnest and daily prayer is that the Lord may come and work deliverance for the people in His own good way.

AMERICA--UNITED STATES.

GLOOMY ASPECT OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS—HOPE ARISING FROM PAST REVIVAL AND PRESENT PRAYER.

Louisburg, Pennsylvania, Dec. 25, 1860.

I know not that I can convey to you in any adequate terms the position which this country is now in from its political trials. Only about two months since we had a cloudless sky. We had been blessed with a most bountiful harvest, and from the demand for our surplus produce abroad most remunerative prices rewarded our agriculturists. These are by far the largest class in the United States, and when they prosper, all the rest do well. But beyond this, manufactures, trade and commerce were all in a sound, healthy state. The revulsion of 1857 had not been forgotten, and the influence of the Gospel, then so extensively spread through the land, had materially aided that moderation which leads to both peace and plenty. We had also just passed through the ordeal of an universal public election for our chief magistrate, and had elected an honest, fearless man, opposed to slavery, to be our President for four years ensuing. This great election had passed off with less of bribery and corruption than before for many years. It was the honest conviction of the great body of the people, legitimately expressed by their votes, and peacefully carried through with tumult. The Government was at peace with all the world. The country had shaken hands with Great Britain in the person of the amiable heir-apparent to the throne of our forefathers. We had welcomed and taken care of an embassy from Japan, and had obtained, without war, all we asked from China. Our Indians were quiet, and gold poured in from California. Our Churches were in peace, steadily and constantly adding to their numbers, and spreading the holy influence of the Gospel all around, at home and abroad. Vast and unheard-of sums were appropriated, by benevolent and wealthy individuals, to objects of holiest usefulness. A spirit of devotion and consecration had spread among the prosperous, causing them to become their own executors in works of charity and mercy. These and many other blessings, too numerous to repeat, filled our land.

But a cloud has now spread over this fair prospect. The blighting, withering effect of slavery has shown itself in darker colours than ever before. The increasing hatred of the great body of the people to this institution has been displayed in an unmistakable manner in the choice of a chief magistrate. The bold and courageous—but violent and rash—people in the South transferred the hatred of the people in the North and North-west, to the institution of slavery, to themselves; and considered that the North hated the South, and therefore justified the South in hatred to the North. The effect of this, as you will have learned from the public papers, is like all sin, separating brother from brother, one citizen from another, and has already led to the ruin of multitudes. Bankers and capitalists have first taken the alarm; suspensions and hoarding have followed; business and manufacture of all kinds are injured greatly. And now we are in the midst of a winter of sorrow and disappointment to the labouring class, who so lately anticipated full occupation and plenty.

I could multiply the repetition of these troubles, but it is needless. Whilst we, here, suffer all this, those in the South suffer still more. In addition to those troubles, common to us, they have also the fears of external opposition from the free States, and, what is far worse and more dreadful, a rising among the slaves. They have heard an indistinct rumour that Lincoln is elected President, and that all slaves are to be free. They observe the commotion all around them, and are full of excitement. They now number nearly, if not quite, 4,500,000; whilst the whites, who govern them, are in a great minority. Had such a calamity occurred in a time of peaceful relations, the North would have rushed to their aid; but now, I fear, a totally opposite feeling exists.

The calamities of 1857 were commercial in their character, and they, in a great measure, originated the bold and new measure of a "Business Men's Noon-day Prayer-meeting." There I witnessed scenes which I had great pleasure in relating to you—scenes which the world never saw before, the results of which are eternal. Multitudes were converted. Churches prospered and increased. The kingdom of God in the world became more manifest, and Mammon received a check which he has not yet recovered, and we pray he never may. These prayer-meetings have been kept up till the present time, and are still much attended. Their principles of success are preserved—never beyond an hour, every one compelled to be short, under the fear of the little bell from the chair, the people—the business men—solicited and encouraged to preside, keep order, take the management themselves, and, whilst clergymen of all ranks and denominations are welcomed gladly, they have the good feeling not to assume a position which would not prove so efficient as the plan still continued, which has acted so well.

Our present troubles are political, and an earnest desire is exhibited on the part of many to draw an analogy between the commercial troubles of 1857 and the political troubles of 1860. The Gospel was doubtless aided in its progress by the former, and the circles more immediately affected were penetrated by its spirit, humbled and brought low. They confessed to God, sought His forgiving love, and that cloud was lifted and removed. Now if the greatest of all human temptations, the world, in its most alluring forms, could be then humbled, and in measure subdued, may not the affliction of bad government, the pride and haughtiness induced by slaveholding, be also overcome. "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" He has said, the wrath of man shall praise Him, and the remainder He will restrain. Jesus has said more than once, "If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it." These promises and encouragements have led many earnestly to seek for some manifest token of God's favour, some bow of hope in our present cloud, some political men's noonday (or midnight) prayer-meeting. There is a little nucleus of this at Washington now. Oh that it may increase and its effects spread and become manifold! This would be a greater miracle than the former. Before, all were united in one common calamity, now, two bitter antagonistic parties are violently opposed to each other, and no concessions or compromises appear able to reconcile them. The United States appear to be disunited. If so, the issue will be SLAVERY or FREEDOM. We know which must be victorious at last, but it may be through dreadful anarchy and blood.

I have lately been reading the history of the French Revolution: how soon the storm became too strong for those who called it forth to govern or control. The first originators of that soon became its first victims. But history teaches only theories—war, with all its horrors, still continues all over the world once more. The Gospel of peace alone controls the passions and interests of men. That alone says, "The lofty looks of men shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted." Our prayer now is, as Jesus has taught, "Our Father, who art in Heaven, Thy kingdom come."—I am, your brother in the kingdom of God, POLYNESIA.

AUTHENTIC DETAILS OF THE MARTYRDOM OF THE LATE MESSRS. WILLIAMS AND HARRIS—CAPTAIN COOK—DISCOVERY OF MR. WILLIAMS' REMAINS—CONTEMPLATED FORMATION OF A CHURCH IN EROMANGA—PRESENT CONDITION OF THE ISLAND.

Dillon's Bay, Eromanga, Oct. 16, 1860.

Allow me to transmit to Evangelical Christendom a statement in relation to the martyrdom of Williams and Harris. I do so, because I find some extracts from my letters to private friends on this subject have been published, which are incomplete.

November and December are great festal seasons of the moon-worship in this island, which are great seasons of idolatry and heathen abominations, as among the ancient Greeks and Romans; heathen vice is then rampant. This circumstance alone would have made Mr. Williams' visit perilous at this season of the year; but there was superadded a strong feeling to revenge their wrongs by white men on white men, by whom the tribe into whose lands Mr. Williams fell had lost several of their relatives at the place where their food was piled up on this memorable occasion, which they believed Mr. Williams and his friends were seeking to seize.

But there is another circumstance which is perilous to the lives of foreigners on this island and Tanna; there are distinct races on each of these islands. There is a people in the north end of this island who speak a distinct language; this people are exceedingly revengeful, and are the occasion of much war throughout the island. To this people the chief belongs who led in the massacre of Williams and Harris. From others Mr. Williams received some tokens of kindness. I may here state that Captain Cook nearly lost his life here in the same way, according to the statement of a few old men, whose fathers saw Captain Cook. These state that their fathers of Portenia Bay (Rovileow) were delighted with the visit of Captain Cook, and sent some of their party to prepare a present for him. But while they were preparing the present (unknown to Captain Cook), and resolved to detain him for it, some of a hostile party arrived, who had evil designs on his life, which he seems to have discovered, when he fired on them with what they call "lesanentorefa" (pop bow and arrow), and killed one man and a woman. The ball passed on, and broke the finger of another woman, where she was gathering vegetables. It is now deeply interesting to stand among this dark-hearted people, on the very spot where Captain Cook stood waving a branch, exhibiting the glorious Tree of Life, as well as where Williams and Harris fell in glory. While I write, the smoke of a large village, which we have just been beholding, ascending up to heaven, shows us again the enmity of these races, as also the tears of those who are now mourning over the slain.

But to return—while Mr. Williams and his friends were consulting about the path of duty, and doing "what they could," the natives were also consulting, and resolved to kill them, if they ventured up the river, towards where their yams were piled. Meanwhile the chief secreted himself with his club behind some bushes by the road-side, waiting the result of Mr. Williams' movements. The zeal of the warm-hearted Harris led him first within reach of the club of this wicked man, who sprang at him like a tiger, and struck him on the face. He acted the whole scene to me before I cut away the trees for a school-house. When Mr. Harris was struck he went quickly back to where there is a opening to the river, into which he ran and fell. He was pursued by a man of the name of Oveallow, who with some others killed him, while the chief followed Mr. Williams and his companions, who ran for the boat at the sea-shore outside of the river. He says he caught Mr. Williams by the leg while he was swimming off, and held him, while several others in pursuit came up and killed him. It is remarkable that all these men—about five—who were the real murderers of Mr. Williams died several years ago, but two are now living—the chief Koweyow and Oveallow—who killed Mr. Harris, and the former is guilty in relation to the death of Mr. Williams, although he says he did not strike him. Some remarks previously made on this subject are true of Mr. Harris, and not of Mr. Williams. The body of Mr. Harris was dragged up from the river, and a laurel now grows where his precious blood saturated the ground. His body, and not that of Mr. Williams, was taken to an oven by the river side, and his head was sent inland, whence I have obtained a skull, which there is reason to believe is his. It was brought to me a few months ago by Oveallow. Some of his bones, and not of Mr. Williams', were probably those taken to Samoa by Captain Croaker.

I spent three wearisome days last year in ascertaining the precise course which Mr. Williams' body took after it left the sea-shore. The tribe which killed Mr. Williams did not keep his body; they seem to have been struck with momentary awe by the expression of deep sympathy for the fallen of the Lord by some in the boat; they had killed a servant of Wobu; when they exclaimed, "What have we done? Have we killed Wobu?" His body was given to a chief, who then resided three miles from the river, in a part of the island which has been since that time uninhabited. Its first resting-place was on a rock by the river side, and its second in a village in the mountain, where the barrow on which it was fastened was placed up against a tree. Some of his black locks were here severed for purposes which I cannot describe. His body was again taken up, and all were soon out on a fine plain running with their prize to the residence of the principal chief, Wauris. Here it found its third resting-place. I think I may state, that all the bones of Mr. Williams are resting in this locality, being scattered about the ovens. Here, or at the river where he was killed, his monument ought to be erected; but a Christian's good name is his monument. I have not removed any of his supposed remains from this neighbourhood, but have left them there by a date palm.

We hope, ere another year passes, to see a Church formed here, of, at least, two or three Eromangana, being the first-fruits to God and the Lamb on this dark island. There is just now much fighting all around us; men and women are fleeing from their villages to the caves. The Lord reigneth, and our eyes shall, God willing, soon behold a better condition of things.

Some foreigners state that sixteen of their parties have been massacred last year by this people. "The multitude of the isles shall yet be glad," and Eromanga is included in that prediction.

We thank God for the prosperity which he has granted to the Evangelical Alliance; indeed, it must be very near to the heart of Christ; for it He prayed; it is an answer to His prayer, John xvii. God will bless such an association, which does not sacrifice the weightier matters of the law for the lesser, in "contending for the faith once delivered to the saints."

Yours truly, in the Lord,
GEORGE N. GORDON.

THE WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER.

No one who has ever read can have forgotten Montgomery's lines, as he glances retrospectively, on a Sabbath evening, over a world at worship:—

"From east to west the sun surveyed,
From north to south adoring throngs;
And still, when evening stretched her shade,
The stars came out to hear their songs."

We have had the sublime spectacle of such a Sabbath; but instead of the exercises of devotion terminating then, being followed, hour after hour, by Sabbatic engagements, the incense of prayer and praise ascending from country after country, until the hallowed cloud, accompanying the sun in his circuit, has eight times encircled the globe, and a second Lord's-day has dawned without an interval having occurred in which, upon some part of the earth's surface, there have not been found good men who have kept the feast, and maintained the continuous presentation of prayer and praise as God's spiritual priesthood. The earth, as it has been expressively said, has been "girdled with prayer." Admitting the tendency of the mind to exaggerate the importance of contemporary events, we may yet confidently ask—Has such a week ever been known before in all past history? The question admits of but one reply, which may well make us thankful for the day in which our lot is cast. Now, more than at any former period of her career, since apostolic days, may the Church emphatically say, "The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage."

The metropolitan meetings, called by the Evangelical Alliance, as our readers are aware, were held in succession at Willis's-rooms, Exeter-hall, and Freemasons'-hall. The attendance was numerous, especially as the week advanced. One of the densest fogs ever known in London, which occurred on Thursday, a drizzling rain on Saturday, and the general inclemency of the weather throughout the week, had, apparently, no unfavourable effect in lessening the numbers present. The meetings were presided over by the Earl of Roden, the Hon. A. Kinnaird, General Alexander, Major Straith (Secretary of the Church Missionary Society), Captain Fishbourne, Robert Baxter, Esq., R. C. L. Bevan, Esq., Captain Trotter, and Colonel Walker. The specific subjects selected for prayer and exhortation were, it may be remembered, on Sunday, Jan. 6, "The Promise of the Holy Spirit;" Monday, "Brotherly Kindness;" Tuesday, "Holiness;" Wednesday, "Conversion;" Thursday, "Circulation of the Bible and Christian Literature;" Friday, "For the Holy Spirit to Ministers, Schools, and Missions;" Saturday, "Thy Kingdom Come;" Sunday "Revivals and Missionary Sermons." The addresses were delivered, and the devotions led, by a great number of brethren, clerical and lay, belonging to various denominations. Now and then brief and solemn intervals of perfect stillness afforded opportunity for silent prayer, each such interval being devoted to supplication for the Queen, the Prince Consort, and the Royal Family. A large number of written requests for remembrance in prayer, some of them of a very affecting character, were received, and obtained the devout attention of those assembled. The gathering on Saturday evening was not the least remarkable of the series, which it terminated. The attendance was good, and the tone of interest, fervour and earnestness by which it was pervaded, perhaps prompted the expression of the wish by the Rev. J. S. Pearsall, who delivered the address, that these united prayer-meetings might be continued every Saturday evening. The assembly responded by an audible expression of assent, and we hope that steps will be taken to carry out this useful suggestion. Already in connexion with some congregations there are Saturday evening prayer-meetings. Might not these, in many cases, be merged in united gatherings? And since we seem to be living in the Saturday evening of the world's history, might we not in some sense anticipate its approaching Sabbath, by dedicating the last hours of each week to worship, divested of all that can remind us of our sectarian peculiarities, and may enable us to realise yet oftener the essential oneness of all true believers, by these frequently recurring acts of devotion, involving its practical recognition?

As will be justly inferred from what we have said above, the sermons, and in some cases the devotional exercises on the Lord's-days which preceded and followed the meetings, to a very great extent bore upon the specific topics already indicated. There was also, on Sunday, the 13th, a united communion at Freemasons'-hall; but it was held with a distinct understanding that it was not connected with the meetings for prayer, and that no one was responsible for it but those who were present. The ministers who officiated were the Revs. Messrs. Latrobe, Noel, Minton, Hamilton, Brock, Rowe, Martin and Bunting.

Besides the central prayer-meetings, services were held, simultaneously, in other parts of the metropolis and suburbs—in some cases a meeting being held by a single congregation; in some, two or three Churches of the same order blending their common supplications in their several places of worship in succession; and in others, the more excellent way being adopted, of all the Evangelical bodies in the neighbourhood, with their pastors, forming for the same purpose one united assembly. Both the first and last plans were adopted in Islington. The first of the united meetings was presided over by the Rev. D. Wilson, the vicar, and the Rev. A. Raleigh (Congregationalist), the Rev. Dr. Weir (Presbyterian), and other ministerial and lay gentlemen took part in the proceedings. The second plan we have mention was adopted in the case of the Weighhouse and Poultry Chapels, and in that of five Congregational Churches of Camden-town and Kentish-town, combined daily services (Saturday excepted) being held in each instance. The Rev. E. H. Bickersteth at Hampstead; the Rev. E. Auriol at St. Dunstan's-in-the-West; the Rev. J. J. Bolton at St. John's-wood; the Rev. J. R. Starey at Lambeth; the Rev. T. Redwar at St. Thomas's, Chancery-lane; and the Rev. J. S. Jenkinson at Battersea—all held meetings, some on one, others on several days, in devotional concert with the great movement. At Battersea, we note that a considerable number of the navvies employed in the railway works were present, and showed their appreciation of the solemn and blessed occasion. At St. Thomas's, many, at the conclusion of the meeting, "thanked their minister for the opportunity afforded them of engaging in social prayer." But surely these good brethren have that opportunity more frequently than once a-year? If not, they cannot do better than originate, forthwith, a Saturday evening prayer-meeting on the plan suggested above.

The meetings in the provinces were of the same varied character as those in the metropolis—congregational, denominational, and united. So far as we have been able to learn, the Bath assemblies appear to stand out prominently as the type of what most of us would wish, each for his own neighbourhood, on such occasions. Although, in this case, the services anticipated by a few days those held in the other parts of the country, we are yet sure that our readers will peruse with interest the following brief description of them:—

"It has been a source of extreme thankfulness that neither the state of the weather, the cold, the snow, or anything else, has been allowed to interfere with our meetings here. We have been astonished at the large crowds assembling in the vast hall on January 1, and on January 7 and 8. There has been no movement ever known here so nearly unanimous in the response of the people to the appeal of their clergy. No less than twenty clergymen of the Church of England have already in these three meetings taken parts, officiating in the services. Several others have taken their place on the platform or in the body of the meetings. The whole of the Nonconforming body have also taken part, and the whole tone of the proceedings has been marked by a spirit of earnestness, devotion, piety, and love, and all illustrate how beautiful it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Bath owes much to its worthy rector, the Rev. C. Kemble, without whose active lead in the matter such cheering scenes as these would scarcely have been possible.

With respect to the other parts of the country, it is difficult to give an adequate idea of the wide-spread extent of the movement. East, west, north and south the invitation has been complied with. We subjoin a brief notice of those which seem most to claim attention.

Aberdeen.—The largest assemblage ever collected within the Music-hall, met for devotional purposes. Near 3,000 were present. Private, congregational and united prayer-meetings were held during the preceding week.

Birmingham.—On Monday evening an aggregate meeting for the whole town was held in the Music-hall, under the Presidency of Lord Calthorpe, which was attended by about 2,000 persons. Meetings on a smaller scale were held daily.

Birkenhead.—Besides numerous other meetings, one was convened by advertisement at the Argyle room, on Thursday evening; but considerably before that time the room—the most capacious in Birkenhead—was so crowded, that it was deemed necessary to close the doors, and thus many hundreds were shut out. A large public schoolroom in the immediate vicinity was opened for a supplementary meeting. This, too, was quickly crammed with people, and, notwithstanding the arrangement, a large number were unavoidably excluded. "Being one of those who were excluded from the Argyle-room, I went over to the school-house, and was not a little edified by the evidences of zeal and devotion around me. Though a member of the Establishment, I could not listen without gratitude to the hearty and devout sighs and ejaculations on every side; to hear a sterling Wesleyan moan an ejaculatory prayer does one good. On Friday evening the Communion was administered at St. Mary's parish church to a large number, many Nonconformists participating in it."

Cheltenham.—A series of meetings for United Prayer has been held in Cheltenham, under the direction of the Cheltenham branch of the Evangelical Alliance. The attendance was so large, that additional accommodation was required for two days; and after that, a larger place of assembling was obtained. Several of the clergy, with the Dissenting ministers of the town, cordially united in the good work; and several lay gentlemen were also engaged. So delightful was the influence attendant upon the services, that the series is to be continued on each successive Thursday, till the end of the month.

Guildford.—United prayer-meetings were held every day during the week in the Public-hall, which, on each occasion, was densely crowded.

Leamington.—Prayer-meetings were held during the week twice a-day, at noon and in the evening, with a full attendance on each occasion.

Lincoln.—Meetings very large in the morning, extraordinarily large of an evening. "They were in our immense Corn Exchange, which is said to hold 800 or 1,000 persons; a very large number had to stand."

Lyminster, Hants.—The Literary Institute was densely crowded each night, from Monday to Saturday inclusive.

Manchester.—Meetings were held at the Free Trade-hall, which was well filled. The Rev. Canon Stowell was among the clergy present.

Ryde, Isle of Wight.—A united prayer-meeting, in which Churchmen and Dissenters joined with the greatest cordiality, was held every evening.

At Brighton, Burslem, Chichester, Durham, Guernsey, Jersey, Liverpool, Nottingham, and a host of other places throughout the country, meetings for devotional exercises were also held. The mere enumeration of them all would unduly trespass upon our space.

How largely the invitation has been complied with abroad, our readers will learn, from our foreign correspondence, for months to come. The whole subject may well move the lyric powers of those who are gifted to sing in melodious numbers. One such contribution may fitly follow this resumé.

A PRAYER FOR REVIVAL.

O! for the all-reviving grace,
The quickening power Divine;
This stupor from our souls to chase,
But chiefly, Lord, from mine!

We, we, the people of Thy love,
Why cleave we to the dust,
Neglect our glorious hopes above,
And trifle with our trust?

Thy nature, and Thy law, we know Severely righteous still;
And yet, how slothful and how slow
Our progress in Thy will!

We tread the very edge of doom,
And worlds of woe or bliss
Highgate Rise.

O'erhang the other side our tomb—
And yet, we sport on this!

Hell's hosts conspire against our weal,
Angels our burden bear;
Yet oh! we seem but half to feel
Our own eternal care!

And where our true, heart-bleeding love
For perishing mankind?
Who seeks, save Jesus from above,
The lost one—till he find!

Almighty Spirit! ere Thou make
The long-dead world alive,
Thy living Church from slumber wake,
Thy work in us revive!

RECENT GRAMMARS OF THE IRISH LANGUAGE.

The College Irish Grammar; containing, besides the usual subject of Grammar, some remarks, in the form of Dissertation, on the Orthography of the Language; how it can become fixed; on the number of Declensions and number of Conjugations, &c. Compiled chiefly with a view to aid the students of St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, and of the Catholic University of Ireland, in the Study of the National Language. By the Rev. ULICK J. BOURKE, of St. Patrick's College, Maynooth. Dublin: J. O'Daly; London: J. R. Smith. 1856.

1 Grammar of the Modern Irish Language; designed for the use of the Classes in the University of Dublin. By CHARLES HENRY HAMILTON WRIGHT, M.A., of Trinity College, Dublin; Editor of the "Book of Genesis in Hebrew, with a critically revised Text, Various Readings, and Grammatical and Critical Notes," &c., Assistant Curate of Middleton Tyas, Yorkshire. Second edition, revised and enlarged. London: Williams and Norgate. 1860.

The Celtic languages possess an interest for the inhabitants of the British Isles. The Celtic race is the substratum of the people of these shores. In England now, with few exceptions, it is extant only in the corners of the island—in Cornwall and Wales—yet it is to be traced here and there, scattered up and down through the length and breadth of the land, while it exists as a spoken language in Scotland and in Ireland, with an offshoot in the Isle of Man, now extinct as a vernacular.

The great Celtic races have ever been known as remarkable conquerors, who always have been conquered in their turn. They have never been able thoroughly to consolidate their power. mingled with other races, they have acquired firmness and durability, but by themselves they have proceeded in a steady course westward, driven from continent to island, and lately from their island shores have departed, in no small numbers, westward to America, there, in due time, to amalgamate completely with the great Anglo-Saxon race.

Although the fact is well known that a Celtic current runs underneath the Anglo-Saxon surface, yet it is seldom considered how much we owe to it. However, it is now very generally acknowledged that an English antiquarian or even grammarian ought to possess some knowledge of Celtic. Unfortunately, on this side the Channel, although there are found many who study a little of the Welsh branch of the Celtic, there are few who study even slightly the cognate Irish. The same fault pervades in general the antiquarians of the sister isle, who learn but little of the Welsh. Of course it will be understood that we refer to the general class of antiquarians—not to the leaders in this branch of research on either side of the Irish Channel.

Many of our most ordinary words have a direct Celtic origin, such as cabin, quay, clout, wall, gown, mesh, rail, ridge, tackle, &c.—words which, perhaps, at first sight, we should have thought to be genuine Saxon. One very interesting example of the light which the Celtic may be able to throw on individual words we will take from Mr. Garnett's Essays, p. 148. "No German or English philologist has," he remarks, "as far as the author knows, given a satisfactory etymology of the term summer. Lhuyd justly observes that it is, etymologically speaking, the same word as the Welsh hav; and that the proof of this may be found in the Irish forms, samh and samradh, the Gaelic s answering to the Cymric h. Professor Pictet has observed the affinity between the Sanskrit root śam and the Irish samh [and so we may remark has Bopp], both involving the idea of mild, soft, gentle; samhradh being literally the mild or genial quarter."

But apart from these and similar considerations, the study of Celtic is now of much more importance than formerly. Since the publication of the great work of the German scholar Zeuss, it has been confessed that the Celtic has taken its stand among the great families of Japhetic speech. * No longer is it doomed to be cast aside as unworthy of being studied; no longer is it to be left only to be cared for by a few local antiquarians or enthusiastic patriots, but, as Mr. Wright expresses it, Zeuss has connected the student of Celtic philology with the scholars labouring "in the wide field of Indo-European philology," and "Celtic benefits by all the light that has been thrown upon general philological studies by Grimm, Bopp, &c.; while it is itself now appreciated as being essential to a complete understanding of the languages and origin of the sister nations—viz., German, Italic, Greek, and their relations."

For a long time the great problem was unsolved—in what relation the Celtic stood connected, if at all, with the various languages around? There have been many of the native scholars (if we may dignify those with the name who exhibited but little scholarship in their researches) who ventured upon a comparison of Irish, at one time with Egyptian, at another with Persian, at another with Hebrew, and, in fact, with any language not generally understood, of which they happened to have some smattering. Among philologists, since the labours of Pritchard, of Bopp, of Pictet, and more recently and conclusively of Zeuss, such vain theories have been completely abandoned. We have an interesting sketch of the present state of home and continental scholarship in this department given us in the preface to Mr. Wright's above-mentioned work. The Celtic problem has been confessedly solved by Zeuss, who, alas! lived but for a brief period after he had given to the world his renowned and immortal "Grammatica Celtica." Sic transit gloria mundi. Celtic philology may well mourn over her departed genius.

Celtic has an Eastern origin, but it is the same as our own language; though widely removed, it is a cousin of our own, and the same blood, though somewhat diluted, flows in the veins of the rude Celt, the hardy Saxon, and the effeminate Bengali. The Celts have drawn from the same Eastern fountain from whence the Sanskrit, the Zend, the Greek, and the Latin have ultimately flowed.

And yet there are writers who, ignorant of these facts, and still in their darkness, would fain try to persuade the world that the language of the modern O'Neils and O'Briens has affinities to that of the Abrahams and Jacobs of antiquity.

As a rather amusing specimen of the philology of Maynooth College, we give the following, without note or comment, from the grammar of Mr. Bourke.

"There exists between Hebrew and Irish verbs an analogy which is worth being noticed.

"In Hebrew the third person singular, perfect tense, is the root of all verbs. In Irish the root is the second person singular imperative active, which is exactly the same as the third person singular perfect indicative, the latter differing from the imperative second person only in the aspiration of the initial letter.

"Again, the root of all regular verbs in Hebrew is composed of three consonants, none of which is a quiescent or a guttural. In Irish the root of verb of the first conjugation is a word of one syllable, or derivable from a word of one syllable. The termination, too, of many tenses and persons in verbs of the latter language are, as in the former, manifestly traceable from pronominal suffixes. There are, indeed, many points of resemblance existing between these two very ancient languages, too numerous to be treated of in a note."

Somewhat interested as we are in Celtic matters, we have made it a point to read through the various grammars of its dialects which have from time to time appeared. Mr. Bourke's grammar could not possibly be passed over by us. With the Irish harp and the Irish motto, "Erin for ever," in genuine Irish on its cover, it is attractive to the eye, and the title-page is quite enough to make the curious "look within." Its author is in love with his theme, as one might easily perceive from the mottoes on his title-page, one of which has tickled our fancy so much that we must present it to our readers:—

"Ah! pleasant Tongue, whose accents were as music to the ear!

Ah! magic Tongue, that round us wove its spells so soft and dear!

Ah! glorious Tongue, whose numbers could each Celtic heart enthral!

Ah! rushing Tongue, that sounded like the swollen torrent's fall!"

The author's own opinion of his work is decidedly favourable. He says: "The work is, then, I trust, made suitable to the wants and requirements of the present time and present improved taste, containing a little of what is pleasing with a great deal of what is useful. Fashioned in some measure after the improved editions of those elementary works that treat of the fashionable languages of the continent, it is, perhaps, in style and arrangement, not inferior to many of them."

We are very glad to hear it. Something, therefore, has been at last produced in Maynooth, which, in a literary way, repays the liberal grant which the nation has made to that institution. Something, we mean, of general interest, as we are not fond of works similar to those of Peter Deas and Co.

The fact that the Irish language is rapidly passing from the rank of a vernacular to that of a dead language grieves our author's heart, as well it might, and calls forth his indignation at Celtic apathy: "A Frenchman, unable to understand the language in which a Bossuet or a Chateaubriand wrote; in which a Massillon preached; a Mirabeau thundered; in which Napoleon I. dictated laws to Europe—would be an anomaly in his own land: and, strange to say, an Irishman, without knowing Irish, is nothing incongruous; a native of Eire without knowing his own 'sweet mother tongue' [we have taken the liberty of translating the Irish], is no anomaly among his people; and he has his education finished while he has yet learned nought of that language in which his own Saint Patrick preached to our heathen sires; Cormac Mac Eadua composed his famous laws; and in which Brian fired that heroism that blazed for the freedom of Ireland at the battle of Clontarf. Are we a paradox among the nations?"

Eloquence of this kind abounds through the work. Mr. Bourke indicates his remedy for the state of things described above at the close of his tables of the verb, at which point, charmed with their simplicity and beauty, he makes another effort to arouse his countrymen. "The fault, then," of not learning Irish "does not lie in its intrinsic difficulty, but must exist either in the want of clear philological elementary works, written by competent authorities, with a desire to unfold the natural beauty and simplicity of our mother tongue; or perhaps it is owing, in part at least, to the apathy of Irishmen to be Irish in language as well as in thought and action. Shall this ever cease? let each say—IT SHALL."

Our author labours to make it appear that Irish is as complete as any other tongue. He will not allow the language to want either a subjunctive mood or to be confined to one conjugation, and he bestows a great deal of labour on these particulars, which, however, are uninteresting to be discussed here.

It is unnecessary, we think, to inform our readers that Mr. Wright's grammar, although it is a clergyman of the Establishment, does not contain anything of a religious element, as such would be completely out of place. The grammar is simply given with such philological remarks as illustrate its connexion with that of the other Celtic languages, and with occasional references also to Sanskrit, when it throws light upon the Irish forms. He has also made such use of the work of Zeuss.

Mr. Bourke's grammar, however, is by no means neutral. He thinks it right, as a Roman Catholic priest, to teach the doctrines of the Holy Roman Church, as well as the rules of Irish grammar, and while engaged in discussing the latter, he is not unduly of the former. Thus, on p. 135 in his Syntax, where he has occasion to give the phrase for "May God bless you!" as an example, he tells us that the reply, "May God and Mary bless you [we translate the Irish]! so Catholic, tells how our fathers loved, in the polite changes of civility, to unite the name of the Virgin Mother—Mary—with that of her dear Son, and in thus asking a blessing through her, who is 'the channel of all graces,' long the words of civility to the dignity of prayer, and the poverty of their expression very often to the richness of merit. When compared with this, how cold does our own English 'good morrow,' or 'how do you do?' appear!"

Bad taste enough, one would think; but here are his own translations of specimens he gives of the Irish language:—

"A vessel of balsam is Mary's womb.

An urn full of plentiful mercy,

Vessel of graces—the purest draught—

A vessel that never bore a stain.

"A vessel sweeter than honey,

In which was placed the King of Kings;

A vessel most fit to bear wine—

A vessel that carried the Sovereign King.

"Urn of lurid gold, of exhilarating draughts;
Banquet of heaven from which I shall drink;
Rich goblet of most beautiful beverage,
Vessel that saves us from death.

"I do not well deserve to obtain the home of Heaven,
But through her intercession;
May the King of the household abandon me not,
And may Mary not forsake me!"

Extracts like this, given as specimens of a language which abounds with poetry of almost every kind, and in which romances of great beauty are extant, will show the animus of the writer, as our former extracts give some idea of the amount of education he possesses even in plain English.

Evangelical Alliance.

EVANGELISATION IN ITALY.

Acting in conformity with the resolution of the Nottingham Conference, the Committee of Council have given their earliest attention to this subject. It is unnecessary to enter into the details of the correspondence and resolutions, and the more so as the result will, we are persuaded, afford pleasure to all who were present at the Conference, and to the members of the Alliance at large. That result will be best gathered from the following paper, just issued by the Committee:—

EVANGELISATION IN ITALY.

"The doors in Italy are opened to the Messengers of the glad tidings—but how long will it be so?"

Such is the language in which the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance is addressed by their friends in Geneva; and in this language the Committee address themselves to all their constituents and friends in England, Scotland, Ireland, and our Colonies.

It is impossible that we should turn a deaf ear to such an appeal. Twenty-four millions of men, but yesterday under the domination of Popery, and inaccessible to the evangelist and colporteur, are now, multitudes of them, eager to receive the Word of God, and all of them within its reach.

On the other hand, in all parts of our own country, the strongest disposition exists to render the help that is needed. What Christian's heart does not burn within him at the thought of Italy receiving the Gospel, and with it the liberty, both civil and religious, which it never fails to bestow? But on all hands the questions are proposed, how may we help this blessed work? What are the modes and channels in which assistance may be given?

The Committee reply—1. The circulation of the Bible is of infinite moment. The British and Foreign Bible Society is doing much in this way by colportage and otherwise. But there are some things even in this province of labour which remain to be done. Besides the circulation of the Bible or even of the New Testament in its entirety, it would be very desirable more extensively to print and distribute particular portions of it; as, for example, the Epistle to the Romans, the Epistles of St. Peter, the Acts of the Apostles, &c., as separate publications.

2. The Employment of Evangelists and Colporteurs.—Of these many are sustained by different Committees and by the Waldensian Church. Others are offering themselves in both branches of the work. Great discretion is needed in their appointment, and is exercised. But pecuniary means are wanted.

3. The Publication of Religious Works and Tracts written by Italians.—Dr. De Sanctis has written some admirable little works, and is now employed in preparing a new edition of the Amico di Casa for 1861. Of this work 40,000 copies were printed in 1860. Paleario's well known and excellent work on the Death of Christ should always be kept in print. And men whom God has graciously enlightened and renewed by his Holy Spirit, and who are otherwise competent, should be encouraged to apply themselves to the production of other books on Christian subjects, adapted to the Italian mind.

4. The Translation of Works by Foreign Authors.—The Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, by the late Robert Haldane, is being translated by a gentleman in Florence.

A few other translations have been made, such as "The Pilgrim's Progress," "The Bible Handbook," by Dr. Angus, and "The Sinner's Friend." But much more might be done in this way. There are valuable treatises by English, French, and German writers, which would be found very useful; as, for example, Leighton's Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter, Luther on the Galatians, some of the writings of Romaine, of Guers, of Rochat, of Adolphe Monod, and others. In all that relates to this department the Committee will act in harmony with the Religious Tract Society of London, by which excellent Institution much has already been done.

5. The Waldensian Church—that ancient and faithful witness for Christ, when "all the world wondered after the beast," and the rocky sides of whose Alpine fastnesses have again and again streamed with the blood of the "slaughtered saints"—that venerable and newly-revived community of our fellow-Christians—should receive our cordial sympathy and liberal support. Invited by the marvellous interpositions of Divine Providence, they have descended from their mountains into the plains, and are spreading the tidings of the common salvation in their own way, and by their own institutions, in some of the principal cities of Northern Italy. Their evangelists, their schools, their Theological Seminary, recently removed to Florence, all demand, and are worthy to receive, our help.

6. Lastly, to avail ourselves of the language of our friends in Geneva: "Before all, and above all, let the Christians of the Evangelical Alliance [rather of our whole country] pray for the advancement of the Kingdom of God in Italy! This is a privilege and a duty. What avails our troubling ourselves, like Martha; we must, above all, keep ourselves at the feet of Jesus, like Mary. Our Committee meet every Monday to pray for Italy. In the name of the Lord, let Christians unite with us in prayer, and we shall soon see that there is our strength."

The Committee of the Evangelical Alliance put forth this appeal to Christians of all sections of the Church of Christ. The voice which, in such startling accents, addresses us from Italy, is the voice, not of man, but of God, and it speaks to us all. May He fill our hearts with love, and prompt our hands to deeds of Christian liberality.

Signed on behalf of the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance,

THE LATE BARON DE BUNSEN.

Bedwell-park, Hatfield, Jan. 21, 1861.

My dear Birks,—I am sure that everything you do is done from a desire to glorify God. But will you pardon me for expostulating with you for writing as you have done to the Record?

When your dear father-in-law, Edward Bickersteth, died, from love to his memory, as well as from esteem to yourself, you were unanimously chosen to succeed him as one of the Honorary Secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance. We all feel that your personal excellence and literary talents do honour to the Alliance; but I am sure you will be the first to admit, that to be thus selected by the representatives of the Evangelical Church of your country was an honour to the person so chosen.

Was it right for one so honoured with the confidence of his brethren to take the step which you have taken?—taken, I am convinced, under a sense of duty, but taken—I am equally persuaded—without adequately realising the gravity of the proceeding.

Without communicating with your colleagues in office, or asking them, or the Committee of the Alliance, for explanations, you have addressed a strong letter of censure to a public journal, in reference to the minute adopted on the death of Baron de Bunsen.

I deny, in the first place, that there was anything in the minute to deserve your reproach. Here it is; and I must add that it is the only document for which the Alliance is responsible

The passage from a letter or article on Baron de Bunsen's last hours, upon which the Record and yourself have commented, was only a matter of intelligence in a magazine, published on the responsibility of the editors, and was not an official expression.

THE LATE BARON DE BUNSEN.—The following Resolution was adopted of condolence with the bereaved family of this distinguished man: "Resolved—That this Committee have heard with deep and sincere regret of the death of that distinguished Christian statesman and man of letters, the Baron de Bunsen, and desire the Chairman to communicate to his bereaved family their heartfelt sympathy in their affliction. Without expressing their concurrence in all the theological views of Baron Bunsen, the Committee would express their sense of the personal excellence in all the relations of life of that distinguished man, and of the warm affection which he at all times manifested towards the true servants of God of every sect and nation. The Committee would also record their grateful recollection of the deep interest which the deceased Baron took in the Berlin Conference of 1857, and the readiness with which he responded to the call of his Sovereign, the King of Prussia, to be present on that occasion."

The minute was purposely so worded as to avoid committing us to objectionable views contained in Baron de Bunsen's critical works. The Alliance had found him an ever ready friend of religious liberty, to whom we never appealed in vain, in his public capacity, to obtain redress for grievances. He came, too, at the summons of the King of Prussia to Berlin, in 1857, to be present at the conference; and though he was not—and, consistently with some of his opinions, could not be—a member of the Alliance, he did there in the most public manner evince his sympathy with and love towards the assembled Evangelical piety of Christendom.

I say we were justified as a body in paying a tribute of respect to such a man. We said nothing of him as a teacher, and there was not one of us who would have consented to do so. We said nothing of his possessing saving faith—though for one I entertain the confident belief, founded mainly on the information of others, but partly also on my own limited intercourse with him, that Baron de Bunsen, with all his serious intellectual errors (for such I deem them), was a child of God, resting upon his Saviour's Cross. But what we did say was, that he was a man of personal excellence in the relations of life, and a Christian statesman.

By that expression I am prepared to stand. If you will ask the diplomatic body of London (many of whom would naturally dislike his doing so), they would tell you that no public man ever more thoroughly carried publicly-avowed Christian motives into public life. And surely no one who, like yourself, is prepared to call any sovereign who may come to the throne of England "religious and gracious," can object, a fortiori, to our calling such a man as Baron de Bunsen a Christian statesman! There is a clear and definite sense in which, even apart from personal piety, public characters, who strive to rule their lives by Christian principles, are entitled to that epithet.

This is my first ground: I deny the justice of the censure you have pronounced on the minute of the Alliance.

But even if censure had been ever so legitimate, I must end as I began, by expressing regret that the first thing which a committee hear of the dissent of their own trusted officer from a portion of their proceedings, should be through a public print. Had you communicated in the first instance with your colleagues, I cannot but think that the explanations which you would have received would have given a different colour to your public expressions. As it is, I anticipate that you will feel, on reflection, that you have not done justice to a body which reposed in you their affectionate confidence, and whose act you have placed before the Christian public in an undeservedly unfavourable light.

You will, I am certain, pardon the frankness with which I write. It is of the essence of the Alliance, that when we think a friend wrong, we say so affectionately, but freely. I should have preferred only addressing you privately, but the publicity of your animadversions on the Alliance necessitates the publication of my reply. It shall not, however, appear till Friday next, in order that, if you wish to do so, you may be able to reply to me in the interval.

Sincerely trusting that, if our lives are spared, we may long work together for a cause equally dear to you and to me,

Believe me, my dear Brother,

Faithfully yours,

(Signed) C. E. EARDLEY.

THE BUNSEN CONTROVERSY.

THE Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, to preserve peace and union among their own members, have rescinded so much of their original resolution as did not refer to the condolence offered to Baron Bunsen's bereaved family, or to his courtesy and services to the Alliance. In other words, they withdrew that obnoxious phrase of which such a handle has been adroitly made, "distinguished Christian statesman;" as well as, of course, the reference to his erroneous theological writings. We hope, though not sanguinely, that the Alliance may now obtain peace. When a quarrel is intended, the occasion is not difficult to find. Sir Culling Eardley repeatedly has disclaimed the idea of calling Bunsen a "distinguished Christian," as it has been so ingeniously alleged; but it was meant that he was a distinguished statesman, who carried a Christian element into politics. To take the two first words alone, is akin to the process of proving the Pope's authority from the dislocated words, "Hear the Church;" or (as Archbishop Whately gets credit for the witticism), establishing that ~~we~~ may on scriptural warrant "Hang all the law and the prophets." Ingenious, never, as was the original garbling, the defence of the Record is still more exquisite. Had he been called a "distinguished German statesman," quoth our logical contemporary, would any one deny that he was denominated a distinguished German? Had M. Soyer been styled a distinguished military cook, he must of course be a distinguished soldier. Were Dr. M'Caul denominated a distinguished Rabbinical or Jewish scholar, of course he is become a distinguished Jew or Rabbi. Or on the supposition that Bunsen had been born in England and become a statesman in Germany, without being of German birth at all, no one might, forsooth, call him a German statesman!

But to leave these triflings. Of what, after all, were the gentlemen of the committee accused? Is it not notorious that they are all men who hold and confess Evangelical truth? Did any one, even of those Record writers, who have shown themselves by no means nambily-pambily scrupulous—did any even of these accuse the committee of complicity with infidelity, or of sympathy with infidelity, or of anything really morally wrong? Mr. Birks, who [perhaps] knows all about Baron Bunsen's writings, and who, at all events, has read "Essays and Reviews," compassionately suggests that "they went in their simplicity, and knew not anything." The Record adopts and endorses this suggestion as the true state of the case; that same Record which had previously stigmatised the committee as deficient in "heavenly wisdom, true charity to man, and fidelity to the God of the Bible." Harsh terms and hard measure, surely, for simple men "who knew not anything." They had only before their minds' eye at the moment a bereaved Christian family (we emphasise the word Christian here), and the tomb scarcely closed over the remains of a man who had some claims on their kind wishes. They were not thinking at all of those ponderous tomes of massive learning, through which were scattered the obnoxious opinions of the deceased philosopher; they were not thinking of "Essays and Reviews," and of the cowardly and disingenuous use which Dr. Rowland Williams had made of the Baron's writings, collecting into a focus, and much misrepresenting in the juxtaposition and in the spirit, those scattered opinions, which were thus garbled, popularised, and envenomed, after a manner that is as inexcusable as it would, doubtless, have been hateful to Bunsen himself. No! they were absorbed in the contemplation of the solemnities of a remarkable death-chamber, the spectacle of a weeping family, the remembrance of a departed friend; they were generally aware, indeed, that he had broached some error in theology, and they guarded themselves, as they thought, from the reproach of countenancing those errors; but they were unadvised as to their amount, and still more as to their present evil bulking in the public mind's eye; they fell, accordingly, into a mistake; and like as a lion greedy for his prey, the lurker issued from his lair; the kite descended, according to his wont; the doves were scattered; and the blessed and congenial result was attained, of "sowing discord among brethren."

Who does not now see that a few quiet words, in private, by Mr. Birks, or any other friend, with the volume of "Essays and Reviews" in hand, would have rectified easily the unintended error, and preserved peace and union without injury to truth? Who does not see a new illustration of our blessed Lord's heavenly wisdom, when He enjoined to brethren private remonstrance as the first step in noticing a brother's fault? Such a scriptural step, we doubt not, would have been taken by Mr. Birks himself, but for the previous blast of the trumpeter who sounded him on to battle. What, do we talk of peace? To the trumpeter peace is the cessation of function and of pay. And, as we read that in eastern climes a lion, once tasting man's flesh, loses all his natural shyness, and, instead of shunning the habitations of men, thirsts and hunts for human blood, and becomes distinctly known to the poor native villagers as a "man-eating lion;" so seeks the moral man-eater his prey. Reputations are his quarry. He watches for the halting of his enemy; aye, for the halting of his friend. He gloats exultingly, and saith, "Aha! I have them now."

But the men who went in their simplicity, and knew not anything, have, it seems, "consecrated infidelity," and also "given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme!" We trust the day is approaching when rant of this kind will be indigestible, even by the correspondents of the Record; but it would be refreshing to be informed, in anything like intelligible terms, how the poor Alliance resolution gave any such handle to blasphemers or enemies of the Lord. Of Bunsen's real character we shall say something presently, in our own special defence. But, amidst all this false fire and smoke and dust, it is not difficult for discerning eyes to perceive where is the real blasphemy and the real "consecration of infidelity." We do, indeed, too palpably behold that, in the high places of the Church, infidelity has been consecrated, and that something like blasphemy does exuberate. We do see that the Westminster Review—infidelity's organ—claims kindred with doctors of divinity, head masters of ecclesiastical schools, and officiating clergy of the Church. Who "consecrates" these? By what fatality is it that the whole Episcopal bench at this time publishes its doubtful desire, or doubtfully confesses its impotency to disconsecrate the audacious priests, who, by virtue of their own consecrating authority, confess and proclaim no doubtful doctrines of anti-Christianity? Can it be believed that these seven men would have thrown "Essays and Reviews" defiantly in the teeth of the Episcopal bench, were they not perfectly confident of sympathisers and followers by hundreds, perhaps by thousands, amongst the clergy, ordained after a manifold subscription to articles and creeds? Repeatedly have we been reminded lately of the value of "creeds." Bunsen was a "demolisher of creeds." Pressensé "thinks it a fine thing to soar above all neology and above all creeds." But with the creed-bound and article-bound clergy before us, who write and who approve "Essays and Reviews;" with the fact before us that Romanists at heart and in doctrine unite with the essayists and reviewers in subscription to the same Evangelical formularies; with the school of Maurice, and so many other discordant schools abounding around us, who all profess the same articles and creeds as doth the Record—we believe that the British public will ere long demand some more cogent proof of the value of those commodities than a furious assault upon the foreign Bunsen as a great creed-demolisher; or a side-wind diversion of obloquy from the real head and front of the offence to the innocent committee of a loving Christian association, who "went in their simplicity and knew not anything." Not because of their untimely minute has the enemy had at all an occasion afforded for exultation; but because the national Church of England exhibits the deplorable spectacle of a divided house; a defied and helpless hierarchy; a corrupted and corrupting priesthood, who subscribe to articles they do not believe, and who, proclaiming their unbeliefs after subscription, are allowed to retain those offices and emoluments to which they mounted by virtue of their hypocrisy and fraud.

Now we will here leave no room for mistake, or for misrepresentation. Evangelical Christendom is a journal wholly uncontrolled by the Evangelical Alliance or by any other association. These articles, too, are not written by any Dissenter, but by a clergyman of the Established Church, who never cares to conceal his name. So much is necessary because of the groundless personal attacks made by name upon a beloved and honoured Dissenting brother, contrary to all honourable usage and without foundation. And being now relieved from all apprehension of compromising the Alliance, or anybody else, we calmly aver our deliberate conviction that the clerical clique who surround the Record have made a grand mistake in tactics, as time will show; and have also exhibited a spirit which cannot but be injurious to the reputation of English Evangelical Christianity. For example, the Rev. Mr. Jackson, once the Travelling Secretary of the Alliance, and still a member, in a short letter to the Record, aims four friendly and assassinating blows against his brethren. He tells us that the London committee has not the confidence of the constituency. Did he ever so inform that committee while he was their paid employé? But the committee is annually elected in the full conference of the members—so that may pass. Secondly, he thrusts at Dr. Steane, as editor of Evangelical Christendom, with charges as unjust as they are spiteful. Thirdly, he thinks there will be no good alliance until "Dissenters cease to be a people who delight in war." What a conciliating advocacy of loving union! And, fourthly, he votes his own want of confidence in Sir Culling Eardley, who is unfit to be president of a society whereof Mr. Jackson is a member. What the Record thinks that the cause of Evangelical Christianity is likely to gain by such an exhibition of loving animus, we don't know. Neither do we think that the reputation of the party for good sense will be much increased by the contribution of another, who declares that he has obtained great advantage from De Wette's German Bible, but that if he had only known him to be a Rationalist, he would have long since committed it to the flames, as he did the Lexicon of Gesenius some years ago! Such sentiments may go alongside the more demonstrative piety of the Cambridge clergyman who lately horsewhipped his brother clergyman in honour of the Lord Jesus Christ.

But we turn from these follies to the serious question, raised in the late controversy, as to the real character in death of the faith of Baron de Bunsen. Evangelical Christendom was incriminated by the Record for daring to advance such an opinion as that, on the evidence laid before us, there was good ground for a charitable hope that Bunsen departed in Christ. What the Record writers really mean to advance upon this head we cannot comprehend. They profess to abstain from judging of the state of his soul before God, they profess a sort of vague and faint idea of a possibility he might escape damnation. On what grounds, we ask, is any such vague and faint idea based? We know of no salvation except in, through, and by a true faith in Jesus Christ as the Saviour. If Bunsen had not this he perished. We are not afraid to say so. But our assertion always was and is, that this true faith he did possess, and that, therefore, he departed in Christ. Our article of last month is before our readers; and we do not doubt but that in due time that article will be justified. An attempt has been made indeed in the Record to answer that article—an attempt which is beneath our notice. If epithets constituted arguments, we are indeed answered. For our article is styled "querulous;" our unanswerable reference to the ninth commandment is styled "groundless and intemperate;" our doctrine is styled "Antinomianism;" and our charity "false and sentimental." We treat this epithetic "Rationalism" with the cool indifference it merits. And we simply assert that the whole of the Record's vituperative assault on this journal of "high sounding" name, is grounded upon the gross misstatement, that we ever afforded the slightest foundation for the assertion, that we gave vent to an opinion that any sinner, without faith or repentance, could depart in Christ, or that Bunsen, without these graces, did so depart.

One instance of the Record's management of epithets will suffice. We were commenting upon the original article in that paper (the writer of which had been mentioned to us by name), in which it was elaborately argued that Bunsen's dying expressions gave no evidence of faith in Jesus. He had said: "I have desired, I have sought for, that which is noble here below." This the Record writer declared "in its connexion sounds too much like self-righteousness." We, however, supplied the connexion, and said: "Surely the 'charity which hopeth all things' might, without peril of unfaithfulness to the God of the Bible; have taken an entirely opposite view of the connexion in which that utterance is found. The words following immediately in connexion [which are entirely suppressed by the Record] are these: 'BUT MY BEST EXPERIENCE IS THAT OF HAVING KNOWN JESUS CHRIST.'"

In reply to this the Record dares to say that the Editor of Christendom "UNTRULY" alleges that these words were suppressed by the Record. And how does he substantiate this charge of untruth? He tells us that the portion of M. de Pressensé's letter quoted by Evangelical Christendom was quoted also by the Record. In what number of that journal? Was it before or after the article on which we were commenting? It certainly was not in the number in which the elaborated article on which we were commenting appeared; and we certainly never saw it. But suppose it had been elsewhere quoted—in some other number—what is that to the purpose? We charged, and we charge, the writer of the original article with garbling; we say that, to make out his case, he charged Bunsen with "something like self-righteousness;" and that, to colour that charge, he suppressed the words: "But my best experience is that of having known Jesus Christ." We hope the writer of the second article is not the gentleman who wrote the first. In fact, it is impossible he can be. The first writer may have overlooked the words, in his zeal to prove Bunsen all evil and no good; the second resorted to what can be designated by no other name than a desperate dodge.

Of many additional confirmations of the views we took of this case, we shall supply a few. In the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung we have read the following:—

The expressions uttered by Baron de Bunsen during the last week of his life (as communicated by the Revue Chrétienne) give an idea of the serious religious state of mind in which he spent his last days, and at last conquered death. Whatever position Bunsen, in later years, occupied with regard to critical problems and ecclesiastical party struggles, the bond of his personal communion with the Lord was not severed by it, and in the face of death he gave a clear and definite expression to this consciousness. He gave directions that this should be publicly mentioned at his grave. Pastor Walters, therefore, could not have chosen a more suitable text for his funeral address (1st December) than the words (Zech. xiv. 7): "At evening time it shall be light." Of the last words, which were not mentioned in the Revue Chrétienne, the following expressed, perhaps, the deepest experience of his life: "All the bridges which are erected by us, in order to come into personal communion with Christ, break down beneath us in the last extremity, and it is only simple faith which remains as the only way to Him." In this faith he could gladly give up everything, whatever he had begun or finished. It could not have been otherwise. Everything else lost its value in proportion as those words gained an exclusive value:—"Whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's." And the Amen from his lips testified how deeply he felt them. Free of everything, and prepared, reconciled with God and man, he longed to die. A last solemn moment for him and for his family awaited him just before his approaching death. "Not without a firm and sure testimony would he depart," he said, "and he accounted it among his last duties openly to confess himself on the side of the Saviour and on the side of the Evangelical Church."

Thus he received with his family the Holy Communion. He knew that the Lord had given it to His Church for the remission of sins. About evening time it was light.

Still more satisfactory is the following extract of a letter written to the Baron's son, some time before the event of his decease:—

(Translation of an extract from a letter of Pastor (now General-Superintendent) Wiesmann to George de Bunsen.)

Coblentz, Oct. 28, 1860.

... Your father had seated himself in his armchair, and after a few short words of greeting, began the conversation in a clear, firm voice, scarcely impeded by his great weakness, and with a clear mind, made in substance the following confession:—

That he praised the everlasting mercy of God in the manifestation of His only begotten Son, and freely confessed that he, in the full sense of his own guilt, relied for salvation only on the free grace of God in Christ, and not in the very remotest degree, or in any way, upon his own merits.

I assured him of my joy at this, and that as he had, from his youth up, stood upon this foundation, so now, that he should still maintain the same, and then observed that I could say nothing that was new to him on this point, but would only direct his attention to this, that in life and in death we must make it our whole object to arrive at a personal fellowship with the Lord, as only this secures to us a true peace.

Your father answered that men had striven to throw many bridges across to gain this one object, but that he was convinced that all these bridges must be overthrown, and men must fall back upon the one only Saviour, and on a simple faith in the Lord.

I then directed him to several of the chief points in this faith, and then repeated the following verse:—

"Ich habe nun den Freund gefunden."

I then passed on to his great sufferings, and reminded him of many apostolic sayings: Rom. v. 3, 4—"For we know that affliction worketh patience." Heb. xii. 2—"Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous." Phil. xiv. 13—"I can do all things through Christ, which strengtheneth me." This verse your father took up with peculiar earnestness, and assured me, with deep fervour, that he daily experienced this, and hoped still more to experience it.

Towards the end, when a fit of coughing came on, which obliged us to break off our conversation, he thanked me warmly, and assured me that what I had said would certainly prove a blessing to him.

The whole interview has left an instructive and delightful impression on my mind, and has impressed me with the conviction that your father is established in the faith, which gives us the certainty of salvation both in life and in death.

May the faithful God, in whom he trusts, help him according to the riches of His goodness, to overcome unto the end, and strengthen you all in the coming trying hour of separation from this much-loved and highly-honoured head of your family.

WIESMANN.

This conversation took place on the evening of Oct. 28th.

With these documents we might leave the case for the present. The time will come when a full and fair examination of his worst works will show how much his reputation has suffered from the insidious use made of them by Dr. Rowland Williams; and how grotesquely perverted is the idea of Bunsen's infidel character and achievements which has so alarmed the Evangelical public here. We are far from palliating any of the errors of Bunsen. The man who assails the doctrine of inspiration must expect to be criticised and condemned for his folly. But to treat this man as an infidel of the Tom Paine or Voltaire class is an irrational violence which defeats itself. The very Bunsen who is cried down here as an infidel of the worst description, was cried down in Germany by infidels as a "Pietist."

What is to be said of the fact of his expending 500*l.* and much labour to produce a volume of exquisite devotions? Caroline Winkworth has translated into English about 100 poems from Bunsen's "Versuch eines Allgemeinen Gesang und Gebet-buchs;" and dedicated her work to Chevalier Bunsen, by his permission. In that volume all the grand doctrines of Christianity are enshrined. Take one of the Good Friday hymns for example :—

Thou holiest Love, whom most I love,
Who art my longed-for only bliss,
Whom tenderest pity erst did move,
To fathom woe and Death's abyss ;
Who once did suffer for my good,
And die my guilty debts to pay,
Thou Lamb of God, whose precious blood
Can take a world's misdeeds away.

Thou Love, who didst such anguish bear
Upon the mount of agony,
And yet with ceaseless, watchful care,
Dost yearn o'er us so tenderly ;
Thou camest not Thy will to seek,
But all Thy Father's will obey,
Bearing the cross in patience meek,
That Thou might'st take our curse away.

O Love, who, with unflinching heart,
Enduredst all disgrace and shame :
O Love, who 'mid the keenest smart
Of dying pangs wert still the same :
Who didst Thy changeless virtue prove,
E'en with Thy latest parting breath,
And spakest words of gentlest love,
When soul and body sank in death.

O Love, through sorrows manifold
Hast Thou betrothed me as a bride ;
By ceaseless gifts, by love untold,
Hast bound me ever to Thy side.
O let the weary ache, the smart
Of life's long tale of pain and loss
Be gently still'd within my heart
At thought of Thee, and of Thy cross.

O Love, who, dying thus for me,
Hast won me an eternal good,
Through sorest anguish on the tree,
I ever think upon Thy blood ;
I ever thank Thy sacred wounds,
Thou wounded Love, Thou Holiest ;
But most when life is near its bounds,
And in Thy bosom safe I rest.

O Love, who unto death hast grieved
For this cold heart, unworthy Thine ;
Whom once the chill, dark grave received,
I thank Thee for that grief Divine ;
I give Thee thanks that Thou didst die
To win eternal life for me,
To bring salvation from on high ;
O draw me up through love to Thee.

We might easily multiply quotations from this volume, and from other works of Bunsen to a similar effect. But enough ; our thesis is, that if he did not depart in Christ, there is no want of charity in saying that he died without salvation. That would be the real Antinomianism. But our further thesis is that he did evidence at the last that he was brought back to a simple trust in the real Christ, the only Saviour, and that this is cause for rejoicing to the true Christian heart. How can the infidel take occasion either to blaspheme or to encase himself in his unbelief, when he hears that, after all, Bunsen renounced his follies and returned to his Lord, and died relying on the blood and righteousness of Christ only ? We understand that the Religious Tract Society have published similar views of the case in the Leisure Hour, quoting the testimony of M. De Pressensé, and adding, of their own accord, an elucidatory sentence that such was the hopeful close of a long and splendid career. We believe that the British and the European public will ere long do full justice to our advocacy of this question, and that some good men, who have been bewildered by the fierce clamour of a too zealous and undistinguishing clique, will acknowledge that we are neither Rationalists nor Antinomians, because we do not choose to be hurried out of the path of charity by the violence of party, because we will not submit to the insulting denunciation of an intolerant clique, and because, while the Record acknowledges us to be "as Evangelical as themselves"—(we humbly hope so)—we desire to advocate the truth in the spirit of love.*

THE LATE PROFESSOR BAUR, OF TUBINGEN.

AN able and interesting article on the late Professor Baur has appeared in a recent number of the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, of Berlin, from which we extract the following facts and criticisms, as a suitable sequel to the letter of Professor Lechler, on

* Since this article was in type we have seen with pleasure in the Record a short letter from the Rev. Mr. Jackson, in which he regrets his former letter, on which we have found it necessary to comment in strong terms. This is well. But every step elucidates the impropriety of the original stirring up of strife among brethren:

the Tübingen school, which we communicated to our readers in our last number. The name of the writer is not given, but the editor refers to him as a theologian of celebrity, and considers that he has not only presented a very clear account of the theological development through which Dr. Baur passed, but has also pointed out in a very striking manner the weak points of his system.

Ferdinand Christian Baur was a Württemberger by birth, and was born 29th June, 1792. He was educated at Tübingen, and attached himself with ardent sympathy to the philosophy of Fichte. The genius of Fichte stamped itself upon him, and continued to influence him more strongly through life than that of any of the other great philosophers of his country, although his own mental endowments did not qualify him so much for philosophical speculation and systemising as for the philosophical study and treatment of history. From 1817 to 1826 he was a teacher of the Greek language and literature, and his first work was his "Symbolik der Vorchristlichen Religionen" (the Symbolism of the Religions before Christ) in which the strong bent of his genius for investigating the inner intellectual history of man became at once conspicuous, and also a rare gift of combination, and a habit of viewing all single facts in their wide and grand connexions. As a theologian he was at first a disciple of Schleiermacher, and he continued such as long as he supposed his great master to be rather a worshipper of the ideal Christ than a believer in the identity of this ideal with the historical Jesus of Nazareth. It was under this impression that he called upon Schleiermacher to speak out more plainly and boldly on this subject than he had done in his work first published in 1821, "Der Christliche Glaube" (The Christian Faith). But he had misunderstood Schleiermacher, who had never intended to set up a distinction between the historical and the ideal Christ, though he had seemed to lay more stress upon the latter than the former, but who viewed the historical element as an integral part of the Christian faith. In the celebrated letter which Schleiermacher addressed to Baur upon this occasion, he used the memorable words—that if things should ever come to the unhappy alternative of choosing between knowing and believing, between the groins of the scientific and the faith of the Christian people, he would honestly prefer to stand on the side of the believing Church. This unexpected reply to Baur's call put an end to the latter's connexion with the school of Schleiermacher. Baur had learned to sympathise with Fichte in his exaltation of the ideal Christ above the historical Jesus. The union and identity of the ideal and the actual in the Christ of the Gospels was a stumbling-block which he could never get over. It seemed to him to involve a contradiction to the Absolute and the Infinite of the Divine nature. It made the person of Jesus a miracle in history, and with Baur, who held the Pantheistic view of God, a miracle was a priori an impossibility. After his rupture with Schleiermacher he drew nearer to the system of Hegel, and felt powerfully the charm of that all-determining logic—that all-potent thought-power, which subjects to itself even the worlds of matter and of history, and promises to throw light upon all that is confused, and to organise into system all that is isolated and scattered. Baur even out-Hegels Hegel himself. To him "logic"—or the thought-process—is the whole world of truth; all must be reduced and resolved into it; it is the immortal part or element of all dogmas. With equal learning and ability he handles, in a series of monographs, the chief Christian doctrines in this point of view—the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, and the Lord's Supper. Everywhere in these doctrines he sees one and the same thing, only under different aspects—viz., the oneness (in a Pantheistic sense), of God and humanity; at first only existing in fact, and unknown to self, but gradually working itself out to self-knowledge or consciousness. Apart from which peculiar tendency of thought, and the erroneous reflections arising from it, these monographs will long retain value for their profound research into the "sources" of dogmatic history.

The second half of his academic and literary life was devoted to researches into the early history of Christianity and the Church. These were marked by indefatigable industry and perseverance, and by rare acuteness; but the course which they took, and the results in which they issued, could not fail to be injuriously affected by the primary principle from which they started—viz., that the identity of the ideal Christ of the Church with the historical Jesus of Nazareth, was a theory inconceivable and, a priori, impossible. Such an assumption at starting was of course little favourable to the freedom and the unprejudiced character of his inquiries. Such an assumption, in fact, pre-determined the result before all inquiry. "For when it was assumed beforehand that it was impossible that the historical Jesus could be identical with the ideal Christ, i.e., with the Christ of the Church theology, it was also, of course, impossible beforehand that the Gospel accounts which represent him as thus identical could be true history. On the other hand, as Baur had too much reverence for Jesus and His apostles (as he viewed them) to attribute such a view of His person either to Him or to them, it became also necessary to determine, before all investigation, that all these accounts were written in times posterior to the apostolic age—when a love of mythical fiction had begun to creep into the Church. He had no liking, however, as some others, for a mere naked negativism of assertion, nor did he content himself with speculating on popular credulity and the equal pleasure which men take in exalting what is natural into the marvellous, and degrading what is ideal into the actual. He went to work strictly as an historian, and as such he recognised the duty both of explaining the genesis of those higher ideas of Christ which began to prevail in the Church, and also of bringing into historical agreement with this alleged explanation the numerous written documents of the ancient Church, whose apostolic origin he denied. To both of these problems it seemed to him that the early antagonism between Judaic and Gentile Christianity furnished a satisfactory solution. This antagonism Baur has undoubtedly placed, in several respects, in a clearer light than existed before; and what, it might be thought, was more natural than that this antagonism, the conciliation of which led to the rise of the ancient Catholic Church, should have called forth a series of doctrinal changes and attempts at reconciliation, and that these again should have given birth to most of the existing written monuments, which serve, indeed, as so many memorial pillars or milestones to mark the gradual progress of thought in the exaltation of the ideal both of Christianity and of Christ? And does not this view of matters, it was urged, answer better than the common one to the expectation that in historical events there should be gradation and progress, and that the beginnings of things should not rise so high as their endings, in the history of the Church, any more than any other history?"

Such is Baur's theory. But, to say nothing of his Pantheistic views of God, which made all miracles appear to him an a priori impossibility, he proceeds unconsciously throughout upon an assumption which he leaves wholly without proof, and which admits of none upon his principles, but which, being in itself a true assumption, needs only to be followed out logically enough, in order always to lead back substantially to the view of primitive Christianity which is ordinarily taken by the Church.

Antagonisms like those which Baur supposes to have existed between the Petrine and the Pauline parties of the early Church can lead on to efforts and strivings after a reconciliation, only when there lies at the bottom of them a uniting power which links them so inseparably to each other that they cannot part company, but are always impelled to labour after a reconciliation, when once both have become assured that it will never be possible for either of them to overmaster the other. What now was this common element which held together the two parties in question, and in spite of their antagonism, still separated them further from the Jews and heathen around them than they were separated from one another? Or, to put the same question in another form, what was that something new which formed their bond of union? Could it be merely a new common name, Jesus, Messiah, or the like, without any new reality? It is to be regretted that Baur never properly takes up this question, but, in fact, avoids it; a question, however, which carries us back to the antecedent question of the character of Jesus and His work, what was His nature and His self-consciousness, and also to the question whether, without a real resurrection of Christ, the rise of a Christian Church would admit of being historically accounted for. Here again, no doubt, the reverential feeling is to be respected which may have held him back from the danger of coming into direct conflict with those self-utterances of Jesus, without taking which into account, in their operative causality, it is impossible to give any historical solution of the rise of the Apostolic Church. Still the blank is not less sensibly felt on that account; and in leaving his historical investigations intentionally incomplete upon this point, he has been compelled to leave unassailed and unmoved the proper centre of the Church's position. For even if we should grant that all the New Testament books had the later date which Baur assigns to them, Christendom would not allow itself to be robbed of its faith in Christianity by the argument that that faith had no historically-attested written documents to rest upon. It would only transfer its faith from the ground of written documents to the ground of unwritten historical tradition; or it would stay its faith upon the single testimony of Paul, who, as even Baur's own school have been compelled to admit, sets forth a much more complete image of Christ, and one much more closely allied to that exhibited in the Gospels, than their master himself was disposed to admit. Besides, by his silence here, Baur has kept aloof from the very point at which alone the ability of his whole theory to stand the test is brought to the crisis of historical proof, by the results of which it must either stand or fall.

Thus the hypothesis that Christianity, such as it appears, e.g., in the Gospel of John, was the result of a process of reconciliation between Gentile and Jewish Christians, does itself pre-suppose some new possession which was common to both parties, and a real unity of faith; both of which facts do not come into view at all in the pages of Baur, but are rather conceived by him as the results of the reconciliation, than its preliminary conditions. But this difficulty is not the only one which is fatal to his hypothesis. The fact is that no such antagonisms existed in the early Church as are necessary to Baur's theory, and to such a conciliatory result as he contends for. According to him, the Ebionitic tendency was marked on the one hand by the narrow legal Jewish spirit, and on the other hand by a view of the person of Christ, which approached near to what in his judgment was historical truth. Paul, on the other hand, is an enemy of the law, and the champion of universalism. Now conciliation of opposites it might indeed be called, if the alleged Ebionitic original Church had on the one side allowed itself to be brought over by the Pauline party to the universalism of the Gospel; and if, on the other hand, the Pauline party had gone over to a high esteem of the Old Testament, and to an Ebionitic Christology; but in point of fact Paul had valued the Old Testament as highly as it could well be valued by any man—as the four Pauline Epistles acknowledged by Baur to be genuine show; so that on the Pauline side there was no room or occasion for concession on this point; nor is the Ebionitic Christology to be found prevailing in the Gospel of John, or in any of the other New Testament books which are alleged to have sprung out of the reconciliation of parties. It remains, then, for Baur to show what part of Ebionitism attained to general recognition as the result of this alleged reconciliation. If, as he maintains, Paul had connected the work of redemption, not with the historical Jesus of Nazareth, but only with a spirit-Christ, then, perhaps, something might be said in the way of suggesting whether, for the sake of bringing over their opponents to Universalism and to the doctrine of Christian liberty, the Pauline party might not gradually have adopted the Ebionitic view of Christ's person; while the Ebionitists, on their side, in consideration of this concession, allowed themselves to go over to Universalistic views. But, in truth, Paul never represents the Redeemer as a mere ideal, spirit-Christ. It is precisely he, the champion of Universalism, who directs us in the strongest manner to the sources of salvation in Jesus—the Jesus of history, the Crucified One, the Risen One. The Redeemer of Paul's Epistles is as truly historical as the Redeemer of the Ebionitic party. Thus there was no dogmatic antagonism between the Petrine and Pauline parties of the primitive Church; and no room, therefore, for such reconciliation of views as Baur alleges to have taken place between them. That the two parties were long estranged from each other, on some practical points, and were finally merged in a united Catholic Church, is not denied; but neither their original differences, nor their subsequent reconciliation, were of such doctrinal magnitude and importance as he alleges. They would never have united if they had not been fundamentally one; and they could not have been fundamentally one in Christ, if Christ had not always been substantially one and the same to both in His person and in His work.

There is more, very much more able criticism in the article from which we quote, but which cannot be advantageously presented to English readers. Enough has been presented to show to what a fiery ordeal of historical scrutiny the earliest Christian history and documents have been subjected, in the hands of a man to whose profound erudition and severely scientific spirit all classes of his learned countrymen are ready to do homage; and to show, at the same time, that the citadel of Gospel truth still remains unshaken by all his assaults—a fortress resting securely upon the Eternal Rock. "No one," says the editor of the Kirchenzeitung, "will lament with us more than the author of this article, that a man of such eminent intellectual gifts, along with so much that he had learned, had not also learned the one thing needful—to lay down with humility all his learning at the feet of the crucified Son of God; nor less, that by his destructive criticism he has sought to inflict such deep wounds upon the documents of the Christian faith, and led so many souls out of the way of truth into the paths of falsehood and error."

THE MESSIANIC PROPHECIES AND THE OXFORD ESSAYISTS.*

IN an examination of a work bearing on the interpretation or criticism of any portions of Holy Scripture, it is of the utmost importance to know at the outset on what principle it proceeds. We may peruse a book, be charmed with the beauty of its style, the boldness of its conclusions, and the apparent strength of its logic, and yet feel that after all there is a want somewhere which it may be hard to discover. A fallacy, remarks Archbishop Whately, which, when expressed in a few words, would deceive nobody, will deceive half the world, if dilated through a quarto volume. The men who profess to be guided by the star of reason alone may be all the while deceived by the fitful glare of some will-o'-the-wisp, which may lead them to despise the ascent of a Hill Difficulty, and rather to pursue some pleasant and inviting path which may seem to wind around its base until too late they are led into the dark and dismal wilderness where their feet stumble, or they fall a prey to the beasts that there abound.

Many a student is led astray by neglecting to inquire the principles with which many great critics set out. The name of a great man often recommends and secures the adoption of his errors. Just as children are the most prone to copy the eccentricities of their seniors, so young scholars are the most liable to embrace the mistakes of men eminent in their department of study. The conclusions are clear and convincing, and the premises are not sufficiently examined. Such an interpretation is that adopted by the most able critics; therefore it must needs be considered as right, without an inquiry whether the creed of those that maintain the opinion is not such as to necessitate the exegesis. For instance, a critic starts with the full persuasion that the Gospels are historical and contain true facts, but with the idea at the same time that God never makes use of the miraculous. On these principles he must needs explain away a narrative that, to ordinary readers, speaks of the marvellous, or assert that such a narrative is a myth, inserted at a later period into the books in question. Such a one cannot be called an impartial critic. It may sound very well to assert that we are determined to apply the same principles of criticism to the Scriptures and to Homer; but by this very determination we resolve beforehand that the Scriptures are as Homer—i.e., uninspired; and, as we reject the marvellous in the one as not historically or literally true, so we reject it in the other. To proceed on such a plan is to conclude without examination that the Scriptures are "uninspired," in the ordinary theological sense of that term, and so to prejudge the whole matter. Surely this cannot be called an impartial mode of proceeding.

Underlying Dr. R. Williams' essay there is this disbelief in everything miraculous. The miraculous accounts of the Scriptures may have, and generally have, some historical basis, but are in no case literally true. Reduced to the level of ordinary facts, such as we see around us, they may have been true, but in his opinion they are not true as recorded. Thus, alluding to Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac, he seems to approve of the idea that what was true in the narrative was, that "when the fierce ritual of Syria, with the awe of a Divine voice, bade Abraham slay his son, he did not reflect that he had no perfect theory of the absolute to justify him in departing from traditional revelation, but trusted that the FATHER, whose voice from heaven he heard at heart, was better pleased with mercy than with sacrifice; and his trust was his righteousness."

We do not mean at present to review his essay in detail; for our purpose it suffices thus to exhibit what we consider to be his fundamental principle throughout. We rather propose, in the present article, to give what may serve as a clue for the understanding of the Messianic portions of the prophets, and indirectly as an antidote to some of the opinions put forth in this one of the Oxford essays.

The question is asked—How can we defend the constant appropriation to Christ in the New Testament of passages in the Psalms and elsewhere—passages which do not, when taken in connexion with the context, seem to bear such an exposition?

In order to answer this query, we must refer to a chain of Messianic prophecies, some of which are alluded to as such in the New Testament.

The prophecy of the seed of the woman may serve to give us an insight into the entire matter, as containing in a general way what we shall find carried out in a particular. That promise and prophecy, given to our fallen parents ere they were driven from the garden of delights where they had been first located, had a world-wide significance. It was given emphatically to the whole race of mankind. The evil one, masked under the form of a serpent, had deceived and ruined our first parents; the promise was intended to warn and to cheer, the prophecy to comfort with the hope of a final victory over the great enemy. It speaks then of the continual struggle to be carried on between light and darkness; "the seed of the woman" is pre-eminently Christ, for the prophecy attains its highest fulfilment in Him; but it has likewise another meaning, as contrasted with "the seed of the serpent," to denote the continual opposition between the children of God, born not of the flesh, but of the Spirit, and the children of Satan, and contains an encouragement that they should not at any time let their feeble hands hang down, or discontinue the warfare, because that victory through an imparted strength would be given them at the last; their bodies might be injured, but in all times Christ's people, whether before or after the Incarnation, would be preserved from "falling away finally," while a final destruction from the presence of the Lord would be the lot of all the enemies of His Christ and His people. "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly."

In the full Messianic sense the promise, so well designated as the "proto-evangelion," tells of the great Deliverer, born not after the ordinary mode of the flesh, but peculiarly "the seed of the woman," who should carry on for His people the warfare, and though wounded in His lower or human nature, should, "through death, destroy him that had the power of death—that is, the devil—and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

Thus we have in this first prophecy primarily Christ, and secondarily man, spoken of—the conflict of the one and the victory of the other. In pursuance of the same idea, we will take Psalm viii., where we have the reverse given us—primarily a description of the glorious position of man among the creation; secondarily, a prediction of the perfect man, the man Christ Jesus, as "the beginning of the creation of God."

The psalm in question was composed by the Sweet Singer of Israel, as he tended his flocks by night, and looked into the boundless expanse of the heavens above him, while his sheep lay calmly sleeping at his feet. The glory of the Creator overcame him, and he tuned his harp and sung—moved by the Spirit within him—"O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth! who hast set Thy glory above the heavens." He recognises, then, his own insignificance; yet how, by it, God could "perfect praise." Though man was so low and so unworthy, he had been appointed, by the great Creator, the beginning of His creation. Yet, beneath all this reference to man there lay a deeper meaning. Babies and infants might, by their prattle, glorify their Creator; by their songs of Hosanna they should yet herald their Redeemer. The second Person of the ever-blessed Trinity might have visited man in Eden, and there, while untainted with sin, have set him above the rest of the creation. But, by a greater condescension, He would visit sinful man when expelled from that garden, and elevate him from "lowest depths of woe" to everlasting happiness. Man was elevated in being raised above other created things, and made only "lower than the angels." The Christ of God was made low when "He took upon himself the nature of the seed of Abraham." Man might rule over the brute creation: Christ, the perfect man, "must reign until He hath put all enemies under His feet," although "now we see not yet all things put under Him."

These examples will serve to illustrate our idea of the double reference of prophecy, at one time speaking of man through Christ, at another speaking of Christ through man. We have the same idea exemplified in the position of Israel being spoken of secondarily in a Messianic prophecy, and in Christ being secondarily spoken of in a prophecy respecting Israel.

The earliest prophecy respecting Israel as a people is contained in the promise given to Abraham in Gen. xii. 2, 3, that his seed should be multiplied, and "in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed;" afterwards amplified into "in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," and explained by Paul as referring only to the branch of Isaac, "of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came," and mainly and primarily to Christ alone, who, by the "offering of Himself once made," should make "a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world;" and by whom "repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem."

Such is the Messianic aspect of the passage in question; but has it not a more general one? We think so. Israel, as a people, have in deed and in truth been a blessing in many ways to all the Gentile nations. When the rest of the earth was enveloped in the gloom of ignorance, the candle of the Lord was kept lighted in Judea; the books of the Lord were preserved there; the history of the Church in all ages was there exhibited in miniature, set forth for the instruction of those upon whom the ends of the world should come. The hymns of the Israelitish Church have been preserved to us, songs of the night and songs of the day, written at one time in the darkness of affliction, at another time in the daylight of glory—psalms that express the agony of a troubled soul forsaken by God, and the peace of a trusting soul resting beneath the shadow of the Almighty's wings, applicable in their highest reference only to the suffering and glorified Holy One of Israel, and bearing on their front the truth so solacing to the mourner of earth, and thus expressed by a great Puritan in rhyme:—

Christ brings me through no darker rooms
Than He went through before.
He that into God's kingdom comes,
Must enter by the door.

As a counterpart we take the passage in Hosea xi. 1—"When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called My son out of Egypt." There can be no question but that this is referable, in its strict and proper sense, to the people of Israel themselves, the drift of the entire portion being to narrate the love of God and the ungratefulness of Israel. When that nation was young and feeble and in oppression, it was delivered from the tyranny it groaned under, "called out of Egypt," and carried in His bosom, "as a nursing father beareth the sucking child, unto the land flowing with milk and honey."

Still this passage has a secondary and Messianic sense, in which the childhood of the Lord Jesus is referred to, and the flight into Egypt and the coming out thence of the "Beloved Son," in whom God expressed Himself "well pleased."

The key to such passages as these, which form by far the greater part of what are called Messianic in the Old Testament, is a knowledge of the close union between Christ and His people. United together in one as the Bridegroom and the Bride, what appertains to the one belongs in some measure, also, to the other. The Church of Israel typifies the Church of Christ redeemed out of every nation and people and kindred. It is the new Jerusalem, a city not built with hands; it is "the Bride, the Lamb's wife," having the glory of God with its great Head, the Son of God, the God-man, the Man Christ Jesus. Its final dwelling-place is spiritually represented as the paradise, the cradle of humanity, "lost" by sin, "regained" by righteousness; for our Saviour is also "THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS."

This professes to be "Tract No. 1" of a "New Reformation Society," whose head-quarters are at 25, Conduit-street, London, W., and whose secretary is Mr. M. W. Miles. No other information is vouchsafed respecting this mysterious fraternity, except that its revenue will be derived from the sale of the books and tracts which it proposes to publish, and from voluntary subscriptions, which already amount to a sum sufficient to meet preliminary expenses. We are not told who are the committee, bankers, treasurer, contributors, and the name of Mr. Miles, in Tract No. 1, is supposed to be all the generous public will require to elicit their donations. So far as evidence is concerned, Messrs. M. W. Miles and Co. may be that distinguished gentleman by himself. And yet, it is not likely he wrote this tract, which we should from internal evidence, ascribe to another whose name figures in its pages, and in t announcement of a "Work on the New Reformation," set forth at the end. The work thus alluded to is by A. Alison, Esq., on the "Philosophy and History of Civilisation." If Mr. Alison wrote this tract, we can only say he promises to be no new Luther, and we think our readers will soon agree with us.

He tells us that "this great movement" to promote "a general reformation throughout the United Kingdom and the Colonies," "may be said to have arisen from three distinct causes, all of which have come from the prolonged absence of reform of the Articles of Religion. The first cause is the rapid progress of Supernaturalism and Puritanism among the middle and industrial classes, of which the Revival movement, as it is called, is the evidence." So it seems that to reform the articles of religion will be to annihilate Supernaturalism and Puritanism and the Revival movement! By this we understand that, in the opinion of our infatuated author, the public are so docile that, if we give them thirty-nine new articles, they will repudiate their faith in the work of the Spirit, their adhesion to the doctrines of grace, and their promotion of religious revivals. We will not stop to characterise those who can believe this. His second cause is Necessitarianism and Rationalism among the upper classes. What he means by this he probably does not himself know; but assuredly it reads more like satire than seriousness, when taken in connexion with some things in the sequel. His third cause is the unsatisfactory state of our ecclesiastical and educational establishments, which, he says, cannot be improved until a general reformation is produced in the public mind, in the direction of unity and concord. We have no explanation of this unsatisfactory state, nor of this unity and concord; but, with regard to the latter, we get a ray of light at page 5. There we have a Church reform bill in three clauses, of which the first abolishes the Thirty-nine Articles, and appoints thirty-nine new ones, which "shall henceforth constitute the creed of the Church." We are not told how the Church is to be compelled to receive and believe them. The second clause of the act is that, after its passing and ratification, no clergyman shall be admitted to orders till he has subscribed the new articles.

And now for the unity and concord: Clause three ordains that notwithstanding the subscriptions to the articles, the clergy shall be entitled to hold their own private opinions (the right of private judgment), so that those private opinions do not amount to a practical nullification of the articles as a whole. Surely some quiet retreat, in which similar hallucinations are innocently indulged, is the most fitting residence for an author who tells us that his articles are to be the creed of the Church; then, that all new candidates for orders shall subscribe them; and then that the new candidates shall be at liberty to believe what they like! Even this is not all; there is a fourth clause, which provides that the clergy now in orders may subscribe the new articles, and thereby free themselves from the obligations of their present subscriptions. Competent to them to subscribe and thereby free themselves from present obligations! Why surely the annulling of the old relieves them from obligation, and the enacting of the new renders their subscription to them, not a matter of choice, but of necessity! No such thing; he gravely goes on to say that "those clergymen who prefer to hold the old articles shall be entitled to do so," after they have been abrogated; and "such clergymen shall not be bound by the new articles, but remain bound by the old articles." We hope this is sufficient to vindicate for the author a place in the next edition of the literature des fous; and with this remark we should throw aside this most absurd pamphlet, which, if a hoax, is a despicable one; but there has been some importance attached to it, and we therefore will compel the writer still more completely to judge himself out of his own mouth.

The New Reformation Society proposes to deal first with the Thirty-nine Articles by means of the act referred to, and then to go on to the Prayer-book, services, and canons. How the author distinguishes between the services and the Prayer-book, he does not tell us. He then intimates that of the millions we annually spend on the poor, on law-courts, reformatories, drink, hospitals, &c., one-half will be saved—"a moiety of these sums will certainly be saved when our moral and religious creeds are placed on the basis of liberty and truth." He believes that "in now asking the public to place faith in truth and justice, and in the bountiful provisions of Providence," the result will be great and glorious. So far as we are concerned, the result is a conviction that the New Reformation Society is all it ever will be, and that its "first meeting," to elect office-bearers, and to appoint a committee to draw up the revised articles, will either never be held, or be its last. The labouring mountain has already produced its mouse, and nothing yet to come from it will "be recognised by succeeding generations as the Magna Charta of England's Religious Liberty." After the preface and the Church Reform Bill, we have a form of petition to Parliament, as absurd as the act of which we have given specimens. There is one other point in the address to the public which we must not omit. "The principles of the society are, the recognition of the authority and inspiration of Scripture, and of the divinity of Christ." We should have been better satisfied if we had been told what kind of inspiration, authority, and divinity are intended; and we should like to know what society could stand on a basis so meagre and indefinite?

The second chapter, on the Protestant Churches, is equally full of absurd, contradictory, and unreasonable matter. It tells us that the Church is the only unreformed portion of the State; that Church reform must begin with the laity; that religion has hitherto taught men rather to dislike one another; that Scripture is an inspiration of God; that religion is not perfect; and yet that to keep our Bible and conform our religious belief to it, is the only course consistent with true religion.

The author breaks a lance with Mr. Baden Powell, who "says that no man can prove a miracle of the Bible; but as he might as truly say that no man can disprove a miracle, the statement goes for nothing." He adds that historical questions such as these cannot possibly be settled one way or the other. He thinks, too, that to discuss the question, whether the Bible be a revelation from God, has had the effect of keeping the world in the dark as to its true interests, whereas the question of doctrine is all-important. Original evil is want, the narrative of the fall is an allegory, the Revival movement is a malady, and the mind of the people is being broken down and demoralised by the follies of Supernaturalism.

In the third chapter, on the Catholic Churches, we have a continuation of the same kind of thing, and in the fourth, on Scripture interpreted, we have the thirty-nine new articles, which are so empty and vague, that most of them are more or less ridiculous. Thus conversion is gradual, and produced by the natural operation of the Gospel, Methodism and Revivalism desolate the world, future punishments will not be nearly so severe as we are accustomed to think, evil passions are personified under the figure of Satan in the New Testament, &c.

It is evident that the New Reformation has no connexion with the seven essays, and that the so-called society is either nothing, or the offspring of certain heretics, who understand not what they say. Our readers need feel no anxiety on the subject—all such futile schemes must at once collapse, and leave the good old Gospel on its eternal foundations.

THRUPP ON THE PSALMS.*

A THOROUGHLY good commentary on the Book of Psalms is still a desideratum in the English language. The qualifications requisite for such a work are high, and their combination in one individual exceedingly rare. Profound scholarship in the Hebrew and Arabic languages, sound theological views, spiritual enlightenment, poetical genius, cultivated taste, an accurate critical judgment, and a popular style of writing, must exist in combination, or be supplied by the combined labours of different individuals, working to one end, before we can expect to see the production of such a commentary as is demanded. For popular use, nothing that we know has yet superseded the work of Bishop Horne; but with all its piety and sweetness, its critical value is small. The German work of Hengstenberg is, in our judgment, perhaps the most defective of his writings, poor in spirit, theologically unsound, and critically not very valuable. The work of Delitzsch has not yet been translated into English, and will probably be found objectionable in some particulars; though it seems to be a great advance upon anything of the kind yet issued by those reactionary German divines who are returning to the faith. The last-named work may perhaps afford a foundation for new efforts here in this direction; and at any rate, we are always favourable to any endeavour to supply the deficiency.

* An Introduction to the Study and Use of the Psalms. By JOSEPH FRANCIS THRUPP, M.A., Vicar of Barrington, and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Macmillan and Co., Cambridge, and 28, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London.

In this spirit, we took up with pleasure the work of Mr. Thrupp, as a contribution to the cause. The modesty of its title, and the equal modesty of its preface, are calculated to disarm criticism; and we should be glad if we were able sincerely to praise the work before us as a whole, on account of the gentle spirit which it breathes, and the sound tendency of some of Mr. Thrupp's views, especially in respect to the finding of CHRIST in the inspired songs of the Psalmist. He himself, in his preface, seems to anticipate that perhaps "many faults, and possibly occasional inconsistencies, will be detected" in the work. We do not wish to enter into any minute examination of the author's systematic views, in order to find fault. We can follow him in a great deal of what he says. But when he ventures upon new translations, we think his failure is generally most signal. Poor, flat, and unpoetical, are his attempts to substitute something new for the noble rhythm of our authorised version. And, poor as they seem to us poetically, they are also critically indefensible, as we shall presently prove, in some particulars. There are also some opinions occasionally hazarded with which we cannot at all agree. For instance, he admits or asserts that "David had certainly no knowledge of a future state." On this theory he bases a good deal of lucubration which we think very far from the purpose. In our judgment, it is erroneous to say that believers under the Old Testament were "ignorant of the rewards and punishments of another world." Doubtless their views were obscure, compared with ours. But to limit the notion of the faith of Abraham and of David to a future of reward and punishment for their posterity in this world only, is, we think, eminently unscriptural. Surely "the city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God," for which Abraham looked, by faith, meant much more than any temporal inheritance, to however an extensive or continuous posterity? Surely our Lord's own argument against the Sadducees, convicting them that they ought to have known of the resurrection from the dead, even in that passage of the law of Moses, where the glorious appearance in the bush proclaimed God to be, not the God of the dead, but of "the living Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," is a palpable refutation of this notion? Surely, when Peter says of the Spirit of Christ in the prophets, that it led them to search what or what manner of time it did signify, when it "testified beforehand of the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow," he meant something more than that the Spirit of Inspiration revealed only a temporal state of blessedness and glory to follow on the Redeemer's advent?

While Mr. Thrupp so well maintains that David was not merely a type of the Lord Jesus Christ, but also a sort of embodiment of the experience of Messiah and His people, when he wrote his inspired songs, we must regard it as one of the "inconsistencies" he deprecatingly anticipates, that he has adopted what we had believed to be an old and long ago exploded hypothesis. We cannot consider that when the apostle said, "Jesus Christ brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel," he at all meant to declare that life and immortality were things previously unknown altogether. A new and glorious blaze of light was indeed thrown on these old truths by the resurrection of Jesus and by the gift of Pentecost. But the seventh article of the Church of England emphatically says: "They are not to be heard which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises." And Bishop Burnet, in that article, argues, unanswerably we think, from Ps. xvi., xvii., and xlix.: "This does very clearly set forth David's belief both of future happiness and of the resurrection of his body." Bishop Beveridge, also, in his comment on the same article, quotes Augustine, and says: "So that it was this renowned father's opinion that, though there were many temporal promises made in the Old Testament, yet even under them spiritual blessings were promised, which they that understood the Scriptures aright were thoroughly acquainted with, and therefore looked, not for transitory promises only, but also spiritual, yea, for eternal salvation in Christ, promised in the Old, though revealed only in the New Testament."

It is, we believe, an opinion held by some Sacramentalist religionists, that only the sacraments of the New Testament give life. What becomes of the patriarchs and prophets of old these persons do not plainly pronounce, while they intimate that some higher eternal life is given to the Christian believer now owing to the sacraments. This is the theory run to seed, no doubt. But to admit or assert that the ancients had no faith or knowledge as to the resurrection to immortality is a fatal error, and lays the groundwork of much evil. We kindly commend this point to the attention of Mr. Thrupp, while we warn our readers of its erroneous character. It is a blemish in his book, and we do not think we are at all mistaken or have at all misrepresented his views.

We now pass to a matter comparatively less important, but sufficiently important still to merit notice; we mean the very defective character of Mr. Thrupp's work whenever points of Hebrew criticism are involved. We shall refer to the new translation he gives of Ps. xlv. and lxviii. No psalms presenting greater difficulties could have been selected; and though Mr. Thrupp considers that he has given of the first-named "an accurate rendering," and of the second "a more correct rendering than that presented in our authorised version," we should be sorry to make an exchange even if we regarded critical accuracy alone, and were unmindful of the subordinate consideration of the neatness and beauty of expression so characteristic of our English version.

In proof of our statements we proceed to give a few examples. Ps. xlv. 4 is thus rendered: "And in thy majesty ride prosperously on in the cause of truth and with the battle-cry 'Righteousness,'" the latter clause being substituted for the English rendering "meekness and righteousness." This is certainly an unique rendering. In support of it Mr. Thrupp maintains that לַחֲדָו (the root of the word translated in our authorised version meekness, and by him battle-cry), means "to answer, or rather, perhaps, to shout in answer," and on this latter possibility, which is by no means a probability, he supposes that the noun derived therefrom means "a battle-cry." But it ought to be noted that nowhere is there any derivative from the verb used in any similar sense, but that there is another לַחֲדָו from whence the significations of affliction and gentleness are deduced, both of which senses occur in a number of words with which the word in the passage must be connected, and the very meaning assigned by our authorised version is, that of the ancient versions, the LXX. and the Vulgate. In fact, the rendering "battle-cry" is a mere fancy of our author.

His translation of the first verse, "To speak is mine—my exploits are the king's," is a very faulty translation. The only possible renderings are either, "I narrate my works [rather though plural 'my work,' scil. my poem] to a king," or "concerning a king"—i.e., my poem celebrates a king, which latter rendering is that adopted, though in different words, by our authorised version.

The eighth verse Mr. Thrupp renders:—

All thy coverlets are myrrh, aloes, and cassias;
From the ivory palaces of Minea, Kings' daughters have made thee gay,
Most precious of all is stationed the consort, at thy right hand, in gold of Ophir.

We will not discuss the critical propriety of Mr. Thrupp's discarding in this passage the Jewish verse division, though we consider the sense is much weakened by his doing so. In his translation of the second line Mr. Thrupp follows an interpretation justly referred to by Gesenius, in his Thesaurus, p. 799, as "vix memoratu digna;" and even adopting his views with respect to the verse-division, there is no superlative implied in the Hebrew, which, however, he has rendered "most precious of all," as it is simply "among the precious ones." Lastly, we would ask, does not the translation, "all thy garments," adopted in our Bible, convey the meaning of the original better than that of Mr. Thrupp's, "all thy coverlets," which rather conveys a false impression? The following translation will convey our meaning of the passage:—

All thy garments smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia;
From the palaces of ivory, musical instruments delight thee.
Kings' daughters are among thy loved damsels,

We must, however, pass on to consider Mr. Thrupp's translation of Ps. lxxviii., remarking in limine that it is, on the whole, inferior in critical accuracy to that of our authorised version; while, at the same time, it lacks all the poetry of that version. Thus his translation of the passage in the 4th verse, "a rain of free gifts wilt thou shower forth, O God," and of that in the 11th, "great shall be the company of the women, the messengers of victory," evince a want of acquaintance with the force of Hebrew construction, and are instances where an exegesis correct in the main has caused a warp to be given to a translation.

But one naturally turns to the 13th verse, to see what light Mr. Thrupp has thrown upon that "crux commentatorum." He renders it:—

What though ye rest at your ease, the wings of a dove,
Who herself is but decked with silver, while her wing-feathers are decked with yellow gold.

It is well that his translation is accompanied by an explanation, otherwise, we confess, no ingenuity of ours could have discovered its meaning. We regret we cannot give it in full, but the following extract will "indicate," as the Germans say, the view adopted:—

It is by no means unlikely that the comparative prosperity which the eastern tribes had enjoyed would lead them to put forth untenable claims to superiority over the rest of the Israelites. Independently of this they seem to have prided themselves on the greater beauty of the districts they inhabited; extending from the lofty peaks of Hermon on the north, through the rich woods and pastures of Bashan and Gilead to the mountains of Moab and the hills of the desert on the south. If the land of Israel were compared to a dove, Hermon and Moab might be regarded as the respective ends of the dove's pinions; and while, in consequence of the comparative tameness of the country on the west of the Jordan, the body of the dove might be said to be but of silver, her wing-feathers might be described as covered with yellow gold.

Mr. Thrupp supposes that one of the "untenable claims" put forth by Israel in contradistinction to Judah was, that, the temple should be erected in their part of the land, and goes on to say: "David, therefore, reminds them that when God had broken the power of the Canaanitish kings, the former possessors of the land, it was on one of the hills in the centre of the land to the west of Jordan that, by Moses' express direction, the first altar was built, the first copy of the law made, and the blessings and curses of the law upon obedience and disobedience first solemnly read; it was on Mount Ebal, otherwise known as Mount Zalmon, that the full Divine beauty of the Dove of Israel had been manifested, and her silvery hue brightened into snow-white brightness—a brightness even yet more beautiful than that of the yellow gold of her wings."

We stand mute with amazement at such an interpretation, which requires in the first case the words of the text to be tortured in order to supply the necessary rendering, which has again to be stretched on a Procrustean bed to bring out such a meaning. We will not at present enter into an examination of the passage; but one thing we are well assured of, that whatever be the correct interpretation, Mr. Thrupp has not given it.

We will content ourselves with giving one other specimen of Mr. Thrupp's version of the 68th Psalm; it is that of the 30th verse:—

Rebuke thou the assembly of the reed,
The herd of mighty bulls among the calves of the heathen,
Where the votaries, exciting each other to the dance with fragments of silver, Rattle into frenzy the heathen that take pleasure in frays.

Instead of "the assembly of the reed," which does not afford a good sense, though an admissible translation, the correct rendering is "the beast of the reed"—i.e., the crocodile, a poetical designation of the Egyptians. Mr. Thrupp translates the single word כְּרִיפָה by the sentence "where the votaries exciting each other to the dance." The word might, indeed, be translated "votary," in the signification of "worshipper," but how can the remainder of the sentence be extracted from the same word? It is true that the idea of treading is to be found in the root, but never with reference to dancing, and most certainly the word cannot bear Mr. Thrupp's rendering. Much better is that of our authorised version, "till every one submit himself with pieces of silver," or rather that of the Prayer-book version, "so that they humbly bring pieces of silver." There is no allusion to the Egyptian sistrum or rattle, as Mr. T. supposes; "the pieces of silver" simply mean money; the Hebrew verb כִּיר, only used in this place, does not mean "to rattle," but "to scatter," or "disperse," as proved by the cognate languages; nor is there any idea of "frenzy" conveyed in the word; and we cannot but think the words "take pleasure in frays" an unpoetical exchange for "that delight in war," as our authorised version has it.

Our space will allow us no further examination of Mr. Thrupp's volumes, of which we should have preferred to have been able to speak more favourably. There is indeed much in them to disarm unkindly criticism, and there is a good deal of what is valuable to the student of the Psalms who is qualified to take the author's views and assertions cum grano salis. But in the interests of truth, and of good taste, and just criticism, we have felt compelled to notice some of the author's defects. And we still have to wait for the desiderated commentary on the sweet Psalmist of Israel.

Foreign Intelligence.

Our French letter is more than usually excellent this month. The first part of it throws new light on the relations between the Emperor and the Pope; and while it places the latter, with the cardinals, in an odious point of view, it lays abundant ground to justify the next step of the former—the abandonment of Rome to its inevitable and richly-deserved fate.

Protestant truth makes progress in Belgium, and has been much blessed of God among the labourers in the coal mines. An old and valued correspondent describes a striking funeral solemnity of which he took advantage, as is often done by Protestant ministers in Roman Catholic countries, to preach the Gospel to a large concourse of people.

The intelligence this month from Italy is calculated to stir us up to augmented effort for the evangelization of its millions now waiting for the Gospel. Religious liberty is practically making great strides, so that from the Alps to the Straits of Messina the Bible circulates, and the Gospel may be preached. Labourers, not foreigners, but native labourers, are wanted; schools are wanted; Christian literature, original and translated, is wanted; and much beside. Will it not be given in answer to prayer? Who can doubt it? The letters we publish from several correspondents will, we trust, awaken a new and extended interest in the spiritual welfare of the Italians. Friends desirous of helping forward the work will be glad to know that a committee is formed in London, which will thankfully take charge of their contributions, and apply them judiciously.*

We give a good deal of missionary information from many fields of labour, all of which may be read with interest. We may particularly mention the letter from Birmah; and a paper on the Mohammedan Doctrine of the End of the World. Islamism has its future millenium, and it is curious to read the wild speculations of its writers on the subject. Newfoundland and New Zealand send us tidings which we welcome and accept as the first-fruits of more to come.

* We shall be happy to serve as a medium of communication, should any of our readers wish to make use of us in that way. In that case, contributions may be transmitted to Rev. Edward Steane, A. C. Camberwell, Surrey, S.

FRANCE.

France, February, 1861.

NEWLY-PUBLISHED DOCUMENTS ON THE RELATIONS OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT WITH THE COURT OF ROME.

Since the opening of the Legislative Session, numerous diplomatic despatches have been communicated to the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. The perusal of these official pieces has made the public better acquainted with the relations of our Government towards the Pontifical See, and the effect of this recent information, as far as Pius IX. and his councillors are concerned, is far from favourable.

It is proved by these documents that Louis Napoleon has not failed, during the last few years, to propose to the Roman Court most suitable arrangements. He begged and prayed the Pope and the cardinals again and again to grant such reforms as should redress the real grievances of the people in the States of the Church; and in consideration of these changes (which were quite compatible with the preservation of the temporal power of Pius IX.) the French Emperor promised to guarantee the integrity of the territorial possessions of the Papacy. But the Vatican obstinately rejected all these proposals. No new laws—no reforms—the maintenance of the old order of things—just a vague prospect of insignificant concessions when the Romagna should be again brought beneath the rule of the Supreme Pontiff! Nothing more.

The cardinals, moreover, requested the employment of physical force. They themselves purchased artillery and powder, raised regiments of volunteers, and prepared all the elements of civil war. Above all, the submission of the rebels! Though human blood should flow in torrents, as in the unfortunate city of Perugia, let no compromise be made with the insurgents! War, torture, the reign of terror, with the aid of the French, the Austrians, the Spaniards, the Portuguese, the Bavarians, &c.—such was the last word of the Pontifical Government, in reply to the propositions of Napoleon III.

This is a sad spectacle. What! priests; men who proclaim themselves the successors and the ministers of the Prince of Peace, knowing no other means of arbitration than the sword! They importunately ask that carnal weapons may be employed to re-establish their absolute authority; and it is a lay prince who endeavours to put an end to these sanguinary conflicts, and to enter upon a path of equitable pacification! Each party was evidently doing the work that belonged to the other. The Pope, led astray by bad advice, spoke and acted like a soldier; and the soldier replied by expressing sentiments which ought to animate a priest. Is not this a striking proof that the sacerdotal body among the Papists is far below the ideas and wants of the age?

Another very characteristic fact must be mentioned. While the French garrison at Rome secured the personal safety of Pius IX., and was the sole obstacle to the expulsion of the Pontiff and his ministers, what was taking place within the walls of the Vatican? A despatch from the Duke de Gramont, the French Ambassador, informs us that the most decided dynastic opposition was openly encouraged by the most influential of the Pope's courtiers. "The Holy Father," says the Ambassador, "received the homage of the province of Brittany, which had come, by deputation, to protest against the Emperor. . . . A Frenchman, who, though he was a zealous [Roman] Catholic, did not conceive it to be his duty to repudiate those sentiments which were in harmony with his nationality, was warmly interrogated thus: 'Sir, a man is a subject of the Pope before he is the subject of his sovereign; if these are not your principles, we should like to know what you came here for?'"

This means that Pius IX. and the Court of Rome support the cause of the old Bourbons—the Stuarts of France! They aspire, do these audacious priests, to dethrone Napoleon III. They would overthrow his throne to-morrow, if they were able! The French volunteers who enlisted in the regiments of Pontifical Zouaves are Legitimists, Bourbonists, the enemies of the Emperor! The interests of religion are, with many of them, a secondary matter. What they chiefly seek, in bringing about a universal war, is the restoration of the old dynasty; the Papal question is simply a mask for their political passions!

These things have long been known to intelligent men. They have often declared that neither the Pope, the bishops, nor the Jesuits, ever contracted a sincere friendship with the Imperial Government. They discern beneath the protestations of attachment and devotedness of the clerical party an implacable hostility to the prince elected by universa suffrage. This feeling of hatred on the part of the priests has now obtained an official certitude. The Court of Rome has publicly encouraged the demonstrations of the Bourbonists. Louis Napoleon must see what is the best course he could adopt. His wisest plan would probably be, in pursuance of the principle of non-intervention, to recall the French troops by whom Rome is now garrisoned, and to leave the Pope to arrange his affairs directly with the Italians. But will the Emperor dare to adopt a policy so decided and free from ambiguity?

FATHER LACORDAIRE AND M. GUIZOT AT THE FRENCH ACADEMY.

Public attention in this country has been recently drawn to a great academical solemnity. If it had reference to literature only, I should not speak of it. But religion was mixed up with the festival, and the two orators uttered what has excited considerable surprise.

Father Lacordaire, who revived in France the order of the Dominicans, had been elected one of the forty members of the French Academy, in the room of the illustrious and lamented M. de Tocqueville. It devolved upon M. Guizot, as Director of the Academy, to reply to M. Lacordaire's speech. It was a rich scene: a Protestant and a Dominican monk face to face!

All the Paris notabilities, and even the Empress Eugénie, with the princes and princesses of the Imperial family, were present on the occasion. You are aware that Father Lacordaire is regarded as the most eloquent Romish preacher of the present age in France. In the pulpit he displays wonderful richness of imagination, sometimes remarkable powers of thought, and always a finished style of elocution. Everybody was curious, therefore, to hear him speak before an audience of another sort, as a member of our most eminent literary body. As a faithful narrator of the facts of the case, I must say that Father Lacordaire did not fully realise the public expectations. His speech appeared too long and diffuse, affected in sentiment and inflated in style. The speaker was not at his ease. He had been in the habit of delivering his sermons extempore, and now he had to read a written harangue. This is not at all the same thing.

But that is not the question that interests us. Father Lacordaire had, according to custom, to deliver a eulogy upon his predecessor, M. de Tocqueville, author of a book entitled, "Democracy in the United States." A singular thing! The Dominican extolled the virtues of the Americans in the highest terms. American democracy, according to M. Lacordaire's testimony, is characterised by respect for the law—by love of liberty and equality—by making civil rights the foundation of all political rights—and by its religious tone. With these attributes of American democracy, the orator contrasted the defects of European democracy, which sacrifices equality to liberty; violently tramples upon the law, and is devoid of piety. "While the American," said Father Lacordaire, "believes, in his soul, in the God by whom he has been made, in Jesus Christ by whom he has been redeemed, and in the Gospel as the volume by which the soul holds intercourse with God—European democracy, with a few noble exceptions, believes in nothing but humanity; and even that humanity is the fictitious creation of a dream—a dream which is at once its soul, its God, its Christ, its Gospel. . . . The American does not understand a man without religion in his heart, or a citizen without a religion publicly professed. European democracy, on the other hand, does not understand a man who prays secretly, and still less one who prays before other people."

I do not inquire whether all M. Lacordaire's assertions are just. His panegyric upon the Americans is perhaps exaggerated; and from a spirit of opposition to the political state of France, the European democrats are unduly depreciated. That which calls for remark is that the Dominican placed a Protestant very much above a Roman Catholic people. No more powerful reply has probably been made to those blind Ultramontanes who assert that Protestantism is the ruin of public and private religion. So the Jesuits were not a little dissatisfied with M. Lacordaire's speech. It was a knock-down blow for them. I presume that the celebrated Dominican has not been congratulated by the Pope for having sacrificed Romanism at the shrine of the Reformation.

M. Guizot replied to Father Lacordaire with an energy of thought and expression which produced a deep impression upon all who were present. This statesman, seventy-three or seventy-four years of age, seems to have preserved all the intellectual and oratorical powers which distinguished him in the prime of life. He began his speech by showing the progress made in ideas and manners during modern times. Some centuries ago the Dominicans used to burn heretics. If M. Guizot and Lacordaire had met during the middle ages—the monk would have pronounced sentence of death upon the opponent of the Papacy. Now they gave each other the right hand of fellowship upon the common platform of an academical assembly.

All this is true. M. Guizot, however, in his turn, displeased many of his friends by extolling the character of the Pope and condemning the Italian revolution. He spoke like a politician rather than a Protestant. M. Guizot has certainly religious convictions. He will never deny the belief of his fathers, who suffered for their faith after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. But he continues to be too much engrossed by worldly affairs, and he appears sometimes to subordinate religion to the interests of party, or to personal position. We regret this. M. Guizot would do honour to his old age were he to abandon his visions of politics; and were his piety more robust, he would attain a yet higher elevation of character.

QUARREL BETWEEN M. DE MONTALEMBERT AND M. VEUILLLOT.

A very instructive struggle has lately taken place between the two most ardent lay champions of the Romish cause in France, and the fact is the more noticeable as it presents so striking a contrast to the unity of which the Popish Church boasts so ostentatiously. In reality, that unity exists more in its forms of worship and discipline than in men's minds; and when the Roman Catholics have the courage openly to express their secret thoughts, they are as divided as the Protestants, and even more so.

I come to the dispute I have mentioned. Count de Montalembert has published a "History of the Monastic Orders of the West." It is a long apology for cloisters and their occupants. The author has created fantastic types of devotedness and abnegation; history, beneath his fearless pen, becomes a romance. At the commencement of his book he has placed an elaborate introduction, in which he reproaches M. Louis Veuillot and the former editors of the Univers with having played the part of sycophants towards the Imperial Government, after the coup d'état on the 2nd of December, 1851. If M. de Montalembert had taxed his own memory, he would have been reminded that he himself has not always been an adversary of Louis Napoleon. But since he has entered the ranks of the opposition, he has forgotten his former complaisance towards the Government of the Emperor, and he actually levels his shafts of ill-humour against his former friends.

M. Louis Veuillot has not displayed on his part a very patient temper. He is irascible, full of abuse, and always ready for a quarrel. His reply to the reproaches of Count de Montalembert was a vigorous one. "I have found nothing in my articles to erase, even when I was deceived," he says. This is not a very modest statement, and it would seem that Popery does not teach humility to its disciples. M. Veuillot then accuses M. de Montalembert of being fickle, puerile, superficial, unjust: there is a deluge of far from edifying epithets. This same Veuillot boldly declares himself a friend of liberty. "I have desired with all my heart," he writes, "and with all my heart I have sought liberty. It has been my aim under every system of rule. The interests of liberty are compatible with those of religion. . . . I am convinced that the true [Roman] Catholics are also the only true liberals."

Be it observed that M. Louis Veuillot publicly expressed his regret that the German princes did not burn Luther at the stake; he strongly approved of the conduct of the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, in imprisoning the Madiai; he applauded the abduction of the young Mortara; he extolled the Encyclical of Gregory XVI., which represented religious liberty and liberty of the press as monstrous abominations; he congratulated the Emperor of Austria upon having signed the Concordat, which subjects schools and journals to a clerical despotism; and M. Louis Veuillot affirms, after this, that the only true liberals are in the ranks of the Papacy!!! The pen falls from one's hand in recording such a tissue of misrepresentation, and one is ready to ask whether it is not a hallucination!

SENTENCE OF THE IMPERIAL COURT OF PARIS UPON A PRIEST.

I have more than once related the fraudulent means employed by the priests to obtain for their own profit the estates of opulent persons on their decease. A scandalous affair of this kind was the subject of a judicial investigation at the commencement of the present month, by the Imperial Court of Paris. Here is a summary of the legal proceedings:—

A lady named Verdelot, who was a widow, and without children, had a fortune of 250,000*f.*, or 12,000*f.* income. This rich prize tempted the cupidity of a certain Abbé Bernard, a curate in one of the Paris parishes. He had recourse to all sorts of intrigues to become Madame Verdelot's confessor, her spiritual director, her agent, her factotum. Despising the most ordinary regard for appearances, he even went so far as to take up his abode in her house; he ate at the same table; and all the poor widow's affairs came under his jurisdiction. These unworthy manoeuvres ended as the Abbé Bernard expected. Madame Verdelot died, having first made a will, in which she constituted the priest her sole heir.

Thus far matters went smoothly enough. But the relations of this lady, who were for the most part honest artisans, with large families, resolved—unlike many others, apprehensive of casting a slur upon the good name of a priest—not to submit to such spoliation. They denounced the Abbé Bernard to the judicial authorities. The ecclesiastic gained his cause before the Tribunal of First Instance; for the magistrates are, in general, too complaisant to the sacerdotal gown. But Madame Verdelot's relatives carried their appeal before the high Imperial Court; and there the judges, more independent than those from whom the appeal had been made, declared that the will was null and void. The judgment was well drawn. It pointed out that spiritual directors exercise a dominion, often irresistible, over their penitents; that the Abbé Bernard completely ruled the widow Verdelot; that he had acquired over her will and her actions, by means of confession, an all-powerful influence, and so forth.

In short, the 250,000*fr.* were returned to the legitimate heirs, and the Abbé Bernard lost the fruit of all his sinister scheming. Will the priests learn from this example to overcome their cupidity, and will they abandon these disgraceful modes of ensnaring the weak?—If so, well; but this is not very probable.

OPPOSITION TO RATIONALIST OPINIONS IN THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES OF FRANCE.

The new theology, as it is called, continues to excite a warm controversy among the French Protestants. It is not easy to explain what are the doctrinal and ecclesiastical principles of these innovators. They are better able to say what they deny than what they affirm. According to them, the Bible has ceased to be divinely inspired; it is no longer an authority in matters of faith; it is a collection of human books, which may contribute to the edification of the reader. Jesus Christ is no longer God manifest in the flesh; he is simply a man, very great, very holy, but not absolutely exempt from error. Conversion is no longer the new birth; it is an improvement, a gradual progress towards perfection of human nature. It is clear that opinions like these overturn the foundations of our confessions of faith, and that they ought to call forth against them energetic protests.

A discussion of this kind has taken place in the Consistory of Bordeaux. M. Pellissier, one of the pastors, attacked in his preaching the essential doctrines of the Gospel, and proclaimed I know not what Church of the Future, which would be very different from our old Reformed Church of France. This discourse called forth energetic remonstrances. The affair was debated at Bordeaux in two consistorial sittings. The members of the ecclesiastical body in question decided that M. Pellissier should receive a warning, with a recommendation to be more cautious. This was something. But the decidedly orthodox were of opinion that this half-measure was not sufficient. One venerable member of the Consistory, M. Hovy, gave in his resignation, stating that he did not wish at the end of his career to seem to "sanction preaching by which the minds of pious persons are distressed and scandalised." Pastor Villaret also addressed to our religious journals a letter containing these words: "I protest with the whole strength of my soul, as a Christian, as a pastor, as a member of the Consistory of the Reformed Church of Bordeaux, before God, before my Christian friends, before the Church, and before the world—not against the person of M. Pellissier, but against the principles proclaimed in his preaching—principles not less opposed to the teaching of the Gospel than to the doctrines professed from time immemorial by the Reformed Church of France." It is to be hoped that these acts of courage and fidelity will not be without their salutary results. Everybody is free as to his individual opinions; but the ecclesiastical society cannot, without self-destruction, open the doors of its churches and pulpits to the promulgation of the most contradictory principles.

HALF-YEARLY REPORT OF THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF LYONS.

I take advantage of what little space remains in this letter to call the attention of your readers to the report which the Evangelical Church of Lyons addresses every six months to its friends. The last circular, dated January 29, contains cheering intelligence, including the recital of several conversions. "The Divine blessing," say the writers of the report, "always rests upon or humble labours, and even the calumnies of our adversaries turn out to our advantage, by affording us the opportunity of making ourselves better known." X. X. X.

FUNERAL OF A PROTESTANT AND NINE ROMAN CATHOLICS BY NIGHT.

Heigne, Jumet, Jan. 30, 1861.

Honoured Brethren,—It is with pleasure that I continue to read your journal; I make good use of it in communicating the most interesting facts at public meetings, which, while edifying the good people, instructs them at the same time. I have been so much occupied by various engagements, that my correspondence has suffered; yet I have much of interest to communicate to you on the work confided to us in this country by the Lord, both in other provinces and in the district of Charleroi. At nearly all points the work goes on increasing, and is slowly consolidating itself. The position of my Church is every day better understood and recognised among the population where it is placed. The moral and religious level is rising, and the spirit of sacrifice manifests itself on many occasions in a most touching manner.

I will endeavour to give you a proof of the truth of what I have just said, in relating to you a few details of a terrible event which occurred in this neighbourhood a few weeks ago. On Sunday morning, December 23, on going to the Sunday-school, I learnt that ten miners had been killed in one of the neighbouring coalpits. While the basket was bringing the men up from the bottom, an enormous stone detached itself from the wall of the mine, fell upon the basket, crushing it, and precipitating it from a height of 600 feet. I heard that one of these unfortunate men was one of our brethren, one of the most active members of our Church, who seemed almost to have had a presentiment of his approaching end. The last words he read from the Scriptures with his wife in this world, before going to his work, were the most glorious promises of support; they occupied the last thoughts of his mind before entering into the glory of eternity. Measures were immediately taken to prevent his being buried by the priests. And as the bodies were horribly mutilated, in many cases unrecognisable, a friend went down into the mine, and after being assured of his identity, put the corpse aside, in order that it might be interred by me.

In order to avoid excitement among the people, it had been decided that the funeral of all should take place in the night. As the cemetery was at a great distance, the ten coffins were placed on an enormous hearse; an immense crowd followed. I had on my right the gendarmery, on my left several religieuses (nuns). When we arrived within a short distance of the church, the bells began to toll: I then had the coffin of our friend taken down; it was immediately surrounded and carried by our brethren. This separation was made in front of the church, one party going to the funeral service of the priests at the church; the other continued their march with me to the cemetery. No member of the administration, no employé of the society, accompanied us; yet at least half of this immense crowd followed in the most religious silence. Around the grave I saw with astonishment these deep and serried lines of spectators make way for me to take my place. It was a most magnificent moonlight night, the ground was covered with snow, and it was nine o'clock. It was one of the sublimest scenes I had ever witnessed. When there was perfect silence, a choir chanted the beautiful hymn, commencing thus, "Oh no, that is not death, home to his God to go." I discoursed on the words, "I have fought a good fight," &c. I spoke of the conversion of our friend, of his devotion to the cause he had embraced, and then made a solemn appeal to all my numerous auditors, who were still and silent as the tomb. Just consider that all this happened in Belgium, which is a land covered with priests, and not in England, or a Protestant country. Last Sunday we made a collection for the widow, and raised a considerable sum, which shows that our people have not heard the Gospel in vain. A fortnight ago a brother was killed by the explosion of a mine, and the same manifestations were repeated, showing that the influence of the Gospel goes on increasing beyond our expectations—the glory be to God!

I am, with distinguished consideration,

J. JACCARD, Pastor.

ITALY.

CIRCULATION OF EVANGELICAL WORKS, ORIGINAL AND TRANSLATED.

Florence, Feb. 6, 1861.

A bird's-eye view of the extensive Evangelical operations going on in Italy at this moment, is on many grounds too difficult a task to attempt. Equally difficult is it to give correct and detailed explanations of the efforts of the various Christian societies in any of the departments of our great Evangelistic enterprise in this land. To-day I send you a copy of each of the works which my esteemed friend, Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn, and I have been enabled, during the last few months, to print in thousands, through the liberality of Christian friends, and with these books a few words of explanation as to publication efforts generally.

Italian Evangelical writers are few in number; De Sanctis, Geymonat, Meille, Chiesi, and one or two others, comprise the whole list. Recourse is, therefore, had to translations, which God has singularly blessed, in the Italian as well as in other languages. At the same time the aim of every workman in Italy is, by all he does, to develop a native Christian literature. These translations, while blessed, as we know, to the conversion and edification of many souls, are also supplying the thinkers of Italy with the precious Scriptural thoughts of our home lands.

The "Veglie Mattutine" are the "Morning Watches" of Dr. McDuff, of Glasgow. They are highly esteemed, and, from their eminently catholic spirit, have found an entrance into more than one Romanist establishment. "Catechismo Protestante" is an excellent little manual on the principal points of the Romish controversy. It is published in English, by Seeley, and has been very useful in the West and South of Ireland. "Nicodemo" and "Elia" are two valuable portraits of Scripture characters, written by a relative of Mr. Byle, and, like his tracts, they are searching and practical. The "Ternari Sacri" are the "Sacred Triads" of Mr. Somerville, the bosom friend of M'Cheyne, intended for the Protestant schools of Tuscany and the young people in Christian families. "Il Convertito Italiano" is the touching Biography of a Tuscan convert, Luigi Vannucci. "Sequi Gesù" is the "Follow Jesus" of Newman Hall, translated by Scolini. "Il Primato del Papu" is a new edition of the famous libretto of De Sanctis. We have also in the press, "Confession," "Celibacy of the Priests," "Who has Falsified the Bible, the Protestants or the Papists?" and several other books. Some of these are printed by us at Turin, where the English type at the Waldensian printing-office is a great attraction; others are thrown off here, where the facilities afforded for revising the works, and putting them into immediate circulation, present too great an advantage to be overlooked. The dépôts here are in the greatest activity supplying Central and Southern Italy. The country north of Florence has, during the past year, been traversed by colporteurs, but only the other day did the gratifying intelligence reach me, that a colporteur who lately left Florence had gone due south through the Papal States to Naples, selling Bibles and religious books as he went along. Thus, then, Italy, from the Alps to the Straits of Messina, is open to the Gospel, excepting the city of Rome and the territory of Venetia; so that you may form an idea of the responsibilities of Christians at home in this crisis, and of the labour devolving upon us, with such a wide field on which to sow broadcast the incorruptible seed of the Word.

Last year the sale of books in Tuscany was beyond every one's expectations, and far exceeded the experiences of colporteurs in Northern Italy. I rejoice to say, what seems difficult to explain, that the circulation of Bibles and religious books of all kinds in Naples and Sicily of late has been far more extraordinary than anything we have been privileged to see in Central Italy. I will not now trouble you with statistics, but will only say that every box arriving in Naples has been emptied of its contents in a few days, and but for the enormous expenses of transport, a profit would remain in favour of the publishers. Indeed, this dissemination of truth goes on so prosperously, that the Romish camp is in agitation. In times gone by the civil power was brought to bear, and truth was imprisoned or banished. Now the sanction of the law is happily given to the preaching and publication of Evangelical sentiments. What then is left for the priests to do? Nothing but to take up the pen and enter the field of controversy. We are now in the very thick of this second phase in Italy's religious history. What a hopeful sign! What but good can result! Truth needs but a fair field and a fearless discussion. From many a pulpit in Florence, Leghorn, Pisa, and elsewhere, a daily or weekly sermon is being preached, where formerly nothing was said either by way of upholding the Papacy or of opposing Protestantism. These discourses are listened to and answered by the Waldensian or other evangelists, either through the press, which is gradually opening its columns for such discussions, or at their various reunions. Yesterday, on leaving a church, Professor Geymonat was pointed at by the pulpit orator, who stopped suddenly in his discourse against the Evangelicals, and said, "Ecco il capo" (There goes the head of the movement). I believe we are fast approaching the time when a thoroughly Evangelical newspaper will form in Tuscany a desideratum. Meanwhile the able and favourable articles appearing in the daily prints here on the Papal question, the Waldensian Church, liberty of conscience, and such-like topics, are preparing the masses of the people for the acceptance of pure Gospel truth.

As a foil to all these Evangelical efforts, there has been formed at Leghorn a "Society in Defence of the Catholic Faith, through the Circulation of Good Books." Already four cleverly-written works have appeared under its auspices. They are sold very cheap, and consist of "Conversations on Confession," "Pastoral Charges," "Protestantism Unveiled to the People," and the "Protestant Propagandism in Italy."

As you may suppose, tirade and abuse are the principal weapons employed. One of these pamphlets contain a list of about 150 different Protestant sects under the drollest of names.

But even more especial efforts are being expended than these. Individual books are being written against. "Lucilla," by Adolphe Monod, of which four or five Italian editions have been published and sold, and which, next to the Bible and the "Pilgrim's Progress," has been most blessed of God, in showing to the people the duty and privilege of reading the Scriptures, has been replied to in a large volume of 400 pages, by Pierini, editor of the "Stella d'Etruria." The "Amico di Casa," a popular illustrated Evangelical almanack, now in its eighth volume, and of which 40,000 copies have been sold for 1861, has brought two Roman Catholic rivals into the field this year. One has appeared at Naples, and pretends to be a "Confutazione" of the "Amico di Casa;" the other, which is being vended extensively in Leghorn and Florence, is meant to supplant the "Amico di Casa," and is therefore called the "Vero Amico" Almanack. Apart from the bitter attacks on Protestantism, which is always represented as one of the forms of modern Rationalism, there is much that is healthy in moral tone and useful in interesting information in these opposition books. The curiosity of the people is thus being stimulated, and the demand for Evangelical books increased by all this discussion.

And, indeed, it is much needed, for here, as at home, indifferentism is the greatest obstacle to the progress of the Gospel. May the Lord send forth His light and His truth, convince the gainsayers, convert the erring, and add daily to the Church of such as shall be saved, till Italy's heathen be given to Christ for His inheritance.

I am, ever yours affectionately,

JOHN R. M'DOUGALL.

PROGRESS OF EVANGELIZATION IN FLORENCE—NEED OF SCHOOLS.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Florence, Feb. 6, 1861.

As I am in Florence, it may perhaps not be unwelcome to you to receive from my pen some detail of the work of God in this country. He is indeed blessing His work here in a surprising manner. The rooms in which our brethren evangelise are every evening crowded with persons eager to listen to the Word of God. Last Saturday evening the usual meeting was held at seven o'clock, behind the Church of San Lorenzo. At six o'clock every place was taken, and numbers came to the door who were obliged to go away disappointed on account of the crowd. We were pressed almost one upon another. I was bathed in perspiration as on one of the hottest days of summer. My wife and sister-in-law almost fainted. Similar scenes are repeated almost every evening in the week. The good tidings of salvation in Jesus are preached with faithfulness, and with Divine power. Souls dead in trespasses and sins rise to new life. The brethren and sisters admitted to the Lord's Supper amount to nearly three hundred, all converts from Romanism to the Gospel of Christ; and their number, as also that of the inquirers, increases daily.

The Bible—no longer proscribed, persecuted, imprisoned—is sold freely in the coffee-houses and in the streets. I have myself seen several of the young priests buy it of the colportours. To give you an idea what a point religious liberty has reached in this country, I may tell you that recently one of our evangelists proved, in a public assembly, the Bible in his hand, that the Pope believes neither in Jesus Christ nor in God. The curé of San Gaetano preaches against us, calling us assassins and children of the devil. The other day, so violent were the calumnies which this truly Roman Catholic apostolic soul poured forth against the Protestants, that the audience—itsself scandalised at such a proceeding—imposed silence upon him. In the Church of San Felicita there is a brother who has begun a course of lectures against Protestantism and Protestants. An Irish Roman Catholic lady was present at one of these lectures: she had in her hand a Bible, in which she looked for the passages which the preacher incorrectly, inappropriately, or falsely quoted. An emissary, standing beside her, ordered her, with great arrogance, to close the book. Taking no heed of this, she continued; when the brute, in the most deliberate manner, struck her. The reverend preacher, instead of reproofing the act, smiled, as in token of approval. The audience trembled with indignation. The circumstance soon spread widely in Florence; and the next day the market-people (mercantini, as those poor people are called who live round the market) went together in a mass, with the Bible under their arms—those who had not Bibles already ran to purchase them—to the lecture against the Protestants. When the preacher cited a passage, they immediately searched for it in the book. In a manner, like the inhabitants of Berea, they searched the Scriptures, to see if these things were as they were expounded to them. But the Bereans found the words of Paul in perfect harmony with the Scriptures, while the mercantini became convinced of the contrary—that is, that all the expositions of the monk were in direct opposition to the Scriptures. This fact proves—first, that the Papacy is in no degree changed; its arguments are ever the same—tortures, imprisonments, exile, calumnies, wrongs, persecutions, and blows. Secondly, that the people of Florence do not accept ~~these~~ as proofs of the veracity of a doctrine. Those happy times for Rome are over; and I thank the Lord for it! The Christians of Florence, instructed by the Word of God not to render blow for blow, nor to throw pearls before swine, no more attend these preachings, certain that truth will come to the light, and calumny in the end be unmasked.

For the most part the religious revival at present going on is among the lower classes. Great numbers of the middle and higher rank sympathise with us, and read the Holy Scriptures in their houses, but fear to compromise themselves. They say they wish to defer declaring themselves till the kingdom of Italy is settled upon a stable foundation, their conviction being that it is at present poised as it were in air, in danger from the lightest breath of wind. The field is wide, the labourers are few; but the few have a profound knowledge of the Scriptures, great power of speech, and the most ardent zeal.

Dear Francesco and Rosa Madiai are aiding in the work of the Lord as far as they are able. Meetings have been commenced in the various suburbs of the city. It is the Carnival time with us. Hitherto the Catholic churches have been deserted in these festival days; but our meeting-rooms continue to be full, in spite of the halls, theatre, masquerades, and diversions of all kinds.

I am still detained here for the present by domestic affliction, and am anxious for our school in London. But we must trust in the Lord, hoping that He will provide, even during our absence, for the work to which, by His grace, He has called us. Meanwhile, I hope not to have spent my time in vain, since I have been in Florence. I go evangelising from house to house, and find opportunities to speak of the things of God, not only to my relations and friends, but also with several priests whom I used to know, and to whom I speak of the love of God in Jesus Christ. One of these, with whom I was a fellow-student, recognised me in the street. Although we had not met for twenty years, and knowing nothing of my religious convictions, he threw his arms round my neck, embraced me warmly, and exclaimed, "And can it be true that I shall die a Roman Catholic priest?"

A few days ago I went to visit a monk in his convent. As soon as he saw me and recognised me he expressed the greatest delight, and said that the day before the monks had been speaking against me at dinner. I am invited to spend a day in the country, five miles out of Florence, with a priest who loves to be instructed in the Word of God. If you were here, and could see for yourselves how powerfully the Lord is working in this country, immersed not long since in the thickest darkness of Papistry and incredulity, you would unite with me in raising hymns of praise and thanksgiving to Him who turns the lion into the lamb. To Him, then, and to Him alone, be all the honour and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

The work of evangelization ought to go step by step with that of instruction. For want of Evangelical schools the converts of Florence are compelled to send their children to the schools of the Romanists, and to allow them to grow up in ignorance. It is, then, of the greatest importance that elementary Evangelical schools should be opened in Tuscany, and in other parts of Italy, both for boys and girls, for the benefit of Christian families. Besides this, it would be necessary to have evening schools, that adults unable to read (and the number of these, even among the converts, is large) might have the means of learning. For the maintenance in Florence of the three schools—that is, one for boys, one for girls, and one for adults—salaries, rent, and other expenses included, about 200*l.* per annum would be needed. I have made this a subject of prayer before the Lord, and He has put into my heart to exert myself to get these three schools opened in Florence, and, if possible, before I leave. I warmly command this cause, therefore, to the Christians in England. Count Guicciardini and the Madiati also encourage me to do what I can for such an object. A little infant school has been opened in Florence. Those who come are in all seventeen, and the mistress who teaches is an English lady. Any one willing to aid so important a work may send contributions to my friend, Sig. A. Guarducci, at Baron Rothschild's, City, London.

Believe me, yours affectionately in Christ,

SALVATORE FERRETTI.

THE EVANGELICAL SCHOOLS IN TURIN.

We have on former occasions made our readers acquainted with the pious work carried on in these schools by Madame de Sanctis, and we now supply further information from a statement recently put forth by that excellent lady:—

It is rejoicing to our hearts (Madame de Sanctis says) to be able to tell you, that these dear schools are all in a condition of vigorous efficiency: the number of pupils has greatly increased within this last year, for there are now 196 children in attendance. Our three teachers have throughout given very great satisfaction; and have been indeed faithful and steady in their duty of teaching. We have watched over these dear schools for upwards of five years, and we have felt it our duty to hold fast to our fundamental principle of making the precious Word of Truth the basis of all our instruction, for we know that "one thing is needful," and the others only useful; and we now can look back upon our labours with pleasure, for we see that rays of light have penetrated into the minds of many of these children, and that the Word of God has in many instances been received with joy. Most of these dear children regularly attend the Sunday-school, and we cannot but believe and hope that they will carry the tidings of the blessed Gospel into their families, and that they will become living temples of the living God, and be numbered among those who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

We shall mention a few facts to prove how much they are attached to the school, and how the Holy Spirit has worked upon their hearts. One very interesting girl said to the teacher one day: "I should like to become a very good girl: if I pray to Jesus, do you think He will make me good?" "Yes," she said, "and pray to Him that He may send you the Holy Spirit." A day or two after she said to the teacher: "I have prayed night and day for the Holy Spirit, but I don't feel it has come yet. Oh! I shall pray until it comes." Another dear child said: "I no longer confess my sins to a priest, as I used to do before I came to this school; but now I ask Jesus to forgive me, and I feel so happy afterwards, because I know He can forgive me, but the priest cannot." We must mention another very interesting fact of a younglad of fifteen, who has attended the boys' school for two years; he is one of a very numerous family, and unfortunately the priests had induced his father to remove him from the school. The poor boy was afterwards placed at the seminary directed by these same priests: during the first few days they were very kind to the boy, and gradually they became less kind to him, until their conduct towards him was very cruel: for instance, they would make him kneel for three hours every day before an image of the Virgin Mary, telling him he must do penance, and offer up prayers to the Virgin, that through her intercession he might be forgiven for having so long attended a school kept by heretics. You will rejoice to hear that the poor boy managed to get away from the seminary, and has returned to school: he is a very promising lad, and his great wish is to become a teacher.

We have at the school a boy and girl who also desire to become teachers, but they require a certificate from Government, and they cannot obtain it unless they have undergone a course of studies in the Government training college. We feel obliged to appeal to our Christian friends in Great Britain to provide us with the means of preparing these young people for the important office to which they aspire, their parents being unable to maintain them during the time required for study. We calculate that about 12*l.* a-year for each would suffice. Surely the time to favour the poor benighted children of Italy is come. Many demands are being made from all quarters for Bible schools similar to those in Turin. We are so thankful to feel that the schools here prove to be also very useful to English children. We have several English girls, who have attended the school for upwards of two years. We do indeed sincerely trust that our Christian friends will continue to aid us in this labour of love, and may the Lord graciously dispose the hearts of those of His people, who love this dear country, to continue their contributions and prayers, and even to increase their assistance, as the field of labour is constantly extending, and we think we could do more, if our resources were less limited.

As we are on the eve of leaving Turin to carry on the Lord's work in Genoa, we must inform our Christian friends that the superintendence of the schools will be carried on by the minister who is to succeed us here.

You will rejoice to hear that on the 15th of November we had the pleasure of opening a Bible-school in Milan. Several friends in England have already kindly sent us 35*l.* 10*s.* towards this school. We are happy to state that we have an excellent Milanese teacher. Mr. Schwenk, a gentleman resident in Milan, has kindly promised to superintend this school.

Several Christians have already sent us their contributions towards a Bible-school in Genoa, which we hope with God's blessing to open in the month of January, 1861.

GAVAZZI AT NAPLES.

We have received the following in a private letter:—

Gavazzi has remained in Naples during the winter, quietly labouring, and waiting for the time when he might have the opportunity of publicly declaring "the glorious Gospel of the Blessed God." That time has now arrived; the work has commenced; and God has blessed it. You are aware that he was deprived of the larger of the two Jesuit churches given to him by Garibaldi, and he has not yet been permitted to preach even in the smaller one; but it is thought that the present Government will feel obliged to confirm this grant, or to allot some other place for his services and schools. In the meantime, whilst this question is pending, feeling that he should no longer remain silent, he, a few weeks ago, accepted an invitation to speak in a small room, where he had the happiness of proclaiming "justification by faith in Christ alone." He was encouraged by seeing the little hall quite full. The commencement could not have been better; and there is reason to believe that this new kind of preaching, entirely Evangelical, will find favour in Naples. He has now felt constrained to rent a more commodious room, offered to him for the evangelization. This hall contains seats for 200 persons, and about 50 more can stand in the anteroom. He has opened it for two public services on the Sunday; and he will now be able to carry out his plans for commencing a school for adults, on three evenings in the week, in the first instance, for secular instruction. On the alternate evenings he hopes to commence a course of lectures on the Romish controversy, similar to those which excited so much interest in Florence. Some one is needed at the present moment boldly to attack Romanism in front; and in addition to his other gifts, the Lord has endowed Gavazzi with an indomitable courage, which will not permit him to shrink from the most deadly warfare by which he may promote his Master's glory. He is, of course, aware that his position is one of extreme danger; the persecution, menaces, and insults he has already endured from the priests are indescribable; and the police have now informed him that they cannot be answerable for his life. But, though detested by the priesthood and its slaves, he has much confidence in the good feeling of the people; placing his chief trust, however, in God, who is his refuge and strength; and in the prayers of his Christian friends, which he frequently intreats with earnestness. Let us hope that this request will not be forgotten, but that many, many supplications will ascend for one so well known throughout Great Britain and Ireland as an eloquent Christian patriot, who is now called to contend, almost single-handed, in his native Italy, for the faith once delivered to the saints. May the Lord also influence the hearts of those to whom He has given the silver and the gold, to come forward with material assistance, without which the expenses of the room cannot long be sustained. I am sure you will kindly take charge of any offering which may be sent to you. The ten guineas you forwarded after a former appeal for the support of the worship in Florence were most acceptable and helpful. Till many of the Italian people have truly received the Gospel they must be assisted by British Christians. What mission can be more important? A little aid, just at this juncture, may be the means of conferring a great and lasting benefit, of the highest order, upon Italy. Assistance is also greatly needed, just now, to provide bread for the ecclesiastics who have been under Gavazzi's instruction, and who are now on the point of abandoning Rome. One has already given in his public adhesion to the Evangelical Church, and has commenced preaching the Gospel, and others are prepared to follow.

TURKEY.

MISSION FIELD OF TURKEY.

A letter of much interest has been received from the Rev. Mr. Goodell, of Constantinople, many years a missionary on the ground, respecting the progress of religious liberty in Turkey. He testifies to what he has seen and known; and his testimony, in regard to the progress of religious liberty, is such as should lead us to feel grateful for the great improvement that has taken place. He writes: "Before the promulgation of the late Hatti-Humayoun there were more cases of persecution and oppression reported to the missionaries during one week than now occurs during a whole year. Then much of their time was taken up endeavouring to obtain protection and justice for the persecuted for conscience' sake. Now cases of persecution are only occasional, and their whole time is occupied by their proper missionary work. That the Hatti-Humayoun has not accomplished all that could be desired, is certainly true; but it has accomplished more than ever I expected it would. I never for a moment expected that it would prevent all oppression and wrong, and introduce at once a millenium of justice. Nor did I ever suppose for a moment that this weak, selfish, tyrannical Government was so much in advance of all the Christian Governments on the earth, that it would not connive at violations of the solemn pledge it had publicly given. But, though I never expected everything from it, I expected much, and the result has far exceeded my expectations."

From Adrianople we have important statements respecting the religious condition of the Bulgarians, by Mr. Morse. They have for some time past been strenuously demanding their release from the authority of the Greek Patriarch, and an independent re-organization of their own Church. Of late led on by the Jesuits, they have threatened to become Romanists in a body, unless their demands are complied with by the Porte. Yet many of them would probably prefer to become Protestants. The books of the mission are being sold extensively, and Mr. Morse says, "Apparently the work will be upon us in all its magnitude before we are prepared for it."

Mr. Crane writes: "As the novelty of first impressions gives place to a more intimate acquaintance with the work, we find ourselves cheered even beyond what we had ventured to anticipate previous to our arrival here. The greater intelligence and thrift of these people, compared with those of Asiatic Turkey, of itself affords no slight grounds of encouragement to labour among them. But what has awakened in us a still greater interest is the extent to which Evangelical truth seems for some time past to have been silently pervading the reading, thinking class of Armenian minds in this community."

The Rev. Mr. Leonard writes from Marsovan: "You will be gratified to learn that the Protestants of Marsovan, even when left without preacher or teacher, have not forsaken the assembling of themselves together in the house of God. Without clock or bell, the cry of the muezzin from the minarets of Turkish mosques, summoning the followers of the false Prophet to prayer, is also their adopted signal for worship. Punctual to this cry, three times on the Sabbath, and twice on secular days of the week, they have been wont to assemble in their plain, mud-walled chapel, to hear the Holy Scriptures, join with their humble deacon in prayer, and receive such exhortation as he might be able to give; and this ever since their pastor left them, now about four years ago. On each Sunday since my arrival the congregation has numbered about 100, and, what is very encouraging, the greater number of these are young men; some of these I hope to gather into a class for special Biblical instruction, as soon as I can obtain a native helper."

The Rev. Mr. White writes from Marash: "Since I last wrote, our congregations have very much increased, and are much more attentive than before, and all indications at present are very favourable. Owing to the unsettled state of the country, they have been unable to work in the villages, as they had hoped. Still they are not idle; they have maintained a helper in Kishifi since May last; two more are going from village to village, preaching and explaining the Scriptures; a fourth starts next for Woofret; and they will possibly take Karamanlu off our hands.

These missionary efforts of our Church are in the right direction, and we hope the blessing of God will rest upon them."

At Albustan the work has made great progress since last spring. Seventeen adults have been added to the community, and there is a wide-spread spirit of inquiry among the Armenians. The Protestants, as a community, are much respected; their head man is a member of the Governor's Council; and they are more exempt from oppression than the Armenians. They contribute liberally to the support of their poor, pay one-half the expenses of the school, and will purchase a place of prayer as soon as a site can be obtained. Much good seed has been sown here, and during the winter now we hope to see the seed spring up, and bear much good fruit.

WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER IN SMYRNA.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Smyrna, Turkey, Jan. 14, 1861.

Dear Sirs,—The Church of God throughout the world will doubtless wait to hear, one part from another, how the week of prayer has passed; and I know of no periodical to which we shall all look more eagerly for this news than to Evangelical Christendom. Accordingly, I propose to tell you what God has done for us this week.

And first let me premise that for these past years Smyrna has seemed to drag behind even the rest of Turkey. Though there have been missionaries here, both English and American, for nearly thirty years, they have seen very little fruit of their labour, and in the large English community here, while there have been a few praying ones, who have sighed and cried over the desolation, the mass have been content with a name to live, while they were dead. The weekly prayer-meeting, kept up by the missionaries, was only attended by two or three outside of their families. But for two years past there has been an evidently increasing spirit of prayer among the few hidden ones, more of wrestling with God in the closet, a feeling that we must have this blessing or perish.

Last spring the plan of the weekly prayer-meeting was changed, and some new life given it; and after the summer vacation it was resumed, with still increased interest, a larger attendance, and more faith and hope.

That interest has grown from week to week, till it has culminated in this week of prayer. The place of assembly, which will comfortably seat one hundred, was filled the first evening, and has been more and more crowded till the last, when nearly two hundred were present, every available corner being occupied by extra chairs, and numbers being compelled to stand. But more than all, the Lord Jesus was present in our midst, more and more manifestly to the last a spirit of grace and supplication was poured out upon God's people, prayer welled up from the heart, and the people with one heart united in it, and every heart, of believer or unbeliever, was solemnised.

We hope that this is the beginning of good things for this barren field. Probably such prayer-meetings have not been seen here since the days of Polycarp, but we hope to see many more. It is not a sudden, evanescent excitement; the way has been preparing for it for two years. It is the answer to many fervent prayers among the English residents; some who, we may hope, have been God's children, but who had previously backslidden, and shown little spiritual life, have been aroused, and many careless, impenitent ones have become thoughtful and impressible; some who had not attended church for six years have been drawn into the prayer-meeting.

We look for good also among the natives. There are some hopeful signs among them, and if the foreign population show that religion is something more than a name with them, its effect will be seen among Armenians and Greeks, Jews and Mohammedans.

We hear from other parts of Turkey that this week of prayer has been waited for and looked to, and we hope to hear from all this land, and from all the world, during the remainder of this winter, news that shall make glad the city of our God. I cannot close without expressing my sense of the worth of Evangelical Christendom, and my gratitude to the kind friend or friends through whose liberality missionaries receive it gratis. No periodical I receive is worth so much. May the Lord bless the donor for this refreshing cup of cold water.

- Yours truly,

A MISSIONARY.

THE GOSPEL FOR THE ARABS.

Letters have been received from Dr. Gregory M. Wortabet from Bagdad, where he has arrived in safety, after lending some medical assistance to the sufferers in Beyrout and neighbourhood during the recent troubles. Dr. Wortabet has not gone out as a missionary in form, but as a medical man, to practise on his own account in Bagdad. He, however, has the cause of the Gospel to the Arabs at heart, and proposes to make his medical skill available to the missionaries, by giving through them advice gratis to the poor; thus seeking to extend their influence, and to open himself a door of access to the Arabs. One of the friends who sent out Dr. Gregory Wortabet on this mission (the Rev. Dr. Blackwood, Vicar of Myddleton Tyas, Yorkshire) has received a letter, dated 19th December, which among other things says: "I wish I had brought with me some medicines, as it is hard to tell these poor people that I can give them nothing but advice. The drugs at the pharmacy here are very dear, and really above the purse of the poor; for as in the days of Haroun Alraschid, so it is at this day, Bagdad is famous for the number of her poor. Mendicant dervishes are the only remains of the former Bagdads of more prosperous days. This want of medicines I have felt all along, ever since I landed on the coast of Syria. In Sidon and in Beyrout, where I was momentarily attending the sick and the wounded, I was obliged to beg the medicines from my friends the doctors in the fleet. And all the way here I was besieged every evening with sick persons wanting medicines. More than once I was obliged to open my boxes and show the poor fellows that I had no medicines. Coming down from Mosul here on a raft on the Tigris, we had an escort of thirty Bedouins to protect the goods from their fellow tribes. This is always done. One of them had been bitten by a dog, and I attended his swollen leg successfully; and I had a few cases of intermittent fever amongst them, and one of a low typhoid fever. I did my best for them, but I grieved sorely that I had no medicines to give them. I told them of the interest taken in them by friends in England, and, amongst others, I mentioned your name to them. They appeared grateful, but surprised, and said in reply, 'Khash Ingless' (the English are good!). I told them that the English would be very glad to see their condition bettered and their country thriving. Of course, not much can be expected from such short intercourse; they told me, however, a great deal about their habits and customs and manner of living, which was very interesting to me. They are nominal Mohammedans, but apparently they know very little of their religion. I told them that the Mohammedans believe in Moses and the Prophets; also in Isa (Jesus) and Virgin Mother. This I intended to be as a leader to an exposition to them of the life of Jesus Christ; but save the name of Mohammed, they knew very little of Mohammedanism. God grant that the day may soon come when the day-spring from on high will shine in the desert heart of Ishmael. I offered to treat any sick they brought to me. They appeared grateful. A free dispensary here would be a great blessing; but to increase its usefulness it should be under the care of the missionaries, in order that an opening might be given them of reaching the people's souls as well as their bodies. I am willing to attend the dispensary gratis."

Dr. Wortabet has addressed a letter to the Rev. Mr. Bruhl, missionary at Bagdad from the London Jewish Society, offering to attend gratis all poor sick recommended by them. We have no doubt but that as soon as possible a stock of medicines will be supplied; and we invite the prayers of Christian friends everywhere for the blessing of God upon this attempt to introduce good among the poor sons of Ishmael.

THE DOCTRINES OF MOHAMMEDANISM ON THE END OF THE WORLD.

Aleppo, Jan. 17, 1861.

Next to the great historical work of the Redemption, and a well-grounded hope of possessing a personal and saving interest in it, no topic in the whole range of the Christian system affords more delightful contemplation to the Christian mind than the doctrine of the millenium. The world has been so long under the reign of the kingdom of darkness, and our race has so long groaned under its burden of confusion and error, and sin and suffering, and the element of vital Christianity has been so long feeble in controlling the destiny and happiness of nations, that one turns from the dark and painful picture to behold with profound joy a scene in which meet the highest glory of God, so far as it is known to us, and the best interests of mankind. Of these times of restitution of all things God has spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the world began, and they are described as a season when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the whole earth; when a nation shall be born to God in a day; when all shall know the Lord, from the least to the greatest; when His kingdom shall come, and His will shall be done on earth, as it is done in heaven, in answer to the importunate prayers offered by His people for well-nigh two thousand years. And it is even interesting and profitable to turn our attention for a moment from this expectant attitude of the Church of Christ, which the Word of God so justly warrants, to those imperfect and mutilated views held by the Jew, the Druse, the Metawaleh,* and the Sennite Mohammedan; to note the coincidences and the differences which alike form the superiority of our system of revealed truth, and thus to lead ourselves to more frequent prayer, that He who is the desire of all nations may manifest Himself to them as the Son of God, the Saviour of sinners, and the friend of our fallen race.

Our present design is to lay before the reader a very concise view of what Mohammedanism teaches relative to that interesting period which is often called, and with various significations, "the end."

The ground on which the Mohammedan belief on this subject rests is the authority of a large number of traditions, attributed to Mohammed, and collated and arranged by some of their writers. The following account is taken from a work of this kind, composed with great care by an author who lived in Medina about two hundred years ago. It may be proper here to remark, that Mohammedan doctors make a distinction between well-authenticated traditions and such as are otherwise. Traditions whose authenticity is well established are regarded to be binding in every case; such as are probably authentic are only of probable authority; while those whose traditional succession is very doubtful are rejected. In the case before us, only the chief points are considered by reasonable Mohammedans to rest on unexceptionable authority. Notwithstanding, however, the unquestionable antiquity of these traditions, which carries them up to a period not very remote from the time of the Arabian prophet, it appears from several expressions and points of coincidence, that a large part of the piece is mutilated from the Old and New Testament prophecies. Some points reveal evident indications of a Rabbinical origin.

The proximate signs of the end, or the hour (as it is called by the Mohammedans), will be a universal prevalence of all manner of abominations—murder, theft, drunkenness, adultery, injustice, &c. Of Islamic learning and piety nothing will be left but the merest semblance. All the piety of those times will be as when men, with the capacity of wolves, put on sheep's clothing. The number of the faithful will be diminished every day, until it is reduced to a very few. It will be a time when men shall worship mammon, build the finest mansions, clothe themselves with the costliest fabrics, and give themselves to the grossest pleasures of sense; when women shall exercise the greatest influence, receive the most of honour, and display themselves unveiled in the public streets; when bribery and corruption and extortion shall fill the courts of justice, and justice itself shall cease to exist; when, in a word, all ties of relationship, humanity, honour, and religion shall be disregarded. Constantinople will be retaken by the Christians. Towards the latter end of this period the River Euphrates will be dried up, and its bed will discover a mine of gold. To this mine men will flock for the purposes of gain; but they will not be able to get anything, and in fighting for it, only one in a hundred will escape death. Signs in the heavens will also appear, earthquakes, revolutions, and bloody wars on earth, and a mighty voice will be heard by all the inhabitants of the world—at which every sleeper will awake, and every one awake will suddenly stand up—announcing the advent of El Muhdy.

El Muhdy (the guide) will be a descendant of Mohammed by his daughter Fatima. Born in Medina, he will begin his work when he is forty years old. His mission will be to make, at the head of the remaining Moslems, the conquest of the whole world. Beginning in the East, and subduing every turbulent faction, he will thus wage war with the Franks, who will have invaded Syria, burnt their ships, in order to infuse desperate courage into their soldiery, and taken the whole country except Damascus. The first pitched battle will be fought near the ancient Emesa, with the result of victory in favour of the Christians, and of the loss of one-third of the Moslems by death, and another third by flight. With the remaining third of the Moslem army El Muhdy will renew the engagement, and the blasphemy of the Christians will then prove to be their ruin; for, as the armies advance to each other, a Christian standard-bearer will raise up a crucifix, crying, "The cross shall have the victory!" At this moment, Michael and Gabriel will descend to the succour of the believers with three hundred thousand angels, and the Christian army will be wholly exterminated. El Muhdy will then advance to Constantinople, take it, and divide the spoil among his men, of which three hundred virgins shall be the portion of every soldier, and the gold shall be so plentiful that it will be divided by measuring it on shields. He will then proceed to Rome, which, like Jericho before the Israelites, falls by a miracle, when the Moslems shall shout four times, "God is great!" Six hundred thousand men will be put to death in Rome, and from that city the believers will recover the ark of the covenant, the two tables of stone, the two measures of manna, the holy table, the robe of Adam, the rod of Moses, and the throne of Solomon. After invading and subduing all the inhabitable world, El Muhdy will return to Syria and reside in Jerusalem.

While these latter events are taking place, Antichrist will be revealed. He is described as a man of prodigious dimensions, the son of a fairy who had fallen in love with his father, an Adamite, and having but one eye. His character will be that of an archdeceiver, and all the aims of his life will be to delude men into the belief that he is God. With this design he will at first pretend to be only a prophet; and having the power of performing miracles, either real or false, he will at last claim to be divine. Beginning his career in Persia with seventy thousand converts from the Jews, he will traverse a large part of the earth, riding on a huge white ass, whose ears are forty cubits apart, deceiving men by his miraculous powers, and all but persuading the world to worship him. For forty years he will be allowed to indulge in his blasphemous assumptions. At the end of this period, God sends Jesus, the son of Mary, to overcome him. Jesus will descend from heaven to Damascus at noon, and after leading the Moslems in prayer, will pursue Antichrist till he reaches him at Lydda. At this meeting, Antichrist, with the object of deception, calls one of his followers to lead the people in prayer. Then Jesus will say to him, "Enemy of God, you have long pretended to be the sovereign ruler of the universe; to whom, then, do you address yourself in prayer?" and with a single blow kills him on the spot.

Christ will remain upon the earth forty years, and during that time will act as the high-priest of the religion of Islam, and as the great captain of its warriors. He will compel all idolators to worship God, refuse toleration, even to those who would pay tribute, demolish the cross, and unite all men under the banner of one religion. In His days, knowledge, piety, justice, and peace will prevail; wars will be extinguished; the earth will become extremely fruitful, and men will take to the peaceful pursuits of agriculture; every fang will lose its poison, and children will play with serpents and scorpions, without the slightest injury to themselves; and the wolf and the sheep will eat grass together. At the end of forty years, having been exempted from tasting death at His first advent, He will now drink the cup allotted to all men. His death will be in Medina, and his burial by the side of Mohammed's grave.

Soon after the death of Christ, Gog and Magog will make their appearance. Of them but few particulars are given. They are a race of giants, who will travel over the world, destroying everything before them, until they are suddenly consumed by a miraculous manifestation of Divine power. The other proximate signs of the end, in its most literal signification, will be the appearance of a strange animal with a human head, and gifted with extraordinary powers; the rising of the sun from the west; the ascent of much smoke and vapour from the earth; and a fire which, proceeding from the garden of Eden, will drive all the inhabitants of the world before it until they stand before the Throne of Judgment. All these events will closely follow each other.

In this computation of dates, the Mohammedan doctors follow the Rabbinic idea, that the history of this world will expire at the end of seven thousand years from the commencement of its population by the race of Adam. Borrowing, therefore, this chronology of the age of the world from the Christians of the East, who follow the Septuagint, they find that Mohammed lived about the close of the six thousandth year; and adding the present age of Mohammedanism (1277 years), the end, according to their calculation, must, to say the least, be very nigh at hand. Indeed, some of their ancient writers have definitely settled the appearance of El Muhdy at twelve hundred years from the Islamic era; and so the author of the book from which the preceding account is taken. More than seventy years have, therefore, now elapsed from the date thus fixed. It is but fair to add, however, that they are all agreed that nothing further than the chief historical events can be unquestionably true, leaving the dates and particulars to probable, if not to conjectural speculation. And in point of fact, these doctrines have but a theoretical effect upon the minds of Mohammedans who study the subject.

Our object in these preceding lines will have been attained, if we have been able to elicit some prayerful interest on behalf of a hundred and fifty millions of our race. For superstitions and weak in many respects as it is, and having the elements of destruction in itself, Mohammedanism is not dead. It still stands, and stands as a giant. Its power and hold upon its followers is like that of Rome, a mystery. Nor is this mysterious delusion to pass away, until the Church of God shall pray much for the Mohammedan people, and until it shall send to them the precious Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. J. W.

BURMAH.

MISSIONARY EFFORT AMONG THE KARENS—SUCCESS IN TRAINING A NATIVE MINISTRY AND CREATING A SELF-SUSTAINED MISSION—SCHOOL FOR KAREN TEACHERS—FEMALE INSTITUTE—CONGREGATIONS AND THEIR PASTORS—PECUNIARY AID: IN WHAT CASES AFFORDED—FINANCIAL PERPLEXITIES.

Toungoo, Nov. 12, 1860.

The Toungoo Mission was commenced with a view to the experiment of natives conducting a mission themselves, without aid from societies; and the experiment has succeeded far beyond my most sanguine expectations. The finances are administered by native preachers exclusively, who also attend to all matters of Church government; the missionary merely advising when advice is necessary.

It has three prominent objects or departments which require support:—

First, a school for the Karen preachers and teachers of Northern Burmah. We have found by experience that we must educate our own men in our own way, and on the field, if we wish them to be efficient. This school, which consists of more than eighty pupils, from its commencement has had no aid from any society. The bamboo schoolhouse that was first erected was built by the natives at their own expense; and the board of the pupils has always been defrayed by the natives, with occasional aid to support assistants who leave their stations temporarily, to study a few months. A large schoolhouse is now being erected from a Government grant of three thousand rupees for the purpose. This school is now independent, and all the property belongs to the Karens, and cannot be alienated from them by the agents of any society. We require for it little more help beyond occasional aid that we can apply to the support of assistants while studying in it for short periods. The other pupils will, we trust, be supported by the natives.

Second, the Female Institute. Mrs. —, now in America, is endeavouring to interest the ladies there in female education in Burmah, and has a history of the institute in the press, copies of which will probably fall into your hands; so it is unnecessary for me to enter into details here. I may remark, however, that she has purchased a house for the Burmese Female School, which has cost more than 1,800 rupees. She has also obtained from Government a free grant of the compound on which the house stands, containing nearly five acres, in the most eligible location in Toungoo, the former residence of the Deputy-Commissioner. On the opposite side of the river she has obtained another free grant of about thirty acres, for the Karen Female Institute; and the institute building is now nearly completed, at a cost of some 5,000 rupees, about 2,000 of which have been furnished by the Karens themselves. Mrs. — has also procured considerable school apparatus, including a piano; and all the property, as with the young men's school, is the property of the Karens.

Third, the native preachers and teachers. We commenced on the principle that the Churches and congregations should recognise the duty to support their teachers, and that the teachers should look to their congregations for support, and not, as had up to that time been the practice, to the missionary for wages. The plan is a complete success, and no wages are paid to any assistant throughout the Toungoo jungles. Still, we afford them occasional aid, but never for food, unless when travelling, and rarely for clothing. When a congregation refuses to supply their teacher with food, he leaves them; but owing to the poverty of the people, we help the poorer ones occasionally to procure a few articles of clothing. Still more often we furnish them with medicine, and sometimes, when dangerously sick, we have them brought to town, where they can have medical assistance, and where we have to support them. The leprosy has just appeared on one of our best preachers, and as English physicians can do nothing with the disease, for I have repeatedly tried them, I have furnished him with thirty rupees to go down to the Rangoon jungles, and seek help from a Karen there, who, it is said, can cure the disease in its incipient stages. I shall probably have to pay as much more for him before he gets back to the field of his labours. Another preacher, in one of the northern villages, borrowed a pony to make a short excursion, and in the night a tiger carried it off. The pony was valued at eighty rupees, but the owner, in consideration of the circumstances, agreed to be satisfied with fifty. The teacher's congregation raised twenty for him, and the remaining thirty he paid himself by the sale of an inferior pony which he owned, and which he sold for just thirty rupees. This money I have promised to repay, as he is a very worthy man and useful preacher. To one man, who travelled extensively last year among the unconverted, where there was almost a famine, and who had to purchase food for himself and followers at an advance of five hundred per cent. on the ordinary prices, I paid forty-eight rupees. A few days ago I gave a hard-working assistant five rupees to aid his sick wife, a very excellent woman; and last week I purchased a new suit of clothes for an assistant that is going to a new station, but who has worn out all his clothes in school. In these and similar ways you will see, that though we pay no wages, yet we expend annually a considerable sum for assistants. It is necessary for us to keep one or two assistants in town to preach to the numerous companies that are constantly visiting us, and to write letters in reply to the numerous cases that the assistants and the Churches are often propounding to us. Provisions and clothing being dear, a man and his family require in town from twelve to fifteen rupees a-month, and thus cost upwards of one hundred and fifty rupees a-year. Last year, closing September 30, exclusive of an assistant employed in the city, and exclusive of the two hundred rupees paid the teacher of the school for Karen preachers, the teachers and preachers in the jungles cost about nine hundred rupees. When this sum is distributed over from one hundred and thirty to one hundred and forty individuals, the number of assistants we have in the field, it gives an average of about seven rupees each. . . .

Missionaries have much to do besides preaching. Our financial duties are not a little perplexing. I am happy to say, however, that through the kindness of individuals and a beneficent Providence, I always get along without much difficulty.

WESTERN AFRICA.

MISSIONARY SUCCESS IN CORISCO AND THE GABUN—NEW CONVERTS—OPPRESSIVE LAW ENACTED IN CREEK TOWN—CANDIDATES FOR BAPTISM—DIFFICULTIES ARISING FROM THE HABITS AND LANGUAGE OF THE HEATHEN.

(Extracts from a private letter by a Missionary.)

Creek Town, Old Kalabar, Dec. 8, 1860.

I lately paid a visit to Corisco and the Gabun, where Presbyterian missionaries from America are labouring with zeal and encouraging success. Since I came up from the quarter, in the beginning of October, circumstances have occurred to cheer the Corisco and Gabun brethren very much. Those at the former place licensed a young native as a preacher of the Gospel, and stationed him on a small island called Ilobi, about thirteen miles nearer the land than Corisco itself. It was his native place. He has reported three persons as hopefully converted, and one more as having abandoned his fetishes and begun to seek God in earnest. Mr. — says that they have evidence that half of the people in Ilobi (it is a small place) have begun to pray to the living God. I do trust that we are not to be passed over of the precious showers you have been, and are still, receiving in our favoured native land. Remember us in your prayers for the whole world. A glance at the immense field lying before and around every mission sphere in Africa, as well as in Asia, is enough to make the heart sink, were it not for the promises of the Word of God. But all the world is Christ's, and Satan must retire from his long-cherished and undisturbed seats of power.

We receive from time to time proofs of his hostility and influence here. The latest in our immediate sphere of labour, was a law made by the Creek Town gentlemen, forbidding females to wear European gowns. This law was made while I was away; but Mr. —, aided by King Eyo, procured a clause excepting the baptised females. On my return, I requested "Father Tom" to assemble the gentlemen, that I might speak about this gown law, and hear their answer for their own sakes. He agreed. A day was appointed; King Eyo and Mr. Timson gave their support; but I pleaded in vain the cause of decency and justice. That even the wives and daughters of the chiefs should wear anything more than a small fragment of cloth about the loins, would be an innovation, and it could not be borne that slave women should walk about the town covered. They were very sorry that they could not grant my request; but they could not permit such an innovation. During the late King Eyo's life the thing was tolerated; but now his son has not the position among the native gentlemen—being but a young man among men who are as old as, or older than, his father—that would enable him to veto their wishes. I do not fear that any serious harm will follow the making of this law, although it is almost a direct blow at the work of the Lord. Yet good is always made to grow out of evil, and the unreasonable, silly wrath of man is ever made to praise the Lord!

Some are anxious to be received to baptism, but I would like to see clearer proofs of their being genuine converts. Others have fallen grievously of late. Drunkenness and uncleanness are their greatest snares. Among the heathen, and among these, before the fear of God arose in their hearts, darkness was their light, evil was their good. And now these few, poor sheep are surrounded by children of the devil, who labour to overthrow their faith and draw them back into the slough of sin. Their own former habits, too, have left deep impressions upon them; and, alas! too easily are some drawn away once and again from the truth and purity of the Gospel of Jesus.

It is no easy matter to preach the Gospel adequately and lovingly here; at least adequately, for want of an efficient and familiar vehicle of thought. The Ejik tongue possesses not words and forms of expression sufficient to be the channel of the holy and noble and heavenly and spiritual truths of God. The nearest word to the word holy is a word which was, perhaps, never used to express such an idea till the missionaries were compelled to use it for want of a better. Their language needs baptizing and Christianising as well as themselves. Besides that it is thus inadequate, we do not soon acquire such a knowledge of it as that we can make the most of it. But yet the cause moves, the kingdom comes,

TRIUMPHS OF THE GOSPEL—TRAINING OF NATIVE MINISTERS—THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE—MISSIONARY SENTIMENTS AND ASPIRATIONS.

(Extracts from the letter of a Missionary.)
Tauranga, Bay of Plenty, New Zealand,
Nov. 14, 1860.

This is my thirty-third year as a missionary of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand. The change in the natives from barbarism to Christianity and civilisation is a stubborn fact, notwithstanding much that may be lamented. The profession of Christianity has been very general. From the numbers of those who have taken solemn vows upon them, and have been admitted into the Church of Christ, I doubt not many have been soundly converted to God. Not a few, after witnessing a good confession before their fellow-men, have entered into glory. It has been my privilege to attend the dying beds of many native Christians.

Thank God, there are many who maintain their steadfastness, though surrounded by great temptations and perplexities, incidental to the general colonisation going on.

We have six native clergymen, and a good number under preparation for the ministry. Our old missionary band is diminishing. Our chief hope is in a native ministry, for the present superintended by English missionaries, whose main object is to instruct and train the most promising characters as agents in the work. Our Wesleyan brethren are, I believe, in a similar position to ourselves, and are aiming at the same great object, the perpetuation of the work through a native pastorate.

There has not been a branch of the Evangelical Alliance in the Auckland province of New Zealand, or I doubt not a good number of our missionaries would have joined it. It certainly devolves upon some party to initiate one.

In the eastern diocese, where I reside, there are no clergy but those of the Church Missionary Society, nor am I aware that there are any Protestants of any other denomination. Our bishop is an old and much-revered veteran of the Church Missionary Society; he is, I doubt not, in spirit with the principles and operations of the Alliance, though not formally connected with it. I think, too, that the same remark applies to all the clergy of this diocese. As missionaries we are united in heart and in object with all who labour for the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom. A missionary spirit pervades the Churches of our beloved native country; we are interested in the prayers and sympathies of our fellow-Christians, who fervently pray for the prosperity of our Zion.

May the Lord bless your laudable efforts in the extension and consolidation of His Church a hundred-fold; and may the prayer of Christ soon have its consummation in those who are yet unconverted being, through the instrumentality of the Word, brought into the fold—that they who are now of the faith and those who will hereafter believe “may be one.”

FIELD OF MISSIONARY LABOUR—PREVALENT VICES—MINISTERIAL SUCCESS—RESULT OF ONE CONVERSION—CHURCH BUILDING.

(From a Missionary.)

Bay de Verds, Newfoundland,

Jan. 17, 1861.

I know not to whose kindness I am indebted for the regular monthly receipt of your valuable publication during the past year. Living in such an isolated spot, cut off from almost all intercourse with my brother clergy, Evangelical Christendom has been expected with eagerness, and welcomed with much pleasure. Had it not been for this publication, we should have been comparatively ignorant of much that has taken place, and is still going on in the world (the Christian world in particular), as also of the judgment of Christians in general of many important events.

The settlement in which I reside, and which forms a part of my mission, contains between 500 and 600 souls, of whom nearly half are Romanists. I have been here rather more than thirteen years; and I thank God that my labour has not been in vain. Immorality and drunkenness, which once were shamefully prevalent, are almost banished, though the latter vice does occasionally show its odious head. But, in addition to an improvement in the outward moral conduct, I have (as I think) good reason to assert that a great inward spiritual change has taken place in many. The work of the Spirit has been going on, slowly indeed, but nevertheless surely. For some years little fruit appeared; and then one here, and another there, declared themselves on the Lord's side. And so it has gone on. One young woman, a Sunday scholar, has been an instrument, in God's hand, of bringing to the Lord her father and mother, two brothers, and another young man. The three last partook of the Lord's Supper on Christmas-day, for the first time. Oh! how these parents did rejoice on that day, and bless God for giving them such a child. We have about forty communicants here, and the same number in Grates Cove, another part of my mission. At this latter place our people have just finished a small church, all but the tower, which they cannot go on with for want of board. They have done most of the labour themselves. Our lay reader there has been most unwearied in his exertions. . . .

The people among whom my lot is cast are poor fishermen, and cannot do much for their pastor; but, having food and raiment, we must be content.

EPISCOPAL CONDEMNATION OF THE "ESSAYS AND REVIEWS."

It is, if we recollect aright, a decided Presbyterian, Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, who has called the Church of England "the eldest daughter of the Reformation." Men who can take as impartial a view of the past as that eminent historian will readily admit the propriety of the designation. Nor is the evidence of the present less conclusive. If the greatest fact of the Reformation era was that the Bible, which had been kept under lock and key by the priest, became thenceforth the property of the people, and in the construction of the great ecclesiastical edifice which, in England, at once succeeded to the Church of Rome, the authority of the Word of God was everywhere recognised, so in every one of the thousands of churches which cover the broad acres of England, provision is made for the amplest possible presentation of the lessons of Scripture to the minds of the people. It is not simply that its Articles affirm so emphatically the Protestant doctrine upon this subject. From the opening declaratory sentences of its daily service, through its appointed lessons, its regular recital of the Psalms, its collects, and other aids to devotion, taken wholly or in part from the Bible, to its closing apostolic benediction, it brings man into immediate contact with the true sayings of God. If the Bible be not inspired, or be less inspired than plain Englishmen have been wont to suppose, then no more gigantic mistake was ever made than that committed by the Reformers generally, and by the fathers of the Church of England in particular, in the reverence which they exhibited for its teachings. Be this as it may, the Church of England, and every other Reformed Church worthy the name, will feel that it is indebted not a little to the whole episcopal bench for their declaration on the subject of the "Essays and Reviews," by the gentlemen who have earned for themselves the sobriquet of the Septem contra Christum. There has been some attempt to institute a comparison, not to its advantage, between this and some former episcopal manifestoes. But the effort is really, after all, suggestive of a contrast. We believe, however, that there has been no such unanimity ever thus displayed before. The reason is sufficiently obvious, and should rebuke those whose flippancy makes it quite apparent that they have yet to acquire the calm and serious temper which should be brought to any discussion upon a subject of this kind. We subjoin the Archbishop of Canterbury's letter, which has been transmitted, not only to the gentleman who forwarded the Oxford memorial, but also to other memorialists :—

Lambeth, Feb. 12.

Rev. Sir,—I have taken the opportunity of meeting many of my episcopal brethren in London, to lay your address before them.

They unanimously agree with me in expressing the pain it has given them that any clergyman of our Church should have published such opinions as those concerning which you have addressed us.

We cannot understand how their opinions can be held consistently with an honest subscription to the formularies of our Church, with many of the fundamental doctrines of which they appear to us essentially at variance.

Whether the language in which these views are expressed is such as to make their publication an act which could be visited in the Ecclesiastical Courts, or to justify the synodical condemnation of the book which contains them, is still under our gravest consideration. But our main hope is our reliance on the blessing of God, in the continued and increasing earnestness with which we trust that we and the clergy of our several dioceses may be enabled to teach and preach that good deposit of sound doctrine which our Church has received in its fulness, and which we pray that she may, through God's grace, ever set forth as the uncorrupted Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. CORRESPONDENCE OF THE REV. T. R. BIRKS, M.A., SIR C. E. EARDLEY, BART.; AND THE REV. E. PRESSENSE, ORIGINALLY PUBLISHED IN THE RECORD, ON THE RESOLUTION OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, OCCASIONED BY THE DEATH OF BARON DE BUNSEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Kelshall Rectory, Jan. 14, 1861.

Sir,—Though I am reluctant to break silence where I must express strong dissent, on the one side or the other, from those whom I esteem and love, I think it my duty, after having seen your article last week on Baron Bunsen, and the Resolution passed by the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, to ask your insertion of the following remarks. I ask it on a double ground, both as one of the Honorary Secretaries of the Alliance, and because I hold another office, in which it is due to the whole Church that private feelings and personal courtesy should never be suspected to have more influence than fidelity to the claims of sound doctrine and the truth of God.

My distance from town prevents me from attending, except very rarely, the meetings of the Committee of the Alliance. Had I been present when the Resolution was proposed, I should certainly have protested against it with all the force in my power. I agree fully with every word of your remarks, and believe them to be alike just, temperate, and seasonable. I can fully appreciate, also, the kindly feelings which influenced those members of the Committee, possibly few in number, and probably little acquainted with Baron Bunsen's writings, by whom the Resolution was passed. A year ago I should have felt no surprise on its appearance, or might possibly, through similar ignorance, have been ready myself to give it a silent acquiescence.

But the case is now widely different. For personal courtesies, or amiable private qualities, private acknowledgments from those members of the Alliance by whom such courtesies may have been received, are the fit return. It was certainly never formed to pass resolutions of sympathy and condolence, indiscriminately, whenever persons of learning, or of amiable private character, are taken away. It is an association formed for two great public objects, the maintenance of Divine truth, and the promotion of Christian love, based on faith and sound doctrine, in contrast to the strife of the Church, and the spurious latitudinarian benevolence of the world. Its public acts, with reference to public characters, ought clearly to depend, not on private feelings, the result of personal courtesies, but on broad and distinct public grounds. Tried by this test, I believe the Resolution in question to be most unwise and unseasonable, and calculated, without some protest from other members or officers, to destroy all the moral influence of the Alliance.

What are the circumstances under which the Resolution appears? The most ominous sign of the times, by the general consent of Christians of discernment, is the publication of the recent volume of "Essays and Reviews," which have startled thousands into the conviction that a wide-spread apostasy from the truth among intellectual men is near at hand, if not already begun. Of these seven essays, linked by a plain moral unity, but still unequal in demerit, perhaps the most offensive, and in my own opinion the most dangerous, is the second, headed "Bunsen's Biblical Researches." Its greater power of mischief does not arise from the superior ability of the writer above his companions, or any force of reasoning in the review. Like one of the kings in Daniel's vision, "its power is mighty, but not by its own power." It is a summary and abridgment, simplified for the use of English readers, of Baron Bunsen's three latest works—that on Egypt, "God in History," and "Bible Work for the People." It is entirely through the weight of his character, learning, and erudition, that the review seeks to make a powerful impression on the minds of its readers. Under this guidance, there is perhaps no essay in the volume which does so much to undermine and destroy the whole edifice of Christian faith, or which would hurry those who accept its conclusions so far on the road towards utter infidelity.

Since reading the essays, a few months ago, I have felt it right to procure and read carefully Baron Bunsen's work on Egypt. My impression, before reading it, has ripened now into a full conviction, that it is the most mischievous assault on orthodox Christianity, the most formidable contribution to the cause of direct infidelity, which has appeared in the literary world in the last thirty years. The Christian character and profession of the writer only give a fresh impulse, and more dangerous moral power, to the deadly thrust aimed against the Divine authority, and even the historical truth, of the Word of God. I took up the work, expecting to find conclusions widely opposed to all simplicity of faith in the Old Testament, but partially compensated by a Christian tone of thought and feeling. I have been grievously disappointed in this hope. His contemptuous tone towards those Christians who place more faith in the Books of Moses than in his own conjectural emendations of Manetho, is as marked a feature of the work as its wide divergence from the old landmarks of Christian faith. A declaration, for instance, by Baumgarten, of the credibility of the statements in Exodus about the increase of numbers in Egypt, meets with the polite commentary that "the old Rabbis have hardly been more absurd." "The common interpretation of the Bible"—that is, in reality, the Bible itself, before it has been transmuted into something widely different in the æmule of his criticism—he calls "a tissue of old women's stories and children's tales, which contradict each other." The Bible chronology he styles "a fable strung together by ignorance and fraud, and persisted in out of superstition and want of intellectual energy." The Exodus, in his view, instead of a wonderful work of Divine power, was merely an insurrection of the Jews, in concert with the Bedouins, in a time of Egypt's weakness, in which "Moses and his fellow-conspirators had quietly made preparations in the Peninsula, to ensure the success of their vast undertaking." (Vol. ii., p. 266.) Throughout two or three thousand pages I have not found an expression, I will not say of abhorrence, but of simple dislike, towards one of the foulest systems of idolatry which ever dishonoured God or destroyed the souls of men. On the contrary, he enters with zest and delight into its most repulsive details, the incest of Egyptian gods and goddesses, &c., as a curious and attractive subject of learned inquiry. The king under whom, in his opinion, the bondage of the Jews begun, is highly praised for singular greatness of mind because of his idol-offerings to a long list of deified ancestors; and one of the books is dedicated to Manetho, the priest and champion of the grossest forms of idolatry, with a direct invocation, which ascribes to him the distinctive office of the Spirit of God. It ends with these words, a direct formal act of heathen worship of the dead:—

Grateful I offer to thee whatever through thee I have learned.
Truth I have sought at thy hand, truth have I found by thy aid.

The truth, I may add, thus discovered, answers well, like a stream, to its idolatrous fountain, since it involves the degradation of all the early books of the Bible into one tissue of deceptive and lying fable.

I feel bound, now, by a sense of public duty, to join my protest with your own against the Resolution to which you allude. It may be right and desirable for private members of the Alliance, who have received personal kindness or courtesy from the Baron or his family, to express their sympathy and condolence in an hour of sorrow, in whatever terms Christian fidelity will allow. But the acts of public bodies are bound by the laws of their own constitution, and a reference to their own distinct object. No one, so far as I know, of late years, has laboured with equal weight of character and acquired influence, or with more openness of statement, to root out from the minds of educated men all faith in one main truth, which forms part of the very basis of the Alliance, the inspiration and Divine authority of the word of God. Even the Vice-Principal of Lampeter hints that there may be some want of taste in the strength and plainness of his invectives against it: "When he asks, How long shall we bear this fiction of an external revelation? &c., some will think the language too vehement for good taste." But if the Baron's invectives against the basis of the Alliance, in the view of his warmest admirer, are too vehement for good taste, then the Committee, in merely "not expressing concurrence in all his theological opinions," use language quite unbecoming their character as public witnesses for the truth of God. When I remember that the whole drift of his later work, which in the obituary he regrets not having lived to finish, is a direct assault on the foremost truth the Alliance was expressly formed to bear witness to and defend, I confess that the terms of the Resolution, in the actual crisis now impending over the whole Church, remind me strongly of the two hundred men from Jerusalem, who went out of complaisance along with Absalom: "And they went in their simplicity, and they knew not anything." For myself, while I cling to the hope you have also expressed with regard to the personal faith Baron Bunsen might still retain, I must disclaim all concurrence in the published Resolution. If the Baron, in his lifetime, has shown favour to the Alliance, I see no alternative that can explain it, in the face of his writings, but great ignorance of its constitution, or gross hypocrisy. The former is probably the true explanation. He read its documents, it is likely, as he read the Bible, through the spectacles of some favourite hypothesis of his own; and its basis, of course, was just as open as the Books of Moses to a philosophical and non-natural interpretation.

But I do not think it safe, or wise, or seasonable, for the Alliance to diverge from its proper public objects, to utter worthless compliments over the grave of one of the most able, zealous, and outspoken assailants and calumniators of the truth it has pledged itself to defend. The private virtues of the deceased are only one reason the more for a faithful warning against that precipitous and downward path in which he has laboured to seduce his fellow-Christians. And the only language which, for myself, I can adopt as the proper and adequate expression of my feelings and judgment, with reference to the spirit pervadi-these works, must be borrowed from that law of God which is so deformed and mangled by his unbelieving theories: "Neither shalt thou bring the accursed thing into thy house, lest thou be a cursed thing like it; but thou shalt utterly detest it and utterly abhor it; FOR IT IS A CURSED THING."

I remain, yours respectfully,
T. R. BIRKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Bedwell-park, Jan. 24, 1861.

Sir Culling Eardley presents his Christian regards to the Editor, and requests the insertion, as early as possible, of the accompanying copy of a letter which he has addressed to Mr. Birks, in reply to his communication:—

Bedwell-park, Hatfield, Jan. 21, 1861.

My dear Birks,—I am sure that everything you do is done from a desire to glorify God. But will you pardon me for expostulating with you for writing as you have done to the Record?

When your dear father-in-law, Edward Bickersteth, died, from love to his memory, as well as from esteem to yourself, you were unanimously chosen to succeed him as one of the Honorary Secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance. We all feel that your personal excellence and literary talents do honour to the Alliance; but I am sure you will be the first to admit, that to be thus selected by the representatives of the Evangelical Church of your country was an honour to the person so chosen.

Was it right for one so honoured with the confidence of his brethren to take the step which you have taken?—taken, I am convinced, under a sense of duty—but taken, I am equally persuaded, without adequately realising the gravity of the proceeding.

Without communicating with your colleagues in office, or asking them or the Committee of the Alliance for explanation, you have addressed a strong letter of censure to a public journal, in reference to the minute adopted on the death of Baron de Bunsen.

I deny in the first place that there was anything in the minute to deserve your reproof. Here it is; and I must add it is the only document for which the Alliance is responsible. The passage from a letter, or article, on Baron de Bunsen's last hours, upon which the Record and yourself have commented, was only a matter of intelligence in a magazine, published on the responsibility of the editor, and was not an official expression.

Extract from the Monthly Intelligencer, January, 1861:—

"THE LATE BARON DE BUNSEN.—The following resolution of condolence with the bereaved family of this distinguished man was adopted:—

"Resolved—That this Committee have heard with deep and sincere regret of the death of that distinguished Christian statesman and man of letters, the Baron de Bunsen, and desire the chairman to communicate to his bereaved family their heartfelt sympathy in their affliction. Without expressing their concurrence in all the theological views of Baron de Bunsen, the Committee would express their sense of the personal excellence in all the relations of life of that distinguished man, and of the warm affection which he at all times manifested towards the true servants of God, of every sect and nation.

"The Committee would also record their grateful recollection of the deep interest which the deceased Baron took in the Berlin Conference of 1857, and the readiness with which he responded to the call of his Sovereign the King of Prussia, to be present on that occasion."

The minute was purposely so worded as to avoid committing us to objectionable views contained in Baron de Bunsen's critical works.

The Alliance had found him an ever ready friend of religious liberty, to whom we never appealed in vain, in his public capacity, to obtain redress for grievances; he came, too, at the summons of the King of Prussia, to Berlin, in 1857, to be present at the Conference; and though he was not—and consistently with some of his opinions could not be—a member of the Alliance, he did there in the most public manner evince his sympathy with and love towards the assembled Evangelical piety of Christendom.

I say we were justified as a body in paying a tribute of respect to such a man. We said nothing of him as a teacher; and there was not one of us who would have consented to do so. We said nothing of his possessing saving faith—though, for one, I entertain the confident belief, founded mainly on the information of others, but partly also on my own limited intercourse with him, that Baron de Bunsen, with all his serious intellectual errors (for such I deem them), was a child of God, resting upon his Saviour's Cross. But what we did say was, that he was a man of personal excellence in the relations of life, and a Christian statesman.

By that expression I am prepared to stand. If you will ask the diplomatic body of London, many of whom would naturally dislike his doing so, they would tell you that no public man ever more thoroughly carried publicly avowed Christian motives into public life. And surely no one who, like yourself, is prepared to call any sovereign who may come to the throne of England, "religious and gracious," can object, a fortiori, to our calling such a man as Baron de Bunsen a Christian statesman. There is a very clear and definite sense in which, even apart from personal piety, public characters who strive to rule their lives by Christian principle are entitled to that epithet.

This is my first ground: I deny the justice of the censure you have pronounced on the minute of the Alliance. But even if censure had been ever so legitimate, I must end as I began, by expressing regret that the first thing which a committee hear of the dissent of their own trusted officer from a portion of their proceedings, should be through a public print. Had you communicated in the first instance with your colleagues, I cannot but think that the explanations which you would have received would have given a different colour to your public expressions. As it is, I anticipate that you will feel, on reflection, that you have not done justice to a body which reposed in you their affectionate confidence, and whose act you have placed before the Christian public in an undeservedly unfavourable light.

You will, I am certain, pardon the frankness with which I write. It is of the essence of the Alliance that when we think a friend wrong we say so, affectionately, but freely. I should have preferred only addressing you privately, but the publicity of your animadversions on the Alliance necessitates the publication of my reply. It shall not, however, appear till Friday next, in order that, if you wish to do so, you may be able to reply to me in the interval.

Sincerely trusting that, if our lives are spared, we may long work together for a cause equally dear to you and to me, believe me to be, my dear Birks, faithfully yours,

C. E. EARDLEY.

Rev. T. R. Birks.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Kelshall, Jan. 26.

Sir,—Will you have the kindness to insert the enclosed reply to Sir Culling Eardley's letter.

Yours respectfully, T. R. BIRKS.

My dear Sir Culling,—Your letter was given me by our friend, Dr. Schmettau, on Tuesday evening, at Bath, where I was attending a meeting of the Alliance. From its first sentences I inferred that it was simply your private friendly remonstrance on the too abrupt appearance of my letter, and delayed reading and answering it till my return home should give me an hour's leisure, which the journey would not allow. I fully expected that my letter would draw some observations from you publicly, in reply; but I confess that I regret the shape they have assumed, and which a short note might perhaps have led you to avoid, if I had not assumed too hastily that it was simply a private letter. My reason is, that you have mingled a question of grave public duty with one which is purely personal. There was no case why any vindication of a public act which you thought it right to offer should be contingent on my approval or reply; and the expostulations of private friendship for acts conceived to be ungracious or ungrateful, carry most weight when they are simply private, and not followed by a notice of their intended publication.

First of all, in justice to myself, I must, with great reluctance, offer a few remarks upon this private and personal question. You seem to feel that I have both acted rashly, and also been ungrateful for the honour conferred upon me, and the confidence reposed, as an Honorary Secretary of the Alliance. I must remind you, then, of one or two circumstances which may have passed from your memory. When, after the death of my beloved father-in-law, nearly eleven years ago, the Council of the Alliance kindly invited me to fill his vacant office, I felt, of course, that it was merely an affectionate tribute to their high sense of his worth and labours in their cause, and that this motive might be in danger of leading them to sacrifice the real interests of the Alliance to their wish to show honour to one whose memory was justly dear to them. I therefore declined their request, and suggested two or three names of those who might, I conceived, be able to render them more active and efficient service. My objections were overruled, and the offer was renewed. While grateful for their confidence in myself, and still more for their affection to my beloved father-in-law, I felt that my own refusal, and their renewed request, had placed the relation in its proper light. However mistaken their estimate might be, I inferred that they acted as conscientious trustees of a great cause, and not from the mere impulse of a personal feeling toward a departed friend. Since then, I have once or twice renewed my request that, with their enlarged and altered membership, they would see whether they could not replace me, as Honorary Secretary, by some one more fully qualified for the post, and who would be able to render them help more efficient than my own. I have, therefore, from the first, received it as a trust, tendered to me, however mistakenly it may have been, on public grounds, which I was bound to fulfil, to the best of my ability, on public grounds also, and never to allow mere personal feelings to have more weight than my convictions of what was due to Christian fidelity, the real interests of the cause of Christian union, and, above all, the honour of Christ our Lord, who counts it a great sin whenever His servants are not "valiant for the truth upon the earth."

In the present instance, I was not aware that such a Resolution had been proposed, till I saw it in Christendom. I was grieved to see it, and thought it an act of extreme indiscretion, to use a gentle term. When, however, it was brought into public notice, and strongly, but temperately, condemned in a paper widely circulated amongst Evangelical Churchmen, some action on my part was almost necessary. Twice or three times, when in former days the Christian Observer or the Record have blamed the Alliance, or some of its acts, I have written in its defence. If I had approved the Resolution, the office of defending it before Evangelical Churchmen, would naturally have devolved upon me. To be the medium communication, of sympathy, or of explanation, between them and the Alliance, appears to me to be precisely the task which the title of Honorary Secretary calls me to fulfil. But since I strongly disapproved the Resolution, it seemed equally my duty to be a witness to the Alliance itself, or its Committee, of the extensive alteration of confidence, on the part of Evangelical Churchmen, which it was likely to produce. Even this was not my strongest or most urgent motive for writing at once. Through the kind urgency of an honoured friend, and no consciousness of special fitness for the task, I have now held, for near four years, the responsible office of an Examining Chaplain. This promotion has increased that responsibility. I did not think it consistent with my duty to the Church of Christ in general, or specially to the Church of England, that I should continue identified for weeks or months with the language of the Resolution, when my own convictions and feelings were widely different. I thought, and still think, that the simplest and shortest course was the wisest and the best—frankly, and without delay, to express my entire dissent, and to give some plain reasons why I believed the words in question to be “quite unbecoming the character of witnesses for the truth of God.” I think that I have done this without the least discourtesy. My conscience bears me witness that I have done it in sincere and hearty friendship, not only to yourself and the Committee, but to the cause of the Alliance.

I now dismiss this personal question, which ought never, I think, to have been imported into a discussion so grave and weighty—namely, what position the Alliance ought to maintain with reference to the advancing tide of semi-infidel delusion, and whether the terms of the Resolution were consistent with fidelity to the cause of Christian truth. I did hope that it was merely through ignorance of Baron Bunsen's writings the Resolution had passed in its actual form. I am grieved to see that you defend it, and seem not to feel, even now, the moral incongruity of this lukewarm, timorously-worded allusion, to a series of systematic assaults on some of the main truths embodied in the basis of the Alliance.

And first let me correct the mistake into which you seem to have fallen, that my censure applied rather to the obituary notice than to the Resolution itself. I did not touch at all upon that notice, except to quote from it an important fact, that the works in question were Baron Bunsen's latest occupation, for which he wished his life to be spared, I have been accustomed, like yourself, to regard him as personally a pious and Christian man. After what I have read, I find it much harder than before to retain the impression; but I cling to it still. The obituary has not deepened it, but it has not destroyed it. The anomalies of the human mind, especially in German philosophers, are inscrutable. But I regret that a discussion on the secret state of the heart, which belongs to the Searcher of hearts alone, should be mixed up with a question which rests on distinct public grounds. For this, after all, is the simple question: Does the character of Baron Bunsen's latest writings make it wise, or safe, or seasonable for the Evangelical Alliance to step out of its course to express regret for the premature close of his literary labours, and gratitude for his services to the cause of Christ?

First. I deny that it was right or wise to offer any such address of condolence. You could not express your full and honest convictions without changing your intended act of courtesy and condolence into something approaching to insult and reckless intrusion on an hour of sorrow. You could not simply condole without hiding your convictions out of sight, and exposing yourselves to the charge, either of hypocrisy or dangerous indifference to fatal error. Therefore, silence was the only wise and safe course; while sympathy in sorrow, from those who had received courtesies, might be rendered in a private way. Your Resolution, to be a true reflex of what you feel, or ought to feel, should have run nearly as follows: “That the Committee have heard, with mingled feelings of the death of that distinguished statesman and man of letters, Baron Bunsen. That while they unanimously disapprove and regret, and some of them deplore and detest, the tendency of his latest works, and are thankful that he has been hindered, by death, from completing them, they regret the sorrow of his bereaved family, and tender them their heartfelt sympathy in their heavy loss. That while they believe those writings, in their tendency, to be fatal to the existence of the Alliance, they cherish a grateful sense of the services he rendered to its members at the time of the Berlin Conferences, and his sympathy with the cause of religious liberty.” What would the world or the Church say to a condolence of this chequered character? Would they not condemn it as a needless and unnatural intrusion on the hours of domestic affliction? The truth lies plainly within a narrow compass. If you were to express fully your own honest convictions, you ceased to condole; and if you resolved to condole, without turning a tribute of respect into an insulting intrusion, you ceased to be honest.

The Resolution expresses regret for the Baron's decease. On what, I ask, is this founded? Clearly not upon any doubts that some members of the Committee might feel on the question of Baron Bunsen's personal piety. That would turn the whole into an act of gratuitous cruelty. It could not be based on the suspension of his labours as a statesman, for he had long retired from public life. It could not be for premature and early death, for he had reached, I believe, nearly the full age of man. The only sensible construction must be that you regretted the interruption of his literary labours, which continued to the last. But what an anomaly is this! You regret that his life is cut short before he had time to complete works which are adapted to lead thousands and tens of thousands into utter unbelief of the Word of God. You regret that the battering-rams are left unfinished, which have already aimed heavy blows against the towers and even the strong foundations of the Church of Christ. Far from regretting his death, except as a domestic sorrow, I hold it a mercy to the Church, and if he were, as I hope, on the foundation, a mercy to himself, that he was thus hindered from piling up more wood, hay, and stubble, to the increase of humiliation and sorrow in the day of Christ.

You remark, further, that the Resolution was so worded as to avoid committing you to objectionable views contained in the Baron's critical works. I reply that the words are exactly such as each of us might apply to the other, or either of us to Dr. Steane, or Dr. Steane to each of us; or, in short, say Christian to any other, however intimate his friendship, however extensive his concurrence, however high his admiration of the Christian tone of his writings. The terms which you allude to, as shielding the Resolution from just censure, are precisely those which, in my judgment, form its decisive condemnation. A person, not perhaps a murderer, but a manslayer, acting under some strange hallucination, strikes a dagger to the heart of your dearest friend. He dies without expressing repentance for the act, and you condole with his friends in these words: "Without expressing concurrence in all his past actions, we wish to express our sense of his honesty and private virtues, and that he once helped to provide us with a pleasant lodging." Is this kindness to the friend whose life he has taken? How, then, as a Christian man, to whom the Word of God and the honour of His truth ought to be dearer than the dearest earthly friend, can you find it in your heart to vindicate the wording of the Resolution?

I could say much more, but perhaps I have said enough in a case which, to myself and many others, seems clear and self-evident. May the Lord give grace to the Committee so to act as to repair that breach in the confidence of their fellow-Christians which has been caused by this great indiscretion. Having also written privately, I send this direct to the press, as the simplest course, and remain, my dear Sir Culling, Yours, with hearty Christian esteem, T. R. BIRKS.

Sir Culling E. Kardley, Bart.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Sir,—You will much oblige me by inserting the enclosed letter to Mr. Birks, which I hope will terminate the discussion. I am, Sir, your faithful servant,
C. E. KARDLEY.

14, Upper Grosvenor-street, Jan. 31, 1861.

My dear Birks,—I will not prolong the discussion.

You thought the Committee of the Alliance wrong in publishing a certain Resolution. We thought you wrong in appealing to the public before first appealing to your own Committee.

The Committee have shown by their minute* that nothing was further from their intentions than to make light of theological error. You have kindly stated in your letter that your motive was one of "sincere and hearty friendship to the Alliance." We are bound to accept your assurance, and you and others will equally accept ours.

In closing this controversy, however, I feel it due to the Committee of the Alliance to say, that never was there a body of men more thoroughly imbued with the desire to defer to one another. Had you, or any other member, expressed any objection, at the time, to the form of the Resolution which has occasioned such excitement, I am certain that every regard would have been shown to your convictions. A printed paper of agenda is sent round some days before the monthly Committee. The minutes on each important subject are drafted by a previous sub-committee. It is impossible to take greater pains than are taken to ascertain the mind of our members. The object is to do nothing on which we are not all more or less agreed; and I can only suggest, for the future, that if any subject is down on the business-paper which seems to any of our friends to be one of delicacy or of danger, the plain course for them will be either to make a point of attending, or to ensure the attendance of another who will represent their wishes.

It is evident from what has passed that the action of the Alliance is of great importance, for good or for evil, to the Church of God; and I only hope that members of Committee will in future practise the greatest vigilance, so as to render it as beneficial as possible. We had not, as I have said, the remotest intention or idea, on the recent occasion, of thinking lightly of doctrinal errors, and, by mutual and affectionate watchfulness, I hope we shall henceforward be guarded against even the liability of being either suspected or blamed.

Believe me, my dear friend, faithfully yours,
Rev. T. R. Birks. C. E. KARDLEY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Paris, Feb. 2, 1861.

Sir,—I claim from your impartiality that you will insert an answer to the numerous attacks made upon me in your periodical on the occasion of the narrative of Baron Bunsen's death, which

* The minute here referred to was adopted at a special meeting, Jan. 29. We have not room to insert it, but it may be seen in the Monthly Intelligencer for February.

150 CORRESPONDENCE OCCASIONED BY THE DEATH OF BARON DE BUNSEN.

I have made in the Revue Chrétienne, and which has been repeated in the Times.

My answer shall be brief. Your paper has gone to the length of saying that that narrative was a deplorable proof of the Rationalism which preys upon the Churches of France. If it be so, how can that narrative have been repeated by all the Evangelical periodicals of my country? The writer of the paper is constrained to acknowledge that I have clearly indicated my dissent from the theological views contained in the last works of Baron Bunsen, a dissent with which I had acquainted him, and which he had received with that liberal-mindedness which his detractors would do well to imitate. I assert the impossibility of discovering in my writings a single line which is opposed to the fundamental truths of Christianity. I am a friend and promoter of the Evangelical Alliance in my country; and this fact indicates clearly enough what are my theological views. But party spirit overlooks such considerations as these, and it magnifies differences on secondary points into dangerous heresies. If one is guilty of Rationalism in blessing God, that a man distinguished by the heart and the understanding has been above all human systems, when he was about to appear before God, and with his last breath, has expressed his most sincere love to our God and Saviour, I confess myself guilty of such Rationalism, and I would not exchange it for the so-called fidelity which deems it fit to criticise a deathbed, and which argues upon the last words of M. de Bunsen, and the impressions which they have made upon me, either with acrimony, or with unbecoming scurrility. I know that in another paper extracted from the Union the Record has announced that my admiration for the Christian death of M. de Bunsen will cost me dear, and that, at my deathbed, the anguish of my soul will chastise my Rationalism. For my part, if misled by narrow-mindedness, I had been unfortunate enough to disregard the work of God in one of its most impressive and solemn manifestations—if I had been unfortunate enough to appear to grieve at that which rejoices the angels—that would be a distressing thought at my death-bed.

I do not incriminate your newspaper; but I protest energetically against the unjust accusations preferred against me by some of your contributors. I am not the only one who has been wounded at heart by those angry polemics upon a tomb scarcely closed. I will no longer protract them. I will never persuade myself that fidelity to truth commands to renounce justice and charity.

With much esteem, I remain, Sir,

Yours very truly,

EDMOND DE PRESSENSÉ.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Sir,—Will you kindly insert the enclosed letter from Sir Culling Eardley, with my reply? I would fain hope, from his very frank explanation, that the clouds will pass away; and perhaps, through the mercy of God, after this short troubling of the waters, the Alliance itself may attain a larger measure of healing virtue than before. But the Great Physician alone can restore perfect harmony, either to his erring Church or to this sin-distracted world.

Yours ever,

T. R. BIRKS.

14, Upper Grosvenor-street, W., Feb. 8, 1861.

My dear Birks,—Thank you for appreciating my endeavours to terminate the controversy about the Alliance. I was glad to find that you thought it would not be necessary for you to say more, except possibly to state that you were not connected with Evangelical Christendom, of which you were once nominally on the editorial staff.

I am happy to say, it is arranged that in future there shall be no possibility of misapprehension about the connexion of the Alliance with Evangelical Christendom. Words on the title-page, which seemed to imply our responsibility, the editors will remove. And the report of Alliance proceedings will in future be prepared by the official secretaries and separately inserted; with the notification, that for that part of the magazine, and for that alone, the Alliance is answerable.

And now allow me to fulfil what I feel to be a personal duty.

When the Resolution which has occasioned such discussion was passed, I had not seen the "Oxford Essays and Reviews," nor was I aware that Baron de Bunsen was quoted in that volume as their chief authority.

I knew that while Baron de Bunsen's devotional works (and his piety too) were highly esteemed by the Evangelical men of Germany, his critical and theological works were considered there the contrary to profound; and I believed the slight disavowal of participation in his views, contained in our Resolution, to be amply sufficient.

Since hearing from you I have procured that book of essays, and it is upon my conscience to say that, had I seen it before, I would certainly not have been a party to the Resolution in the form in which it was adopted.

Englishmen of character, of high station, and of supposed theological knowledge, have popularised Baron de Bunsen's opinions in England, making them the foundation for a systematic attack on the faith of the Gospel. Comparatively harmless, as I have been assured, in Germany, those opinions, I entertain no doubt whatever, are calculated to do an infinity of mischief, in the form and under the auspices under which they are presented to England. Had I known what I now know, I would not have even seemed to endorse such a fatal movement in the high places of the Church of England.

I still think the distinction between Christian statesmanship, which we asserted, and Christian doctrine, which we never dreamed of asserting, is one capable of being defended. But with what I know, I consider that we were unintentionally dropping a lighted match too near a powder magazine to be safe, when we resolved as we did.

It is not too late to tread out the flames; and I hope that, in answer to the universal prayer by which this year was inaugurated, God will enable all His faithful servants to unite in doing so.

Believe me, faithfully yours,

(Signed)

C. E. EARDLEY.

Rev. T. R. Birks.

Kelshall, Feb. 9, 1861.

My dear Sir Culling.—I thank you most sincerely and heartily for your letter just received. At the present moment, it is all that I could expect, and nearly all that I could desire, personally, on your own part, to explain what is past, and to restore that mutual confidence among the friends of the Alliance which is essential to its existence. I thank God for the candour with which you avow your previous unacquaintance with that aspect of the subject which weighed the most powerfully from the first on my own mind. I believe that your letter will not only raise you higher, personally, in the esteem of many Christian friends, but do much to dispel the alarm which has been widely spread by the late Resolution, and to show the substantial unity of faith, purpose, and Christian feeling among the great body of the members of the Alliance, which the discussion, while it lasted, must have tended to conceal and obscure. Not one, I believe, of those who silently disapproved, or openly condemned the Resolution, doubted the Christian singleness of heart of those by whom it was passed, or suspected them of a deliberate intention to desert their own basis, or lend their countenance to attacks on the truth and authority of the Bible. For myself, no suspicion of that sort could ever cross my mind. My view from the first has been, that a natural and approvable desire to show Christian courtesy, and express sympathy with a private sorrow, being joined with ignorance of facts highly important to be known, or a defective sense of their present bearing on the cause of truth, had led them to do an act, the inevitable tendency of which, under the actual circumstances, they would themselves, with fuller knowledge, and after due reflection, be among the first to deplore. Their second Resolution, then, in my humble opinion, was quite beside the mark, except as it proved the wish to conciliate; and it leaves room, on the part of the Committee, for a more effectual remedy to be applied to a serious danger. I rely on the practical good sense, the Christian integrity, and the mutual forbearance and love of the members of the Committee to provide that remedy. I had resolved not to embarrass them by any public disapproval of the second minute, since I could scarcely doubt that the silent course of events, the expressed opinions of others, and their own mature reflection, would lead to a more satisfactory issue.

Your letter, so welcome and cheering, so frank and candid in its tone, relieves me from this state of ambiguous silence. I believe that it will do very much to restore the Alliance to the place we are both equally anxious it should occupy in the confidence of Christian men. It is in this alone, under God, that its strength lies, far more than in its actual membership. Its members and officers formally disclaim the pretension to be official representatives of the Churches or bodies to which they belong. But so long as it possesses, by mingled uprightness of aim and practical discretion, the general confidence of the servants of Christ throughout the land, the Evangelical Alliance may not only do a quiet and constant work of love, but may, from time to time, afford a rallying point of great value, in the double warfare against superstition and unbelief. Thousands, I believe, whose sympathy and confidence are most to be desired, and who have been pained by the Resolution, will cordially recognise the Christian sincerity, and self-denial for the truth's sake, which have dictated your present letter. They will thank God from their hearts, who can overrule smaller evils for greater good; and who can secure, even by "negligences" of His servants on one side, or "ignorances" on another, that a standard shall be held up impartially for Christian truth and Christian love.

On one point I wish to offer a personal explanation. No one, I think, will be surprised that a line in an agenda paper, on the other side of a printed call to a meeting I could not attend, should have escaped notice, if it arrived safe, amongst other occupation. But it may have seemed strange that a whole fortnight should pass, and my public letter appear suddenly, without previous warning. The fact is, that, being occupied with the study of Baron Bunsen's "Egypt," with a view to provide some antidote for the wide and deep mischief I feared, I did not read through the periodicals. It was on the 10th, if my memory is right, the day when I was at Islington, that it came first under my notice. On the 11th, Friday, I could not decide what I ought to do, since I thought the entire oblivion, if it were possible, might be the least evil. On the next day I saw it noticed publicly in the Record. I waited till the Sabbath was over, that I might act deliberately; but my conviction was clear at once, especially since I was an Examining Chaplain, and an ordination near at hand, that a prompt disclaimer of concurrence, publicly made, with reasons assigned, was due to myself, to the Alliance, and to the Church of Christ. Only a strong motive would have overcome my repugnance, or turned me aside from what I deem more important and lasting work. Having done what conscience required, I felt, perhaps, an unwise reluctance to enter at the same moment into a private correspondence, which could hardly fail to be tedious and perplexing. Had I misconceived the motives and intentions of the Committee, it would have been a plain duty first to have used private appeals, and not public remonstrance. But the act was done, and already beginning to bear fruit. There was no suspicion of wrong intention that could be removed by a private letter, but I suspected some ignorance of important facts which I was in a position to supply. If I have erred at all, it has been from no want of sincere esteem and Christian love to the Committee of the Alliance, but simply from a general backwardness to diverge from immediate work by a single step more than a pressing sense of public duty required me to do. For known or unknown faults in the manner of what I have done, I desire to be humble in the sight of God, and to ask your forgiveness, and that of the Committee, if any just occasion of offence has been given. Whatever the defects of manner may have been, I do trust that, by the blessing of God, my protest, from within the Alliance, will have averted a serious danger, both to its own prosperity, and still more to many souls imperilled by a great delusion.

Once more accept my hearty thanks for your letter, and believe me, my dear Sir Culling,

Yours, with great Christian esteem and love,

T. R. BIRKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Auckland Palace, Feb. 21, 1861.

Sir,—Though I have already written to the Committee and Secretaries of the Alliance, as soon as a copy of their last minute reached me, to express my full and cordial approval of it, both in substance and in form, I think it only right to offer them, through your columns, in which my first letter appeared, my public thanks for the Christian self-denial, uprightness, and wisdom, which have guided them in their final decision. I might probably have failed, myself, in a matter of such delicacy, to have framed a minute, in which my own judgment and feelings would so entirely concur. I thank God, from my heart, for the issue graciously vouchsafed to a discussion, while it lasted, unavoidably painful; and have a strong hope that, while the due claims of Divine truth have been maintained, mutual esteem, confidence, and love, among Christian brethren, both within and without the Alliance, will only have been increased. Let me add my special thanks to yourself for your last article, and your cordial appreciation, shared, I know, by many, of Sir Culling's letter, and believe me ever,

Yours faithfully,

T. R. BIRKS.

The following is the letter referred to in the foregoing:—

TO THE COMMITTEE AND SECRETARIES OF THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Feb. 16, 1861.

Dear Sirs and Christian Friends,—I hasten to fulfil the pleasant duty of thanking you, not merely in my own name, but in the name of thousands of Christian men, for the decision announced in your minute of the 14th. I believe it to be, under all the circumstances, an upright and Christian act, well and wisely done, "acceptable to God and approved of men." Both in its substance and in its form, and in the discrimination which right feeling required in so delicate a matter, it leaves me nothing to desire. I thank God from my heart for the grace and wisdom which I believe He has given, and would take courage in the strong hope that even by such feeble and imperfect instruments as we all are at the best, it may please Him to give Christian truth and Christian love in their inseparable union, still more abundant victories in our own hearts, in the Church of Christ, and in a sore, distracted world.

Let me add how deeply I regret that under a sense of duty, however strong and dear to my own mind, I should have been, even for a short time, in apparent collision with Christian brethren, whom I have never ceased to esteem highly in love for their work sake, whose singleness of aim is so well known to me, and so many of whom it has been, and I trust will continue to be, my privilege to number among my personal friends, as well as humble fellow-workers in a blessed and holy work of Christian love. May the God of all grace pour down His grace more abundantly upon all who touch His sacred work, that we may never profane it by unholy hands, but plead for truth in love, and follow love only in the ways of truth, and grow up together into the full and perfect unity of the body of Christ, "the blessed company of all faithful people." Praying that wisdom from on high may be given you in these critical times, in which a serious conflict for the foundations seem near at hand, and a fuller blessing than ever rest upon your efforts to maintain truth and promote union,

Believe me ever,

Yours faithfully and affectionately in Christ,

T. R. BIRKS.

Evangelical Alliance.

NOTE.—The Evangelical Alliance is responsible only for what is inserted under this head.

EVANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM.—The following minute, adopted at a meeting of the Committee of Council, held 21st February, will show the relation of the Evangelical Alliance to this journal: "A misapprehension having arisen as to the relation existing between the Evangelical Alliance and the journal entitled Evangelical Christendom, Resolved—That, in order to avoid any misunderstanding on this subject, the transactions of the Committee of Council be prepared and signed by the official secretaries, as the acts of the Committee, and copies sent for insertion in Evangelical Christendom—it being distinctly understood that the Evangelical Alliance neither has, nor ever has had, any control over, or responsibility for, the editorial department of that journal."

BARON BUNSEN.

Finding that the explanatory minute relative to Baron Bunsen adopted at a special meeting of the Committee held 20th January last (see February number of Monthly Intelligence) was found insufficient to satisfy many members and friends of the Alliance, the Committee at the monthly meeting, held February 14—present, Colonel Walker, R.A., and afterwards Sir C. E. Eardley, Bart., in the chair; also, R. C. L. Bevan, Esq., General Alexander, Rev. C. Hebert, Hudleston Stokes, Esq., Rev. Joshua Russell, John Finch, Esq., Rev. Dr. Hoby, Rev. Dr. Fry, Rev. J. H. Titcombe, Rev. Samuel Minton, Major Strath, Rev. Dr. Blackwood, Rev. P. Latrobe, H. Carre Tucker, Esq., Mr. Alderman Oldham, Rev. J. S. Jenkinson, Rev. William Bevan, Rev. Dr. Lester, W. H. Elliott, Esq., W. McArthur, Esq., Rev. W. M. Bunting, Rev. W. Cardall, Mr. J. Davis, and Rev. H. Schmettau—adopted, nem. con., the following Resolution:—

The Committee, deeply deploring the alarm and mistrust that have been caused by their minute of the 14th December last, which was happily so worded as to convey a very different impression to the minds of absent members of the Evangelical Alliance and other Christians from that which was intended in Committee—

Resolved—That, with the exception of so much of the Resolution as expresses condolence with the family of the late Baron Bunsen, and a case of his courtesy and services to the Evangelical Alliance, the said minute be rescinded.

The British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance have ever strongly felt the importance of maintaining their doctrinal basis in all its integrity; and they feel this more strongly than ever at the present crisis, when the most daring assaults are being directed at home and abroad, not only against the essential doctrines of Christianity, but also against that which is the very fountain-head of all saving truth, the Inspired Word of God.

With reference to this last-named act of the Committee on this subject, the following letter by the Rev. T. R. Birks has appeared in the Record newspaper:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Sir,—Though I have already written to the Committee and Secretaries of the Alliance, as soon as a copy of their last minute reached me, to express my full and cordial approval of it both in assurance and in form, I think it only right to offer them, through your columns, in which my first letter appeared, my public thanks for the Christian self-denial, uprightness, and wisdom, which have guided them in their final decision. I might probably have failed, myself, in a matter of such delicacy, to have framed a minute in which my own judgment and feelings would so entirely concur. I thank God, from my heart, for the issue graciously vouchsafed to a discussion, while it lasted, unavoidably painful; and have a strong hope that, while the due claims of Divine truth have been maintained, mutual esteem, confidence, and love, among Christian brethren, both within and without the Alliance, will only have been increased. Let me add my special thanks to yourself for your last article, and your cordial appreciation, shared, I know, by many, of Sir Culling's letter, and believe me ever,

Yours faithfully, T. R. BIRKS.

Auckland Palace, Feb. 21, 1861.

It is gratifying to find that there is a general concurrence in the satisfaction expressed in the above letter with the minute of 24th Feb

Many testimonies to this effect have been received. The following are extracts from official communications :—

The Jersey Committee unanimously resolved—"That this committee have learned with unfeigned satisfaction that the Committee of Council have rescinded the objectionable part of the Resolution."

The Committee of the Cheltenham Sub-Division "accepts in a spirit of Christian love the Resolution of the Committee of Council."

The Treasurer of the Guernsey Sub-Division, in a letter acknowledging the receipt of a copy of the Resolution, and stating that he will have much pleasure in laying it before the Guernsey Committee, says: "I would express my heartfelt satisfaction that the Committee should have been led to pass such a resolution. I have communicated it to as many members of our committee as I have met with, and they all express their unfeigned satisfaction at it."

In addition to these official communications, numerous letters have been received, expressing the same sentiments, from private members.

FUND FOR PRESENTING COPIES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT TO THE ITALIAN ARMY AND A POLYGLOT BIBLE TO GARIBALDI.—General Garibaldi, in an autograph letter just received, has signified his hearty willingness to receive a copy of the Holy Scriptures in various languages, which will accordingly be sent to him by post, and not by deputation. More than a sufficient amount required to carry out this part of the proposed plan has been received. Contributions are still requested to enable the Committee to present 100,000 copies of the New Testament to the troops stationed in Lombardy, Tuscany, the Legations, Naples, and we trust ere long in Rome itself.

MONTHLY INTELLIGENCER.—The following arrangements for the supply of the Monthly Intelligencer have been sanctioned by the Committee—viz., that copies of that paper be supplied to members of the Evangelical Alliance, and others subscribing not less than five shillings per annum; and to subscribers of a less amount, who, in addition, contribute one shilling per annum to defray the expense of postage, &c.

DOCTRINAL BASIS OF THE FRENCH BRANCH OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE—As some misapprehension exists regarding the basis of this branch of the Evangelical Alliance, the subjoined extract, setting forth that basis, is given from the circular of the Central Committee of the French Branch, dated "Lyons, 12th September, 1854:" "The French Branch admits as members all Christians who wish to live in brotherly love, expressing their intention to confess with it, conformably to the Scriptures inspired of God, their common faith in God the Saviour—in the Father who has loved them, and who justifies them by grace through faith in His Son—in the Son, who has redeemed them by His expiatory sacrifice—and in the Holy Spirit, the author of their regeneration and their sanctification—one God, blessed for ever, to whose glory they desire to consecrate their lives." "This short confession of faith (add the Committee of the French Branch) seems to us large enough to exclude no true Christians, and sufficiently explicit to prevent those from conscientiously signing it who do not believe the Gospel."

SPANISH PERSECUTION FUND.—A contribution of 25*l.* has been made from the funds of the Evangelical Alliance towards defraying the expenses of the legal defence of the Protestant converts, Matamoros and Alhama, who are still pining in prison. Further donations to this fund will be thankfully received.

RELIGIOUS REVIVAL AT ELBERFELD.—An extract of a letter has appeared in the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, the organ of the German Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, communicating the following interesting facts: A remarkable religious awakening has recently commenced among the children of the Town Orphanage at Elberfeld. A spirit of prayer has been poured out, and day and night the children, and some of the adult inmates, are crying for mercy. Many are seized suddenly, and are not unfrequently stricken down. Within a single week about seventy persons have been brought under the influence of this gracious movement. "Some of the children," says the writer of the letter, "are already singing hymns of praise for pardoning mercy, while others are still earnestly seeking that blessing. I am almost daily in the house, and what I hear and see there is marvellous in my eyes." In a valuable letter on this subject by the Rev. Dr. Graham are the following remarks: "So far as we can see, the movement arose out of the week of prayer, at the beginning of the present year. Elberfeld is one of the most godly districts in Germany, and has been blest with faithful ministers since the Reformation. During that week the different denominations met for common united prayer. The Orphan-house belongs to no sect, but is the common property of all. It belongs to the city, as such, and no creeds and confessions are admitted. The Bible, and the Bible alone, is the text-book of the orphans; and this common centre, where the Bible alone rules; this neutral ground, where the religious parties dare not fight, has been chosen by God for this mighty manifestation of His marvellous power. A poor Roman Catholic orphan, in one of his prayers, cried out, "O God, keep men from fighting about religion, and bring them all to the one truth, that Jesus Christ is the only Mediator and Saviour of the world."

WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER.

A very interesting letter on this subject has been received from Dr. Cappadose, dated "The Hague, Feb. 8, 1861," of which the following is the substance:—

The invitation issued by this Committee had been translated and circulated in Holland. A large and suitable room was hired for the meetings at the Hague during the week. The attendance, considerable at the first, increased every day, and comprised persons of all ranks of society—ministers of state, noblemen and ladies, working men and the poor.

"In order," says Dr. Cappadose, "to show that we were assembled as a branch of the Evangelical Alliance, I commenced by reading the nine articles of our common basis, to indicate that these our meetings would not be on a vague or merely philanthropic, but on purely Evangelical ground. During the week the sad tidings arrived that a great inundation had desolated several villages, and that the danger of greater similar calamities was imminent, which tended to quicken the prayers of the brethren.

"At length," Dr. Cappadose writes, "Saturday arrived. The following day was to be our last day of the meetings. I had no rest, and the question constantly recurred to my mind, 'Is this the time to cease our united prayer?' Fearing to do anything, simply according to my own wishes, in the early morning I prayed earnestly that the Lord would show me His will in this matter. Scarcely had I concluded prayer, when I heard knocking at my door a dear brother, who had come for the purpose of making known to me the wish of many brethren that we should not close our meetings. On the evening of Sunday, the 13th January, the hall was crowded, and many fervent prayers were poured out. Before the close, I rose and laid before those present a statement of what had occurred in the morning with reference to the continuance of our meetings.

Under the old dispensation, I said, David, desirous of knowing the will of God, consulted the ephod. I have an answer to my prayers on this subject, sufficient for myself; but perhaps some of you require more. Well, then, my friends, be yourselves now our ephod, for the Lord is in our midst. Those among you who desire to continue this prayer-meeting every Sunday evening signify that desire by rising. Every man and woman rose and responded in the most striking manner. Now we have every Sunday evening a very large public prayer-meeting."

Our friend then speaks of the religious deadness and formalism in Holland, but welcomes this occurrence as the cloud, little at present as a man's hand, which may, by God's blessing, greatly increase, till floods are poured out upon the dry ground.

In another letter received from Canada on the subject of the Special Week of Prayer, dated "Moncton, New Brunswick, Feb. 6, 1861," the writer says:—

"The week of prayer in January was experienced by me, and many others, to be so happy a season, and it was so blessed a sight to see the people of God of all denominations joining together in prayer, that a whole year seems too long a period to have to wait for the return of such a happy time."

SPECIAL WEEK OF PRAYER FUND (January 7—12, 1861).—The kind contributors to this fund will be glad to learn, from the following statement, that the expenses attending the arrangements for the Special Week of Prayer, and the holding of the central meetings, have been more than met by the collections at the meetings and donations.

Evangelical Christendom.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY AND BARON BUNSEN.

At the request of this excellent society, we subjoin their letter already published in the Record; though why they should think it incumbent on them to re-endorse their own fidelity to the truth we don't know. At least, it is a melancholy symptom of the kind of spirit which has been excited to see good men compelled to do so. But, whatever others may do, we maintain our ground, which never yet has been shaken from under us. Everybody now sees how the affair stands. In common with ourselves, and with numerous other periodicals and private Christians, the Tract Society's writer saw nothing but a remarkable obituary of an interesting kind, and did not see that it was an occasion for raking up other things. Neither would any one, if it had not been for the Record; and it certainly never entered into our minds that we were casting the slightest shadow of blame upon the Religious Tract Society.* As the Record appears to withdraw its original charge of "Antinomianism" against us, we shall not prolong the controversy. We must, however, advert in the briefest possible way to two points. In the first place, let us say that perhaps, after awhile, the Record may admit that we did not "untruly" allege anything, as it asserted we had done. This charge we showed to be utterly without foundation; and the Record, not having the courage to defend it, has not had the grace to retract it. In the next place, we must defend Mr. Jackson against the Record. He had said that "Dissenters were a people who delighted in war." The Record makes him say, Evangelical Christendom delights in war. But first, Evangelical Christendom is "a journal," and not "a people." Secondly, the Record puts into his mouth a charge against us which Mr. Jackson never made.

But since the Record has itself made this charge, we shall simply appeal to our past fourteen years of a peaceful existence spent in the untiring advocacy of Christian charity in combination with Evangelical truth; and unvaried by any embittering element until the recent groundless attack of the Record upon our orthodoxy and integrity.

Finally, the Record has called upon the Alliance Committee no longer to send its ads to this journal. We are sure that those gentlemen are competent to manage their own business without the suggestions of the Record or of any one else. They also know who have served them with fidelity and diligence hitherto. And, as the writer of these articles has been somewhat personally alluded to, he will only add a parting word. One of the earliest projectors and founders of the Evangelical Alliance, he has for fifteen years and more toiled, and travelled, and written, and spoken, and prayed for its welfare. Intimately known to all the old members, affectionately beloved by most of them, affectionately attached to them in return, feeling the love of many of them to be the sweetest cordial he has drunk on the path of his wilderness pilgrimage, what is there he would not do for them and for the cause he has so long laboured for, so dearly loved? Anything within the bounds of possibility he would do—almost anything; but two things he will not do, nor either of the two. He will never surrender the

* We take this opportunity of setting ourselves right with our valuable contemporary The News of the Churches. Let the editor of that journal be assured that the criticism to which he refers in his last number, was not aimed at him or his correspondent. It would in fact never have been made but for the circumstances under which we found the paragraph quoted in the Record. We are persuaded he sees through the attempt which is made to set us at variance with each other, as well as we do; and we have no doubt that his judgment and good feeling will be exercised, as ours also shall be, to frustrate the design.

dignity and independence of the public press with which he is entrusted; and he will never consent that any religious association of which he is an active member shall be exposed to the loss of public respect without his protest. VALETTE.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Sirs,—The attention of the Committee of the Religious Tract Society has been called to a passage in your leading article for March, in which it is said :—

"We understand that the Religious Tract Society have published similar views of the case in the Leisure Hour, quoting the testimony of M. de Pressensé, and adding of their own accord an elucidatory sentence that such was the hopeful close of a long and splendid career."

In reference to this passage I am directed by the Committee to inform you that the number of the Leisure Hour, containing in the page of varieties the extract from M. de Pressensé's letter, was completely printed a month before its publication; at a time when the letter appeared in many of the religious papers, and before public attention had been drawn to the fundamental errors in Baron Bunsen's writings, on the all-important question of the Divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures—otherwise it would have found no place in any of the society's publications. I am also directed to state that in the very brief sentences introducing and following the extract, it was not intended to express any opinion as to the interpretation which Baron Bunsen's last words might bear, and much less any approval of his theological writings and views. On these, and other kindred errors contained in the "Essays and Reviews," I am authorised to add that the Committee have entrusted the preparation of a popular work to a gentleman commanding the confidence of all Evangelical Christians.

I remain, Sirs, your obedient servant,

56, Paternoster-row, March 9.

GEORGE HENRY DAVIS, Secretary.

P.S.—As this letter cannot appear in your periodical until next month, it is deemed desirable to request its immediate insertion in the Record newspaper.

THE DIGNITY OF THE REDEEMER INFERRED FROM ANGELIC WORSHIP.

"But, all ye gods,
Adore him, who to compass all this dies!
Adore the Son, and honour him as Me."
No sooner had the Almighty ceased, but all
The multitude of Angels, with a shout,
Loud as from numbers without number, sweet
As from bless'd voices, uttering joy, Heaven rung
With jubilee, and loud Hosannas fill'd
The eternal regions. Lowly reverent,
Towards either throne they bow; and to the ground,
With solemn adoration, down they cast
Their crowns inwove with amaranth and gold.

In many passages of the Word of God the Redeemer of mankind is represented as the object of angelic worship; in none perhaps more distinctly than in that upon which we have the above Miltonic comment—"When he bringeth in the first-begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him." (Heb. i. 6.) The reader's attention is solicited to a few desultory, yet not perhaps altogether unprofitable thoughts, on this subject.

The design of the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, in its introductory portion, is to exhibit the supreme dignity of Jesus Christ; both in his personal nature as the incarnate Son of God, and in his official character as the Redeemer of men. And this is done with the ulterior view of thereby aggrandising the economy of human redemption, and of inferring its superiority to every antecedent form of revealed religion. In a few majestic opening words, the whole scheme of thought is announced which runs through the entire treatise. "God, who at sundry times, and in diverse manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath, in these last days, spoken unto us by his Son." Worthy of belief, as God's previous revelations were, and possessing an inestimable moral value, that which had now been communicated has still stronger claims on the faith of mankind, and brings them richer blessings; for while the antecedent revelations were conveyed through the medium of prophets—men inspired for the purpose—this is brought by his Son. Such is the argument; and it proceeds upon the well-understood principle, that the dignity of the messenger bespeaks the importance of the message. The dignity of the messenger is consequently the point to be established. Are there conclusive grounds for believing that he is not to be placed in the same category with inspired men: that he is, in fact, a being altogether of another kind; clothed, indeed, with a common humanity, but using it as a veil, and, under that veil, possessing and concealing the uncreated nature of the Godhead? There are; and the medium of proof selected for the purpose of showing it is his superiority to the angels. This superiority, it is argued, appears in two circumstances. It appears first in the superior position, which, now that the work of redemption is finished, the Redeemer occupies in the celestial world; and then in the fact that the angels are commanded to worship him.

The Redeemer occupies a position in the heavenly world infinitely superior to the position of the angels. "When he had by himself purged our sins, he sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high." In such a position of authority and proximity to God no other inhabitant of heaven was ever placed. It is a position implying an infinite superiority to the angels, and it is impossible that Christ should have been placed in it if he were not, in fact, and before he was placed in it, infinitely superior to them. Let it be maintained that he is only a creature, as they are creatures; that in addition to his human nature he possesses no superior, underived existence, and the superiority of his position over them is a solecism; for he, on that hypothesis, is a man, and men are confessedly inferior to angels, while we know of no created beings of higher rank than they. But if, on the other hand, it is acknowledged that the Redeemer of men is the Son of God, then he occupies the position which he alone is entitled to occupy, as he alone is capable of filling it, and which of right belongs to him. Accordingly, we are told that he is "made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they." This superiority is his birthright; it is not acquired, it is natural to him; it is not achieved, it is inherited. "For unto which of the angels said he, at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son?"

It is in harmony with the position which he occupies that the Redeemer should be the object of angelic worship; and the fact that he is, the apostle employs as another proof of his infinite superiority to them.

As created beings only can be worshippers, so an uncreated being alone can be the proper object of worship. Worship addressed to a creature is idolatry. It detracts nothing from the idolatrous nature of the worship, that the creature who is the object of it is a creature of higher rank than the worshipper. Angels have on repeated occasions refused worship from men, and the principle which led them to reject worship offered to themselves, would equally lead them to withhold worship from all other created beings. "I am thy fellow-servant," said the angel to John in Patmos; "worship God." Subordination one to another may exist, and probably does, among the angels as among men, and the sentiments which are proper to such a state; together with those external demonstrations in which they are embodied and manifested. But these are not to be confounded with worship. The Scriptures distinguish between the respect due to a fellow-creature occupying a more exalted position or sustaining a representative office, and the worship which belongs to God. But while they are familiar with this distinction, they give no countenance to the notion that there is a still further distinction in religious worship itself;—on the one hand a supreme worship which may be paid to Deity alone, and on the other a subordinate worship which may be properly paid to creatures, on the supposition that they are sufficiently exalted to be entitled to it. Civil homage is one thing, religious adoration another and essentially different thing. It is the latter which constitutes the angelic worship of Christ. It is a worship which would render them idolators if Christ is a being of a rank only some degrees higher than their own in the scale of created existence, and not a being altogether of another kind. The distance between the meanest creature and the most exalted, is a measurable distance; but the distance between the most exalted creature and an uncreated being, is immeasurable; and could not be more immeasurable if it went down to the meanest. The descent from the Divine nature to the nature of a seraph is equal to the descent of the Divine nature to the nature of a worm. In both cases it is infinite. If he who is seated at the right hand of God is not himself God; then no matter how glorious and elevated the rank he may hold in the scale of universal intelligence, he is a being infinitely inferior to God—in a word, he is a creature, and the angels are idolators when they worship him.

Besides which, on the hypothesis that the Godhead is not enshrined in the humanity of the Redeemer, the angels worship not a creature simply, but a creature whose nature is inferior to their own. And their worship in that case is gratuitous. It is rendered where no obligation has been incurred. They do not owe their existence to him, for the superior nature cannot be derived from the inferior; nor are they, like men, indebted to his redemptive work for their blessedness. Worship under such circumstances is an anomaly: it is as irrational as it is impious, as absurd as it is idolatrous. He is neither the Redeemer nor the Creator of angels; and yet angels worship him. Now that he is not their Redeemer we know, for never having sinned, they have not needed a saviour. On this ground, therefore, their worship cannot be founded, as, in part, at least, ours properly is. It must consequently rest on his deity, of which it thus becomes a logical and conclusive proof.

It enhances the argumentative value of the angelic worship of the Redeemer that it is enjoined by God. Had it flowed from some natural impulse, it might have been a mistaken impulse, for angels are not infallible—some have actually fallen—but it is based on a Divine command. “When he bringeth in the first-begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him.” The writer to the Hebrews quotes from the Septuagint version of the 97th Psalm, the Messianic character of which is acknowledged as well by Jews as by Christians. Unitarian writers have objected to the sense in which Evangelical interpreters understand the worship enjoined, contending that it means not religious worship, but only an inferior kind of homage, such as without idolatry may be paid to a creature; but there is no dispute that the injunction itself proceeds from God. On the former point nothing further need be said. After our preceding remarks, we deem ourselves warranted to take the words as intending true religious worship, the meaning universally attached to them, except when the exigencies of a theory need to be served. And then we have Jehovah, the Paternal Deity, placing the angelic occupants of the celestial world under an authoritative injunction to pay their adorations to “the first-begotten.” Their worship therefore is presented in obedience to the explicit command of the Supreme Being, and thus comes with the additional weight of that circumstance in proof of the infinite dignity of the Redeemer.

One observation more shall close these remarks. The worship which is thus enjoined is to be paid to Christ in his character and office of Redeemer. His assumption of human nature is exhibited as laying angels under an obligation to worship him. "When he bringeth in his first-begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him." It cannot be imagined that he then, for the first time, became the object of angelic worship, but that it was then placed on a new ground, and presented for an additional and new reason. Angels had worshipped before

That glorious form, that light unsufferable,
And that far-beaming blaze of majesty
Wherewith he went at Heaven's high council-table,
To sit the midst of Trinal Unity.

But they are now to worship him when that form

He laid aside; and, here with us to be,
Forsook the courts of everlasting day,
And chose with us a darksome house of mortal clay.

Possible it is for the blessed God himself, in addition to his original and natural right to the adoration of his creatures, to acquire new claims to their reverential love. And this he did when he created the world, with its multitudinous host of living creatures, and placed man, a new order of intelligence, at their head: for then "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." And so it raises no objection to his antecedent right to be worshipped by them that the angels were required to adore "the first-begotten" under his newly-assumed character, when he became incarnate.

Nor does it affect the argument whether the occasion referred to be his birth or his resurrection, and each has its advocates. Probably, as Dr. Owen* thinks, no event in particular is intended to the exclusion of others in the same series; but the whole work of God, in bringing forth the Messiah, by his conception, nativity, unction with the Spirit, resurrection, and whatever else is involved in the fulfilment of the ancient promises of Christ, is comprehended in the phrase. In the introduction of the preceding dispensation angels themselves were the principal instruments employed—"the law was ordained by angels"—but "the better covenant founded on better promises" was placed in the hands of the Son of God; and when in order to its promulgation, and not its promulgation simply, but its ratification by the judicial shedding of his sacrificial blood, he was brought into the world, that marvellous spectacle, the mystery of which attempers the majesty, and the majesty of which enhances the mystery, evoked their simultaneous adoration, and all the angels of God, now infinitely surpassed in their office as antecedently in their nature, worshipped him. It would be pertinent, were it necessary, to adduce the wonders of that night when the fields of Bethlehem were resplendent with more than the brilliancy of the noon-day sun, and the neighbouring hills echoed the sweet music of their choral song; pertinent to enumerate the manifold other instances in which during his brief sojourn on earth they ministered about his person; pertinent to speak of the offices they performed at his resurrection, and when in his ascension they convoyed him with triumphal hymns back to his everlasting throne. But our space is exhausted, and we are compelled to pass over, with this cursory allusion, all these instances of angelic homage and duty. We have room only to add this one observation more, that since he returned to that pristine glory, not as he left it, when he was simply and purely God, but with another nature and in another form as the God-man, a new element has entered into their celestial worship, and another chorus than aforetime finishes their song. For so the seer of Patmos heard them in conjunction with the elders and the living creatures, and the whole Church of the ransomed, saying with a loud voice, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power and riches, and wisdom and strength, and honour and glory, and blessing."

THE LOST TRIBES AND THE SAXONS OF THE EAST AND OF THE WEST.*

DR. MOORE informs us that the inquiry pursued in this volume was undertaken as an occasional diversion from the pressure of severer demands upon the mind, and that it formed only an incidental part of a larger investigation concerning the ethnology of the East. But, although it may have been a relaxation to him from severer studies, it will strike every reader as one which few are able to form an adequate conception of. To execute it required a well-informed and well-disciplined mind, habits of patient and diligent research, a large acquaintance with little-understood subjects, and critical faculties of no common order. We are reminded of these things at every step in the course of the argument, and we are compelled to feel that few men have the qualifications required for the successful performance of such an undertaking; yet we have admired the ingenuity and the learning of our author, his original conceptions and his extensive range, his skilful arrangement of his materials, and his singularly clear and appropriate style. Besides all this, Dr. Moore writes as a Christian, his heart is imbued with right principles, and his spirit is every way commendable. We have nothing but praise for him when we contemplate his work in a literary point of view, and when we consider the earnest and excellent tone which pervades it. We wish we could add that we think his success equal to his desire and effort to solve some of the dark problems of human history.

As suggested by the title-page, we have here an endeavour to trace the lost tribes of Israel, to discover Saxons in the East as well as in the West, to show their common origin, and to connect them with the lost tribes. The new views of Buddhism involve an attempt to find the authors of this remarkable system among the Israelites, and to derive its principles from the same source. The rock-records are curious ancient inscriptions existing in India and lands adjacent, in a strange character and language, as is usually believed, but which Dr. Moore thinks to be pure Hebrew, and translates as such. In establishing the first points, he seeks to show where the tribes went to, and how they became intermingled with certain nations of the East and West. His arguments are drawn from interpretations of certain prophecies, from certain facts recorded in ancient authors, and from the etymology of various proper names. Similar methods are adopted with regard to Buddhism; but as to the inscriptions, their elucidation requires a somewhat different course.

We shall call attention to some of the details, with a view to show why we regard the conclusions arrived at on some of these subjects as at least doubtful, and, therefore, needing to be reconsidered.

We may admit, for the argument's sake, that the ten tribes carried away captive to Assyria somewhat more than seven hundred years before Christ, did not return in their entirety to Palestine. We think they did not, and that many of them either remained in Assyria or removed to countries farther east. It has always been an interesting question what became of them. Dr. Moore thinks that in the vision of Ezekiel he finds prophetic allusions to them, which may aid us in our inquiry. We have carefully considered this vision and the interpretation proposed, and we own our inability to see that it specially predicts the fate of the ten tribes. Our difficulties are mainly two, chronological and critical. The chronological difficulty arises from the fact that the vision was not given till a later period than some of the events it is supposed to foretell. The critical difficulty is more complicated; it relates to the general interpretation of the passage, as well as to the explanation of individual words and symbols.

* The Lost Tribes and the Saxons of the East and of the West; with New Views of Buddhism, and Translations of Rock-records in India. By GEORGE MOORE, M.D. London: Longmans, 1891. 8vo.

We are not even sure that the vision is a prediction at all, and that it is not rather a symbolical representation of principles of the Divine government. Dr. Moore should have first showed that the vision was a prediction; this he has not done, and his argument is much weakened thereby. But suppose it to be a prediction, how are we to be convinced that the explanation of its terms here given is the true one? The living creatures, the wheels, and the throne, are no doubt symbolical of something, but what ground is there for limiting their reference to Israel? We believe Dr. Moore to be mistaken here, as he is certainly wrong in his explanations of some of the Hebrew words in the original; indeed, the interpretation is inconsistent with other parts of the book. Thus the whirlwind from the north, in Ezekiel i. 8, is taken to convey the idea of a vast commingling of Israel with some northern power, rushing in upon the country over which the prophet is supposed to be looking. He and his Israelitish brethren were then exiles in the valleys and hills of Mesopotamia and Media. Elsewhere we find that the northern power is the Scythians commingled with the Israelites. But as this invasion took place some thirty years before, how could it be foretold by the vision?

We must pass over other points, including the passages from Hosea, to the explanation of which here presented we have some grave objections. We therefore find no support for the author's theory in the prophecies he appeals to. But we alluded to etymologies. In one of these Jezreel is explained "the seed of God;" but this is not the meaning, for we must not discard the initial letter and the verbal form. Its literal translation is "God shall sow," which can scarcely be reconciled with the use here made of the name. Neither can we listen for a moment to the apocryphal and spurious book of Edras, which is of no authority whatever; and if it were, it records as a fact what is directly opposed to the hypothesis of Dr. Moore. It represents the tribes as going somewhere (the country of Arsareth), with the intention of serving God better; whereas Dr. Moore holds that they forthwith mixed themselves with Pagan tribes, and not long after originated Buddhism.

Among the Pagan tribes in question, our attention is invited to the Sacæ, a branch of the great Scythian family; so important, that the Persians called all the Scythians Sacæ. They are placed by ancient authors somewhere to the east of the Caspian Sea, and are mentioned by Herodotus. Dr. Moore believes that the Sacæ were so called from Isaac, a name which he tries to show was specially assumed by the ten tribes. He thinks that they (the Israelites) were called Sacæ even before they left Assyria. It may suffice to say, that of all this we find not the shadow of a proof. The whole argument here, including its details, is built upon suppositions and assumptions, and not a single undoubted fact is adduced to identify the Sacæ with Israel. When we remember that all names are formed out of a very small number of letters, we shall see how easily they may accidentally resemble each other, without the remotest connexion between them. In this case there is the highest probability that the origin of the Sacæ must be looked for at a far remoter period than the one here suggested. "A nation is not born in a day;" and the sons of Israel did not in a few years so utterly lose nearly all their characteristics, that they were universally regarded as Scythians; for this change implies change of religion and language, of customs, and of everything else which it requires ages to eradicate.

Having identified Israel with the Scythians and Sacæ, Dr. Moore proceeds to identify with the Sacæ all nations whose names bear the remotest resemblance to theirs. He goes even beyond this, as when he traces the Goths, not only to the Getae, but to the Gittites, thus making them also descended from Israel. "The Getae," he says, "are mixed up with the Sacæ, as the Gittites were with the Israelites." "The Mæ Gothic of Ulphilas's New Testament, written in the fourth century, contains Hebrew Greek, Sanskrit, and Tartar words. There were Gittites (Gethæ), men of Gath, amongst the body-guard of David." Such a style of etymological criticism is irreconcilable with all the principles of sound philology. And yet such etymologies perpetually recur. This is not all; a multitude of names of persons and places are supposed to be of Hebrew origin, because Dr. Moore fancies they can be explained as Hebrew. We say fancies, for we are quite sure that on the same principles there is no limit to such explanations. We readily admit the Eastern origin of the Saxons, and other European nations, because we believe all men have a common origin, and that an Asiatic one. But we do not believe that many of those referred to in this book are of so recent a period as is assigned to them, still less that they spring from, or are related to, the ten tribes. Take again the Budii, a Median tribe mentioned by Herodotus. Dr. Moore confounds these with the Bondini, identifies them with the Persian Putiya, and thinks them most likely Israelites. Putiya he supposes to be a Hebrew word פְּטִיָּה, which he invents, and explains "broken of God," and then he makes the Budii the same people to be בְּדִי, a name which he also invents, and explains "the separated people," afterwards identifying them with the Buddhists.

This introduces another question—What evidence have we of the Israelitish origin of Buddhism? Dr. Moore believes we have such evidence, and he endeavours to establish the fact by various considerations. Among all these his etymological theories stand prominent, and he gives us many explanations of names and words in accordance therewith. Thus, among the earliest and chief ancient seats of Buddhism, he finds Giyah and Buddha-Bamiyam. Giyah is straightway assimilated to Giah, a town in the tribe of Benjamin; and Buddha-Bamiyam is readily explained to mean "the Buddha by the waters of the sea." Beyond the form of these names, and Dr. Moore often deviates very arbitrarily from the usual modes of spelling, there is nothing in favour of his opinion. Indeed, he himself admits that Buddha-Bamiyam is an insulated mass of rock in a wide plain, not surrounded by water, but he thinks it may have been at some time. We are sorry we cannot go into the proofs of the Israelitish origin of Buddhism, and we only say that we consider them as utterly without foundation. They are at variance with all sound principles of reasoning and criticism. Ingenious we admit them to be, but partial, and often purely imaginary. Harmless they are, and sometimes even amusing, but they fail in all essential respects.

But what of the inscriptions, or rock-records, as they are called? Dr. Moore takes them to be Hebrew, and is so sure of it, that he puts many of them into Hebrew characters, divides his characters into words, and translates them into English. We believe him quite wrong as it regards these inscriptions. Let any one compare the original characters with the alphabets printed, for example, in Prinsep's "Indian Antiquities," and he will see at a glance that their affinities are not with the Shemitic. From this fact alone we should infer that the language is not Hebrew, but allied to the Sanskrit. This is not all. Some of these very inscriptions have been explained on totally different principles, as may be seen in the admirable work just referred to. Again, as we read Dr. Moore's Hebrew, we exclaim, "What Hebrew!" It is absolutely unlike anything else we have under that name, and no Hebrew scholar will hesitate to pronounce it quite at variance with the style and idiom of that language. We would undertake to make as good Hebrew out of Dr. Moore's own English, and have done it. If the English reader is unconvinced, we ask him to read Dr. Moore's English translations, and to consider whether any original composition in any language could so run counter to all the laws of thought. Having made Hebrew of his Maghada inscriptions, he had to translate them, but he has failed to make them logical, reasonable, and consistent. The work was possible, or it would not have been done, but it is none the less a failure, and the new version fails to represent the doctrines of Buddhism, as will be seen by referring for a moment to such works as Hardy's "Manual of Buddhism."

We are very anxious not to misrepresent Dr. Moore, and yet not to mislead the mere English reader. We therefore make a few statements which we can substantiate; and referring to one inscription in particular, that of Gîrnar (pp. 270-283, and p. 393, &c.) This inscription has been read and translated as Sanskrit by James Prinsep and Professor H. H. Wilson, and their translations agree in all essential points with one another. Dr. Moore reads and renders it as Hebrew, but to do this he puts an arbitrary power upon some letters; his division into words is arbitrary; these words are some of them new; they are often strange, and bear novel meanings; the arrangement is not in harmony with the Hebrew language; the selection of words is not in accordance with extant Hebrew writings; the use of grammatical forms is perplexed and unnatural; the succession of ideas is also unnatural and illogical; the translation is forced, and does not represent the so-called Hebrew, which gives no intelligible meaning; the original characters are not Shemitic; they read in the contrary direction. As we do not pretend to understand the original, we only remark that out of sixty-four Hebrew letters Dr. Moore makes twenty-two Hebrew words, which is too few, in accordance with all we know of the language; and of his twenty-two Hebrew words he makes eighty-five English, which is far too many, or far more than would be required for real Hebrew. We have tried in vain to make any sense of his Hebrew by a literal translation, and we believe it impossible. We have tried passages of the Hebrew Bible and found it perfectly easy. Thus Proverbs xv. 1, 2, can be rendered, "Answer soft will avert anger, and a word harsh will arouse wrath: Tongue of the wise will use well knowledge, and mouth of fools will utter folly." Now if we try the same number of words from the beginning of the Gîrnar inscription, by the aid of a Hebrew lexicon, we have, "the waters, their blood, to me, my mouth (a false form), their judgment (a doubtful form), my mouth, a hin, calamity, there is, my lamp, behold (their enlightenment is not a translation), she going, (the next word, which is rendered 'diligently persuade them,' is not Hebrew), Dan, arose, because, (the next word is fictitious)." This is nonsense and not Hebrew, and nothing but force can make Hebrew out of it. However, we give a few lines of Dr. Moore's English, including this portion, and it will be seen what he has made out of it:—

The waters are my worship, my DAMMA, my doctrine!

The mouth of Ruin hath pleaded their cause,

Destruction hath become their enlightenment.

Go forth, diligently persuade them;

O Dan, arise for their overthrow;

My doctrine hath broken the Arab in pieces,

The day of affliction is become the season of life;

He heareth the stroke of his ruin;

Your trial shall be a life of fatness.

He heareth I make Destruction Life;

The mouth of Ruin hath pleaded their cause,

Destruction hath become a friend,

His breaking to pieces I have made thy fruition,

He heareth the Almighty Lord of the dead;

The mouth of Ruin hath pleaded their cause,

Destruction hath become thier enlightenment.

O people, forget the fatted bull!

The mouth of Ruin hath decided THEIR cause

Whose Destruction hath become their enlightenment,

The endurance thereof shall be even renown;

Their doctrine is established by that which dismayed me;

Calamity [Su] hath brought down the years of the Arab;

Calamity [Su] hath set up the mouth of uncleanness.

The reader must not put faith in these translations,

Here we close for lack of space, and not of matter. We thank Dr. Moore for the curious information he gives us in his very interesting book, but we are compelled to say, after repeated examination of it, that its principles are not established.

Foreign Intelligence.

We have the pleasure of laying before our readers a second letter from the Geneva Evangelical Alliance Committee, containing the programme of the approaching Conference to be held in that city, and fixing the time. We are sure it will be read with great interest.

The quarrel between the French Emperor and the Romish clergy of France deepens and spreads. They see his determination to strip the Pope of his temporal power, and are no doubt apprehensive, and justly so, that his authority will eventually be altogether superseded, by the Emperor placing himself at the head of the Gallican Church. Hence their exasperation knows no bounds. Our readers will find some pertinent observations on this subject, and some startling disclosures of priestly wickedness, in our French letter.

Our German correspondent devotes the first half of his letter to the controversy which has arisen on the death of Baron von Bunsen. Although we have ourselves, in a preceding article, taken leave of that subject, we have not deemed it right to suppress the remarks of an independent foreign observer, whose name, were we to mention it, would on all hands be admitted to be that of one of the most highly esteemed, best informed, and thoroughly Evangelical of the Protestant ministers of the Continent. Other communications, to the same effect, we have received from other continental correspondents—one especially from a professor of theology, who occupied a prominent place in the Berlin Conference, who is respected in this country, as well as in his own, for his sound orthodoxy and sound learning, and who knew intimately the manner of life and conversation of Baron Bunsen; but, for the present at least, we withhold them.

Two of our correspondents, the Frankfort friend already referred to, and another, send us detailed accounts of a most extraordinary religious awakening, attended with physical phenomena, in a large orphan asylum at Elberfeld. The circumstances have created a great sensation, not in that town only, but, by means of the press, throughout Germany. We direct attention to their letters.

In addition to long and graphic descriptions of the work of God, as it is spreading in Sweden, we this month lay before our readers a paper on the progress of the mission in Lapland, which will communicate information as interesting as it is little known.

Further intelligence will be found from Italy. In the solemn and large responsibilities which devolve upon the Evangelical Christians of that country, and upon our countrymen also who dwell among them, we commend them all to the grace of God, praying that "nothing may be done through strife or vain glory, but that in lowliness of mind each may esteem other better than themselves, looking not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others."

Turkey, Persia, India, and Western Africa send us letters which will well repay perusal.

APPROACHING CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS OF ALL NATIONS AT GENEVA.

(The following Circular has just been issued.)

THE Committee of the Evangelical Alliance of Geneva to the members of the Alliance in all parts of the world, and to all true Christians, salutation, grace and peace from God our Father and our Lord Jesus Christ.

Beloved Brethren in Christ,—In our previous Circular, dated 14th February, 1860, we expressed, in reply to the demand which had been addressed to us by brethren of different countries, our desire to see a General Assembly of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva in 1861, similar to those which had been held in London, Paris, and Berlin; we avowed the motives which seemed to warrant this desire, and encouraged us to attempt its realisation; and, remembering the faith which unites us, on the ground of our common Christianity, where we would wish firmly to remain, we invited you to come to us, honouring and rejoicing us with your presence and brotherly meeting.

We have received many answers from different countries and Churches, and it has been pleasant to us to see the affectionate eagerness with which our proposal has been received. In view of these manifestations, we may be permitted to hope that our assemblies, under the Divine blessing of the Head of the Church, our beloved and Almighty Saviour, will be the efficacious means of confirming the faith of Christians, of exciting their joy and hope, of rekindling the love which ought to unite us all in one body, and of exhibiting, before the world, a testimony to the mercy of our God, and the power of His Holy Spirit.

We wish now to remind you of our invitation, more definitely to fix the time and duration of our conferences, and to indicate the subjects which will be submitted to our deliberations, together with the names of the brethren who will introduce them by written papers.

If, at all times, and in all circumstances, it is good for brethren to meet together for prayer and conversation on the great interests of the kingdom of Christ, is not this more important than ever in the present time? On the one hand, the greatest events are occurring or are imminent in Europe, America, and Asia: the political future of the nations appears charged with clouds, while we are unable to see to what destiny the Lord would conduct His people; on the other, the struggle between light and darkness is fiercer than ever. Religious wants are felt everywhere, new life is waking up in various parts, many souls are sighing after the truth or are rejoicing at having found it; whilst sin, moral corruption, the spirit of error and falsehood, are redoubling their efforts and changing their forms to carry on the conflict with greater success. You will believe, as we do, how necessary it is that those who belong to Christ, and who wish to work with Him, should know one another, and count up their numbers; you will feel that all the quickening influences of Christianity, instead of remaining in a paralysing isolation, ought to be brought together, and to sustain each other; you will feel that this holy gathering ought to be encouraged by all means, and that the fraternal meeting, which the goodness of our God permits us to appoint, may be for the entire Church of Christ, as it will certainly be for us, so weak a portion of it, an occasion of revival and new vigour in the work of the Gospel, and in conflict under the banner of our Saviour. Not only do we invite the members of the Evangelical Alliance, but all Christians, of every nation, of all languages, and from every Church, one with us in the faith of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the living and true God.

Although we may be dispersed over many countries, and belong to different denominations, as there is a spiritual union amongst us, and it would be sweet and salutary to taste it and manifest it in our assemblies. In order to this end, two things are necessary; first, there should be constant prayer that the Lord may be with us, and by His Holy Spirit make us indeed one body; then, we ought to exercise great vigilance over ourselves, so as to live in a spirit of humility, concord, and love, in spite of secondary disagreements.

Our meetings will commence (D.V.) on Monday, September 2, and will occupy ten entire days, with one meeting in the morning and another in the afternoon. Those in the morning will be devoted to the discussion of particular subjects; and those of the afternoon will be employed, generally, about various parts of the Gospel field. Each subject will be introduced by a written paper; then the first speaker will open the discussion, in which all present may take part. The written papers must not take up more than three-quarters of an hour in delivery, the discourse of the first speakers not more than twenty-five minutes; those who follow are earnestly requested to restrict themselves to a quarter of an hour each.

As a religious meeting of the Canton of Geneva will take place on Thursday, the 5th of September, we have not arranged any session for the morning of that day.

On Sunday, the 1st of September, we shall have a meeting for prayer to implore the Lord's blessing on the conferences.

We also hope that the brethren who will meet in our assemblies will take the Lord's supper together on some day to be fixed hereafter. The following is the programme of our meetings, the subjects which will be discussed; the names of those who will introduce them, and the principal speakers who will open the discussions:—

Monday, Sept. 2nd.—Morning.—Opening meeting. Opening address by the President of the French Branch; addresses by the presidents or delegates of the several sections; salutations from other brethren. Concluding address by Pastor Barde, Geneva.

Afternoon.—The Sabbath, and the best means of promoting its sanctification. Paper by Professor Godet, Neufchâtel. First speaker—Pastor Fr. Coulin, Geneva.

Tuesday, Sept. 3rd.—Morning.—On the means which wisdom and experience indicate as the only efficacious remedy for the evils which result from the want of religious life and the state of immorality which prevails amongst a large proportion of our population. Paper by Professor Rosseeuw St. Hilaire, Paris.

[It is hoped that this subject will be discussed for each country by a special speaker; especially for England and Germany.]

Afternoon.—Mission work amongst the heathen, since the Conference at Berlin. Paper by M. Christ, President of the Society of Missions, Baale. First speaker—Pastor L. Bridel, Vaud.

Wednesday, Sept. 4th.—Morning.—Critical examination of the present scepticism of France. Paper by M. Ernest Naville, Geneva. First speaker—Pastor Bastie, France.

Afternoon.—Israel and Jesus Christ. Paper by Dr. Cappadose, Holland. First speaker—M. William Pétavel, Neufchâtel.—Dr. Gausson, Geneva, has not been able to engage to speak, on account of the state of his health.

Thursday, Sept. 5th.—(No meeting in the morning.) Afternoon.—Italian meeting. Italy and the Gospel. Paper by Pastor Meille, Turin. First speaker—Professor Mazzarella, Bologna. Italian or French spoken at pleasure.

Friday, Sept. 6th.—Morning.—The character of the Reformation and of the Reformer of Geneva. Paper by Dr. Merle D'Aubigné, Geneva. First speaker—Professor Herzog, Erlangen.

Afternoon.—Sunday-schools. Paper by Rev. J. C. Fletcher, New York. First speaker—Pastor Paul Cook, Calais.

Saturday, Sept. 7th.—Morning.—Religious liberty considered as the guarantee of the order and peace of States. Paper by Pastor E. De Pressensé, Paris. First speaker—Pastor Viguet, Geneva.

Afternoon.—American meeting (in English). Influence of civil and religious liberty on the Catholicism of the United States. Speaker—Rev. Dr. Baird, New York.

Monday, Sept. 9th.—Morning.—English meeting. On the future of the colonies of the Anglo-Saxon race, with a view to the dissemination of Evangelical Christianity throughout the whole world, and the means of insuring its success.

Afternoon.—The religious condition of the people of Eastern Europe and Western Asia. Speakers—M. Fred. Rougemont, Neufchâtel; Pastor Monsell, Ireland.

[The names of those who will principally conduct the morning meeting, selected from amongst our brethren of England, Scotland, and Ireland, shall be given hereafter.]

Tuesday, Sept. 10th.—Morning.—The importance of union between doctrine and life, in order to the prosperity of the Church. Paper by Pastor Bauty (Vaud). First speaker—Pastor Grandpierre, Paris.

Afternoon.—The religious movement in Germany since the Conference of Berlin. Paper by Pastor L. Bonnet, Frankfort. Chief speaker—Professor Tholuck, Halle.

Wednesday, Sept. 11th.—Morning.—Meeting reserved for German Switzerland. What are the principal points in which the Rationalism of the present day, particularly that of German Switzerland, is opposed to Evangelical Christianity? Paper by Professor Biggenbach (Bâle).

Afternoon.—Meeting reserved for Germany. The arrangements will be completed shortly. The German language will be used in the two meetings of this day.

Thursday, Sept. 12th.—Morning.—On Christian brotherhood and the characteristics which should distinguish controversy among Christians. Paper by M. Agénor de Gasparin, France. First speaker—Pastor Tournier, Geneva.

Afternoon.—Revivals. Paper by Pastor Anet, Belgium. Chief speaker—Pastor Fred Monod, Paris.

Meeting for Prayer and Farewells.

We hope that several brethren from other countries will take part in the discussion many have already, at our request, promised their presence, to which we attach much value.

We beg all those of our friends who accept our invitation, to let us know without delay, so that we may be ready to fulfil the duties of hospitality.

Gentlemen and beloved Brethren, receive, with our present appeal, the assurance of our devotion and of our affection to our blessed Saviour.

In the name of the Geneva Committee of the Evangelical Alliance,
President—J. ADRIEN NAVILLE,
Secretary—DAVID TISSOT.

FRANCE.

Paris, March, 1861.

THE GREAT QUESTION OF THE DAY FOR FRANCE.

The materials for the composition of my letter are abundant; for, during the last few weeks, the subject which has most engaged public opinion, concerns the relations of the French Government with the Papacy—a religious question no less than a political one. Never, for many long years, has religion occupied so large a share of attention in the legislative assemblies, in the pamphlets and newspapers, in the conversation of people of the world, everywhere. Every one feels that he has in this subject a vital interest.

In England, the solution of this problem appears to you very simple, and indeed it is so for Protestants. Let the principle of non-intervention be applied to Rome, as to the rest of Italy, and let the Pope be hurled from his temporal throne, if no longer upheld in it by his own subjects. This mode of action would be complete and decisive; but the majority of Frenchmen, notwithstanding their want of true piety, are Roman Catholics by birth and by profession, and desire to remain so. They have, unhappily, too little religious conviction to embrace the Protestant faith. The question, therefore, to them, becomes very difficult and complex. Were the Pope to lose his temporal sovereignty, would he preserve his spiritual independence? And, should he cease to be independent, could he remain at the head of Roman Catholicity?

This is not all. The various political parties in their turn take part in the quarrel. Thus the Legitimists, or partisans of the Pretender Henry V.,—who include in their ranks the majority of the aristocratic families—maintain and ardour the cause of the Papacy, in the hope of thereby finding means of restoring the inheritance of the old Bourbons. Several, even, of the Orleanists, although Voltaireans rather than Romanists, have ranged themselves under the clerical standard, from a spirit of opposition to Napoleon III. and the dynasty of the Bonapartes. If we add together the bishops, the devotees, the Legitimists, the Orleanists, and certain persons who, in a spirit of extreme conservatism, fear the least change, we shall have a large mass of influential persons; and this fact sufficiently explains why the majority in the Senate against the proposition originated by the prelates has been so weak. Our senators have good places and good incomes, and their greatest dread would be the opening any door to new revolutions. They demand the status quo, not from zeal for the Papacy, but from regard to their own interests.

The most intimate friends of the Emperor, and amongst them Prince Napoleon, have openly declared in favour of Italian nationality, and have not hesitated to affirm that if the temporal authority of Pius IX. be incompatible with it, that authority ought to be sacrificed. Their language has been energetic and courageous. They perfectly comprehend that the whole body of the Romish priesthood, from the Pontiff himself to the most insignificant country curé, have become the implacable enemies of Napoleon III., and that they will despoil him of his crown, if they can but find a fitting opportunity. In reality, as I have more than once intimated, there exists, between the Papal clergy and the Napoleonic family, a radical opposition in spirit, sentiments, principles, and object. This antagonism has been successfully disguised for some years by mutual artifices; but it must break forth sooner or later. Louis Napoleon has been raised to the throne by universal suffrage; he represents, of necessity, the national will, and the great maxims of 1789—equality, liberty, and modern right. He has been able, for some time, to wield a tyrannical dictatorship; nevertheless, he is a new man, a new prince, the elect of the people, and he cannot be unfaithful to his origin without exposing himself to destruction. The priests and monks, on the other hand, represent the old regime, with all its abuses and all its inequalities; they treat the people like sheep, destined only to obey their masters.

they detest liberty, and destroy it wherever they are strongest. How can agreement subsist between tendencies so opposite? Either the Roman clergy must overthrow the Emperor, or the Emperor must confine the clergy to their purely spiritual functions. The struggle is inevitable. That is the question.

Napoleon III. has too much sagacity to ignore the true state of things. He has been lavish of compliments, of money, of honours, and favours to the priests, but has still followed his own course. Now war is openly declared. The organs of the Jesuitical faction loudly proclaim that they have been deceived and duped. They thought to have at their disposal a royal tool, who would submit himself to all their exactions; in other words, they dreamed of the realisation of their own ideal—the priest, accompanied by the soldier, holding the curbed populations under a double yoke: this is what they call the true Catholic and Christian policy. Their illusions have been dispelled, and they utter cries of indignation.

The Emperor will, without doubt, pass through critical moments. Nevertheless, if he marches with a firm step along the route on which he has entered, he may reckon on the support of the enlightened and liberal classes. A remarkable change has been effected in public opinion since the campaign of Italy. If Napoleon III. have lost some of his former partisans, he has gained others, and in greater number. The France of 1789 will not succumb.

ATTITUDE AND LANGUAGE OF THE FRENCH CARDINALS IN THE SENATE.

I have already referred to the debate which took place in the Senate previous to voting the Address. This debate, and those of the Chamber of Deputies, have excited throughout the country the most lively interest. For nearly ten years the political tribune has been mute. The Legislative Chambers debated behind thick walls, and the nation no longer heard their voice. This melancholy silence has, all at once, been replaced by brilliant oratorical contests. You will judge whether the French have been content with this display. But I must specially indicate the part played by the Cardinals in the debates of the Senate. This high assembly includes five princes of the Roman Church, according to their official titles, MM. de Bonald, Morlet, Matthieu, Donnet, and Gousset. The Imperial Constitution has made them senators de jure. Their position is analogous to that of your Bishops in the House of Lords. Naturally these eminent ecclesiastical personages were called upon to defend the temporal authority and the conduct of the Court of Rome. They have not been wanting in the discharge of this arduous obligation. Each has in succession taken part in the debate. But they have received a most humiliating check. Their speeches have been adjudged weak, their arguments puerile, their language vulgar. All have come short of the mission which they had to fulfil. A remarkable circumstance! The laity, who have pleaded in the Senate for the cause of the Pope—MM. de Larocquejacquelin and Barthe, for example—have far excelled the Cardinals; they have evinced a more perfect comprehension of the question, a closer logic, and greater powers of elocution. The Cardinals have put forth reasons so insufficient, so superannuated, and in so poor a style, that, notwithstanding the respect with which their sacerdotal character is invested, the Senate had not patience to hear them to the end. Their speeches were twenty times interrupted by the noise of private conversation, and they underwent the annoyance of resuming their seats without having produced any other impression than that of universal weakness. Unhappy princes of Romanism!

Whence, then, comes their extreme inferiority in a serious debate? The answer would be too long. I content myself with remarking that these reverend personages have generally received a very bad education. Imprisoned in seminaries from their infancy, and instructed by professors who have falsified history, morality, and politics, and who reproduce in barbarous Latin the scholastic theology of the middle ages, they have no solid knowledge, either of the past or of the present. Their ignorance is prodigious. They have not the slightest comprehension of modern ideas and modern facts. Accustomed in the discharge of their pastoral office, never to meet with contradiction, and to speak ex cathedra, as if they were infallible, they are very disconcerted and embarrassed when they find themselves face to face with adversaries who are enlightened, and ready to refute them. They then no longer dare to launch forth their ordinary invective because they would be immediately called to order; and being deprived of the source of those declamations, in which they stigmatise the men of our epoch as children of Satan, they become insignificant and tame.

I believe that the Emperor has done ill service to the Cardinals by appointing them senators. The Pope himself, were he to speak in one of our political assemblies, would expose himself to mockery and contempt. The priests are very logical when they demand that liberty of opinion should be suppressed, at least on ecclesiastical matters. A secret instinct forewarns them that they are incapable of supporting the weight of an unreserved and searching discussion.

LETTERS OF THE BISHOPS AND OTHER PAMPHLETS.

As we are now in Lent, the bishops have published their annual pastoral letters. Here the prelates stand upon their own ground. They have no longer to fear a direct contradiction. These mandates are read from the pulpits by the vicars and curés, and the faithful must listen silently to the episcopal remonstrances as to the words of a master, the very oracles of God!

Moreover, our bishops have availed themselves largely of their privilege. They have all this year chosen for the theme of their labarations the misfortunes of the Papacy, the perils of the Roman Church, the crimes of the Italians, the infernal spirit of the Revolutionists, and other subjects of the same kind. This is political retrogression disguised under the cloak of religion, and the language of hatred under the pretence of serving the interests of piety.

Three bishops, those of Montauban, of Orleans, and of Poitiers, have particularly signalled themselves in this Papistic crusade. The Bishop of Montauban has a special mania; he cannot publish an official letter without violently attacking liberty of conscience and of worship. In his esteem, intolerance, and the persecution of heretics, are sacred dogmas. He highly approves the establishment of the "Holy Office," and all the measures adopted in past ages to exterminate the adversaries of Rome. This honest prelate does not sufficiently remember, or, possibly, recollects too well, that he writes in a city which was formerly the metropolis of French Protestantism, and which is still inhabited by numerous Protestants. His apologies for persecution might awaken bitter recollection; but his argument is so puerile, and his style so dull, that it excites pity rather than resentment.

The Bishop of Orleans, M. Dupanloup, is a writer much more distinguished; his is perhaps, at this time, the most skilful pen of the French episcopate. He has replied to the celebrated pamphlet of the Viscount de la Guéronnière upon "France, Rome, and Italy." M. Dupanloup does not confine himself to justifying the conduct of the Pontifical See; he boldly assumes the offensive, and accuses the Imperial Government of a guilty connivance with Piedmont. To this fiery prelate there is no ground for hesitation, no difficulty. The Pope must be maintained, at any price, in the possession of his States. The twenty-five millions of Italians who call for national unity and liberty, are nothing in comparison with him; the subjects of the Pontifical States have no rights, and are hardly human beings. The vicar of Jesus Christ upon earth must guard his temporal domain in the name of all laws, Divine and human. This is very well; the quarrel is simplified by the method of M. Dupanloup. Only it remains to be ascertained whether Italy, France, and Europe acknowledge the Pope as the delegated representative of God, and whether the word of the Pope is really the expression of the will of God. The Romanists have a singular method of procedure; they lay down as an incontestible truth the very thing that is disputed.

The palm of this controversy belongs to M. Pie, Bishop of Poitiers, not because he has the most talent, but because he is the most violent. M. Pie compares (in an allusion very transparent) Napoleon III. to Pontius Pilate. The governor of Judea, yielding to the clamours of the multitude, directs water to be brought to him, washes his hands, and says: "I am innocent of the blood of this just person." "Wash thy hands, O Pilate!" cries the prelate, "declare thyself innocent of the death of Christ. Thy name will be branded with the stigma of infamy, and nailed to the pillory of our Symbol. Who is the man thus denounced to the most remote generations of posterity? It is not Herod, nor Caiaphas, nor Judas, nor any of the Jewish or Roman executioners. This man is Pontius Pilate, and that denunciation is just. Herod, Caiaphas, Judas, and the rest, had their share in the crime, but nothing could have been finally accomplished without Pilate." I repeat it, every reader has mentally placed the name of Napoleon III. beneath the biblical quotation of M. Pie. This was decidedly too great a piece of insolence. The letter of the Bishop of Orleans has been submitted to the Council of State as a defamatory libel, and will undergo a judicial investigation.

Amongst the other pamphlets called forth by present circumstances, the most remarkable is that which bears the signature of M. Louis Veuillot. That old editor of the Univers has lost none of his violence, or of his strong language. He pretends that Cain—yes Cain—is the author of all that has taken place in Italy!! How is this? The connexion is perfectly evident: the events of Italy are the fruits of the revolution of 1789: the revolution is the daughter of Protestantism, and Protestantism is the realised idea of Cain! And what would become of the world without the Pope? It would relapse into paganism, and would submit anew to the yoke of Nero! "Were the Pope to leave the world into which he has entered under Nero (this is St. Peter, apparently) this very day, absolute evil would resume its supremacy, as under Nero; and the human race, immersed in blood and uncleanness, would complain that it was perishing too slowly." Thus speaks M. Louis Veuillot. A Parisian journal takes this occasion of inquiring for what idiots a man so spiritual has written these sickening absurdities, these enormous puerilities? The question is just.

SENTENCE OF SIX YEARS' IMPRISONMENT ON A ROMANIST PREBENDARY.

I hasten to another subject. For some time past, certain scandalous affairs, in which priests and monks are implicated, have been made public before the judicial tribunals. Public opinion has been by these facts strongly excited. It is no longer a question of obtaining an inheritance by fraud, as in the case of the Abbé Bernard, who had extorted a fortune of 250,000*fr.* (see my last letter, page 128). The accusations are still more grave, and of such a nature that it is almost impossible to state them. Brother Agathon, a member of the "congregation of Christian doctrine," has been condemned, for infamous crimes, to fifteen years at the galleys. The brother director, and another brother, have fled from justice. But the trial which has made most noise has been that of the Prebendary Mallet, on whom the judges have inflicted the penalty of six years' imprisonment.

This Prebendary Mallet was a priest at Cambray, in the department of the North (du Nord). He was connected with a certain Abbé Ratisbonne, who is the director of an establishment for converted Jews at Paris. Unquestionably it is very proper to labour for the conversion of the Jews, and there is nothing to hinder the opening of an asylum for their benefit; but the Abbé Ratisbonne and Prebendary Mallet have done something else. There were five young girls of an Israelitish family named Bluth. The father was a humble schoolmaster, who did wrong by placing too much confidence in the priests. Four of these young girls were received into the asylum of M. Ratisbonne. The eldest, called Sionna, was then sent into the house of Prebendary Mallet. What there passed between them? The judicial proceedings have disclosed it—it is horrible! To be brief, Sionna became an idiot. Her sister Elizabeth was enticed into the same house; she also became the victim of abominable seduction, and was, in her turn, attacked by mental aberration. The third sister Theresa has disappeared. It is a very sink of iniquities!

The fact which has most revolted public opinion is the system of mental reservations, negations, and falsehoods employed by the priests, monks, and nuns who were called as witnesses. These personages regard themselves as being above the law and even the most common feelings of decency. They have seen nothing—heard nothing! The scenes that have passed under their eyes they are not acquainted with! One young girl journeys from convent to convent under fictitious names, and justice cannot discover her track. The abbesses of these convents know not what has become of her! A vicar-general of Cambray declares that he has never heard a single word unfavourable to the morals of the Prebendary Mallet, whilst for years his detestable conduct has been the talk of the whole city. This system of premeditated and obstinate imposture has excited to the highest degree the indignation of the people. Are not all families in danger, if corrupt priests can, under pious pretexts, carry off children, expose them to the most shameful seductions and conspiracies, cause them to disappear in convents, and then defy judicial pursuit? Let the Romish clergy beware! the renewal of such scenes would infallibly provoke terrible reprisals.

DEATH OF THE AGED PASTOR, M. MARZIALS, PRESIDENT OF THE CONSISTORY OF MONTAUBAN.

French Protestantism has sustained some severe and deeply-felt trials. Some of its most excellent pastors, such as MM. Brun and Maynadier, have recently been called from this world. I regret not to have space for biographical notices of these men; but I cannot pass by in silence the death of M. Marzials—that venerated pastor who has, for forty years, presided over the Consistory of Mentauban. His name is perhaps known to you. He was intimately connected with the brothers Haldane, when they came on an evangelizing mission into France and Switzerland. His son, M. Theophilus Marzials, is the present pastor of the French Church in London, and walks worthily in the way of the Gospel. M. Marzials, the father, who died in his 82nd year, was one of the last surviving representatives of our old Huguenots. Having completed his studies at the commencement of this century, he had given the hand of fellowship to the heroic pastors of the wilderness, who had passed through times of persecution, and it was by them that he was set apart to the sacred ministry. His convictions fully accorded with the doctrines of our Confession of Faith, drawn up by Calvin, and he remained faithful to it to his latest breath. In vain did new theories arise around him: having laid his foundation on the rock, he calmly contemplated the unstable inventions of the human imagination, and continued to proclaim all those truths which are revealed. Never did doubt trouble his mind—never did he relax in his pastoral activity. To this unshaken piety he joined a most affectionate and amiable character. One might have applied to him what St. Paul wrote respecting brotherly love: "Charity is not easily provoked—charity thinketh no evil . . .

beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." (1 Col. xiii., 5, 7.) His labours have been attended by abundant blessings. M. Marzials was one of the first to establish Bible Societies in our country, and he has taken part in all our Christian institutions. His last days have been, like his whole life, calm, serene, joyous, and full of the presence of the Lord. He bore testimony, on his dying bed, to the grace of the Divine Master whom he had so faithfully served. Now, alas! his place is empty, and who shall fill it?

DEMONSTRATIONS OF THE PROTESTANTS IN FAVOUR OF THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF SYNODS.

There are other facts in our Churches worthy of notice. The question of the re-establishment of our ancient ecclesiastical constitution continues to occupy the columns of our Protestant journals. Serious men are more and more becoming convinced that the convocation of a national synod is necessary to the restoration of regular order amongst us. Many partisans of the new theology, M. Reville amongst others, and the editors of Le Lien, the journal of the liberal party, are of the same opinion. This is a good sign for the realisation of our hopes. It is probable that this subject will be discussed at the approaching period of our religious anniversaries.

GERMANY.

BARON VON BUNSEN—A RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT AT ELBERFELD.

I cannot begin this letter without expressing the deep regret which I have felt at the strange controversy which has been raised against you and against the Evangelical Alliance on the subject of Baron von Bunsen. What is really the point at issue? Bunsen's theological works? The historical and critical theories that he hazarded? The errors into which he fell? No! The question relates to Bunsen himself, his personal piety, and his wholly Christian death. And because the touching religious indications of that death-bed convalesced and rejoiced his friends, because the committee of a great religious association expressed to a family in sorrow their mournful sympathy on the death of that eminent man, behold, men are to be found who make the sincerity of their zeal to consist in raising, beside that scarcely erected tomb, an inquisitorial tribunal to judge the deceased! They draw up an indictment in due form, they scan the words of the dying man, his heart's utterances of faith and confidence in Jesus Christ his Saviour, of hope and reliance upon the grace of God! And what is their verdict? Not exactly that he is excluded from salvation, but most certainly that all this is not sufficient to justify the sympathies of those by whom he was known and loved! That even all this does not suffice to warrant the friends of Bunsen in designating him a "Christian statesman!"

We have no wish, on our part, to suspect the intentions of brethren who have believed it their duty to raise this sad controversy around a tomb; we acknowledge the sincerity of their zeal for that which appears to them to be the truth; and if we had here to examine the historical and theological works of the learned writer, we should combat the errors they contain with as much energy and severity as his warmest opponents. But once more, that is not the question. And even in the interest of the holy cause of Christianity, we warn these inexorable judges, that their orthodoxy, without charity or humanity, is no more Christian truth than a lifeless statue is a man. We warn them that their orthodoxy, which they confound with piety, and which makes salvation dependent upon the results, more or less accurate, of scientific investigation, will serve the Rationalism of Oxford much more than all the errors of Bunsen. If proof of this be required, it is to be found in the theological history of Germany. It is this same orthodoxy which, during the last century, persecuted Spener and Pietism, Zinzendorf and the Moravian Church, and which has called into existence German Rationalism. This it is which, in our own day, with its semi-Catholic Confessionalism, is provoking throughout Germany a universal reaction in favour of that same Rationalism, which a generous, liberal, expansive, and scriptural theology had banished from all our universities. England, we fear, is about to undergo some such bitter experience, and nothing will contribute to it more powerfully than the theological school represented by the Record.

We also could produce most convincing evidence of the vital and personal Christian piety of Bunsen, during the latter years of his life even; but in connexion with such a controversy, we should regard the process of proof as unworthy of him and his memory. And on this account we prefer to maintain "a mournful silence!"

REVIVAL AT ELBERFELD.

We turn to another subject. A wholly unexpected occurrence of a religious character has produced a veritable storm in one of our great industrial towns upon the Rhine, and the commotion has been dwelt upon by the press throughout Germany with a sad mixture of ignorance and prejudice. Here are some of the principal facts, as they are related by a person in a position to make him well acquainted with them, and who is himself favourable to this astonishing movement.

There is at Elberfeld, in Rhenish Prussia, an orphan asylum, which is a municipal establishment, and which contains, at the present time, 295 children, of various ages, and belonging to different communions (Protestant and Roman Catholic). In this house a movement has commenced, the nature of which cannot, at present, be fully estimated, the immediate and ultimate results of which are known only to God. On the 13th of January, during the present year, the last day of the week of prayer, which called together Christians in every country, one of the elder girls in the Elberfeld Asylum went, during the hour of recreation, to the head master, overwhelmed with intense spiritual anguish. He pointed her to the Saviour, and assured her that from Him she might obtain peace and pardon. She became more calm, and prayed fervently during the whole week ensuing. She then found peace and joy.

Another girl next asked to speak to the head master; she also informed him of the distress which she had experienced on account of her sins, and begged his permission to retire, every evening, into an unoccupied room, in order that she might pray alone. Gradually this became the experience of a number of girls in the establishment.

On the 28th of January, during the evening meal, the master was called to a boy, who was seated upon the stairs, crying aloud, "Blessed Saviour, pardon my sins!" "God would have all of you prostrate yourselves before him thus!" said the master to the children, who came running to the spot. He then took the youth to his own apartment, as well as two others, who were weeping for their sins, and prayed with them.

At the same time, four young people met in a bath-room, and cried to the Lord for mercy. After going to bed, as they could not sleep, they arose and went into the school-room, where they passed the night in prayer. Next day they patiently endured the ridicule indulged in by their companions, and continued in prayer and singing hymns, whenever the duties of the school left them at liberty. They were soon joined by seven other youths, who underwent the same experience, and implored the aid of the Spirit of God.

In a meeting which they had with the master on the 31st of January, a child, ten years of age, said: "You know that hypocrisy is a great sin, for it is written, that hypocrites shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven. I beg all those who are not sincere to withdraw." Not one retired. Then a youth, aged fourteen, uttered a fervent prayer. The Scriptures were read and several children spoke, laying open before God the state of their hearts.

There was another prayer-meeting, at which more than sixty orphans were present. On this occasion, a youth of fourteen, who until then had ridiculed the revival, saying, "Though they should be all converted, they won't convert me!" went to bed early, making the remark, "I shall sleep soundly while the rest are praying." But he could obtain no rest. Learning that his most intimate friends had joined the prayer-meeting, he said, "I am half inclined to break my resolution." He rose and went down into a sort of washhouse, where the others were at prayer. He fell on his knees in great anguish, weeping and crying, and was seized with convulsions so violent that he had to be carried to his bed. On the next day his resistance was overcome, but he was still without faith, and sighed after peace with God. The masters and the children met around his bed, praying, singing hymns, and reading to him passages from the Bible. He mentioned portions of Scripture which he wished to hear, among others the 23rd Psalm. He then repeated a hymn which expressed his reliance upon Jesus. At length he went to sleep, and next day his distress gave place to a peace which has never left him since. This conversion made a great impression upon the orphans, several more of whom joined the little flock.

On the evening of the 2nd February, there was a meeting for prayer and thanksgiving for the outpouring of the Spirit of God. Besides the masters and other adults, about 120 children were present. Several engaged in prayer, among them being the youth whose conversion we have just related, and who thanked God for his marvellous recovery. The movement now extended, always accompanied by the same characteristics, to a great number of other children, especially among the girls. After the meeting in the evening, all over the house there was heard, at very advanced hours in the night, weeping, singing, and prayer. The meeting in the evening of next day, Sunday, February 3, was followed by the same manifestations, and for days and weeks subsequently, boys on the one side, and girls on the other, frequently assembled, in little groups, to pray and sing hymns. At length nearly all the orphans in the house experienced, in various degrees, a powerful impression from the revival.

Unfortunately, the case of the youth whom we have seen, suffered violent convulsions, and did not stand alone. Several others became really excited, fell sick, and had convulsions. They, however, always retained their presence of mind, and requested that the masters and their converted companions should pray with them, and afford them consolation by reading the Word of God.

But at this point there arose an opposition. The thing had naturally made a noise among the public. The town council, to whom the asylum is subject, and which is composed, it would seem, of men but little capable of judging of such religious phenomena, ordered an inquiry, at the close of which the head master and other persons employed in the house were suspended from their functions. The matter was even carried before the President of the province, and this was the signal for a flood of newspaper articles, filled, for the most part, with ignorant assertions, abuse, and calumny. Throughout Germany it is the subject of conversation. At Elberfeld and elsewhere, these occurrences have divided public opinion into two very clearly defined sections: on the one hand, there are religiously enlightened and pious men, who see the work of God in this movement; on the other, there are people of the world, who see in it only an outburst of fanaticism.

Those who look at these things from a distance, and judge them calmly by the light of Scripture, and who have been rendered familiar, by the history of God's kingdom, with revivals of this nature, cannot doubt that they indicate the influence of the Holy Spirit; for the means employed by the masters are only the Word of God and prayer, and the results are, in general, repentance and the conversion of souls to the Lord Jesus. The question is asked, indeed, till the receipt of more ample information, if there has been in the direction of the movement all the wisdom and moderation which is desirable. In an excitement of this kind among children, we can easily imagine a nervous contagion, which requires to be so controlled that the moral action of the heart and conscience may, as far as possible, alone present itself.

But that which proves that this is a real revival is that it is not confined to the Orphan Asylum, to Elberfeld, nor to children. The latest accounts inform us that the movement is spreading in various other localities, and among all classes of persons. We shall have occasion to return to it. God grant that it may be to prove, to the glory of His grace, that it is a powerful work of conversion and vital religion!

PRUSSIA.

EXTRAORDINARY AWAKENING IN THE ORPHAN-HOUSE, ELBERFELD.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Sirs,—Your readers will doubtless have heard of the remarkable awakening among the children of the Orphan-house at Elberfeld, during the months of January and February. It ought to be noticed that it commenced immediately after the prayer week in January, invitations to which had been circulated by the Evangelical Alliance all over the continent of Europe. From many parts of the world have we received communications about the blessed results of that week of prayer; but in no instance has the Lord so wonderfully manifested Himself as the hearer and answerer of prayer, as in the case of Elberfeld. The earnest and believing supplication was there at once answered by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon a large number of orphans, such as has seldom been witnessed in Germany. As soon, however, as it became known that this gracious work of the Spirit was accompanied, in many instances, with bodily convulsions and prostrations, a party arose in Elberfeld, who insisted on the town council appointing a committee to investigate the case. In consequence of a preliminary conference, the superintendent of the Orphan-house, Mr. Klug, was suspended from his office, on account of his having transgressed against the order and regulations of the establishment, in meeting for prayer with the inmates at unreasonable hours. This is the sole charge brought against this excellent man, for which he is temporarily suspended; while the committee, under the presidency of a Royal Commissary, is further investigating into the cause of the movement. The enemies of religion, not satisfied with this, have spread throughout Germany false reports about the movement, representing it as the result of the excitement and fanaticism of the superintendent. It is deeply to be regretted, that even papers like the Kreuz Zeitung, which is characterised for its respect and due appreciation of religious matters, have been misled for a time by the enemies of the truth. The following two letters, however, addressed to the Kreuz Zeitung, which I give you in translation, will put the question in its true light before your readers; and I need not ask them that they will fervently beseech the Lord to perfect the work which He has so graciously commenced in the children, to purify it more and more from all human infirmities, and to establish them in their faith, so that His holy name may be exalted, and the gainsayers convinced.

HERMANN SCHMETTAU.

Elberfeld, March 6.

We will not begin with the Evangelical Alliance, or with their invitation to united prayer; but we must, nevertheless, especially remark that the ten to nineteen adults who assembled for prayer during that week in January, did not exhibit the character of those large assemblies; and though meeting for the same object, they represented more the picture of a praying family. The children were excluded from it. Very soon after, a little girl reported herself to the Superintendent, and desired to speak to him about the state of her soul. The first child was followed by many more, so that, by the 30th of January, the movement appeared to be an extraordinary one. It had hitherto been limited to the spiritual state of the children. They were under a strong conviction of sin, and sought through united prayer (for which purpose a room was set apart for them), and by reading the Word of God, to obtain peace, and were directed in this by the Superintendent.

On the 31st of January, convulsions appeared for the first time in a boy, who until then had been very obstinate. The Superintendent had held a prayer meeting, which he had been requested to do by the children, and the choice of those who should take part in it was left to them. After the prayer meeting, the boy, who had ridiculed the seriously impressed children, became much disquieted. He hastened to a cellar, which is a free and spacious place, and found children already there, who were on their knees praying for him. At the sight of this he was immediately seized with convulsions, which returned at intervals. On the 1st of February the movement mostly affected the girls. On the evening of the following day the Superintendent held a prayer meeting, where the number of children present had already very much increased. It was on that evening, when, after the Superintendent's prayer, it was expected that one of the elder members of the house would follow—that before he had commenced, a child had already begun to pray, and soon a second followed. These children's prayers must have had, with all their simplicity, something peculiarly touching in them. And so the movement continued to increase, but without that bodily demonstration which was the case with the aforementioned boy. From about the 5th of February, onwards, it appeared that these signs were generally among the boys; while the affection of the girls, with the exception of one case, was of a more spiritual character.

On the evening of the 8th of February, the writer of these lines was an eye-witness to the state of things. In the sleeping ward I met with about twenty-five boys, almost all in convulsions. The sighs and lamentations, the unmistakable signs of the great anxiety of soul, together with the convulsive movement of the limbs—all this made a startling impression upon me. The children were, with the exception of two, fully conscious. They stretched out their hands towards me; I was called from one bed to another, in order to comfort and to calm them, and also, at the earnest desire of one, to pray with him. Here one boy pointed out to me the first verse of the 13th Psalm, in order to express his inmost feeling, for they were unable to speak during the convulsive attacks; there another had his wishes written down; here again were many who had gathered together from the adjoining beds, and were reading with intense avidity a passage of Scripture which a boy had found and pointed out to the others; at another place, I pointed out to them some of the precious promises from the Word of God, and their countenances beamed with joy at what they heard, and they clasped their hands to express how deep an impression the Word had made. The most prominent feature in the whole movement is the consciousness and conviction of sin and guilt, and the longing for pardon and peace. The attacks of convulsions which accompanied the distress of mind generally ceased after a short time and then returned, being sometimes occasioned by the meeting with new companions. It may be observed that, after the bodily excitement had subsided, the spiritual emotion continued, except that they were relieved of that violent anxiety, while the most hearty longing and seeking after the mercy of God, and the comfort of peace and pardon, always remained in the children. Others I found in a state of perfect peace, and they were silent and serious, but always engaged in thoughts of salvation.

In this manner did the movement continue to go on up to the end of last month. These extraordinary emotions then began to become less frequent, and the house would soon have returned to its usual order and routine, except with the great blessing added of having a large number of spiritually awakened children among the inmates. The prayer of the children was always directed with intense earnestness towards one point, viz., forgiveness of sins, and, coupled with that, the creation of a new heart; for whatever else was mentioned in their prayers seemed clearly to relate to circumstances which at different times had been mentioned to the children—for instance, the distress of the Syrian Christians, and the inundations in Holland. But the very simplicity of these prayers, which always pointed to the one great question of salvation, is a proof that the spiritual state of the children was not artificially worked up—because the beginning of spiritual health and life will always be found in a conviction of sin and guilt.

Elberfeld, March 6.

The Kreuz Zeitung has hitherto only given a few short articles upon the occurrences in the Orphan-house at Elberfeld, which were taken from other papers; and the opinion which the editor formed from these representations, is naturally an unfavourable one, because it is based upon the statements of people, who for spiritual matters have either little or no judgment. Allow me therefore to make a few short preliminary observations, to put the matter in the right light.

The Orphan-house was built at the expense of the municipality ten years ago, and although, up to the present time, about 3,000*l.* in donations and legacies have been given towards its support, yet a considerable grant is annually required out of the municipal funds. A committee is appointed from among the members of the town council, to whom the especial management is entrusted. The superintendent and master, Mr. Klug, formerly a teacher, is according to instructions obliged to execute the orders of this committee; and has, we must premise this, during the whole time worked in perfect harmony with the committee, who, as well as himself, have heartily rejoiced at this happy occurrence, which they have neither concealed nor ignored.

There are two opinions about this institution. The Government has lately declared it to be a model institution, while Dr Wichern (who visited the house during the Kirobentag of Barmen) has expressed himself very much dissatisfied at so large a number of childrer (about 300) being brought together, whereby an influence upon the individual minds was rendered almost impossible. Complaints have also been made, throughout the whole of last year, of the bad conduct and unmanageableness of the children; and it is true that such complaints have been made, not only by the people of the establishment, but also by the teachers whose schools they attend. If there once enters into an institution of such magnitude a spirit of unruliness and obstinacy, it is almost certain that severity, the stick, and incarceration will be found of no avail to produce a different spirit. Under these circumstances the staff of the house had recourse to the only efficient remedy—they carried out the invitation to universal united prayer during the week of January 6-13.

The house-father, the wardens, and nurses (to the exclusion of the children) united in prayer that God might bring on a change in the house. What could they have prayed for more fervently, but that the Lord might be pleased to pour out His Spirit upon the children? Is there any Christian family father, any Christian schoolmaster or pastor, who is not in the habit of doing the same for his children, his pupils, his candidates for confirmation? Then suddenly begins a movement among the children; one, two, six, ten children, one after the other, come and confess their sins. Is this the doing of men? I consider it a folly to think that a number of obstinate and inveterately disobedient children can be brought to conviction and confession of sin by merely human instigation. It is true he who is such a stranger to the Gospel as not to know that there is a Holy Ghost, that God answers prayer, and sends His Spirit to the awakening and reviving of the heart, cannot but believe that the house-father has enchanted the children, so that all, as it has been said, is but a dissimulation. We do not for a moment hesitate to confess, that the spiritual awakening among the children, as it began, was the gracious operation of the Holy Spirit. However, does it not look like imitation or epidemy, that this spirit of repentance seizes within a fortnight more than half of the children? Who would deny that, wherever the Spirit of God begins to work, something of human infirmity and sin is mixed up with it? On the day of Pentecost, when 3,000 persons repented and were baptized, there may have been a good number of those among them who merely imitated the rest. Ananias and Sapphira testify to it. Would it be right to reject the whole movement as dissimulation on account of a few exceptional cases? Many of those who at the beginning were only imitators, have afterwards been seriously and sincerely awakened, and have carried away a wholesome fruit from their imitation. However, the convulsions which appeared in some of the children, must they not make us hesitate? In the first place, it is important to regard how various the reciprocal actions are between the life functions of the conscience and those of the body. Who has not felt intense bodily pain when the lively sorrow of his sins overwhelmed him? King David, awed by the terror of the Lord, felt as if arrows had pierced his body, as if his bones were broken, and as if the waters overwhelmed him.

Are not these experiences frequent? And yet we do not read that the physician of King David, or his prime minister, insisted on the instantaneous dismissal of the royal confessor, the Prophet Nathan, on the ground of his having caused so much evil by his short sermon, and having "mightily troubled both the body and soul of the king." Are the events in the Orphan-house essentially different? Is it so entirely inconceivable that children, partly descending from the most abandoned classes, and having heavy burdens of guilt on their young consciences, should have been awakened to repentance, and thereby been, spiritually and bodily, deeply affected? On the other hand, we would ask: Is this fact, historically, quite so unheard of as it appears in our days? We call to memory the general and sudden prayer devotions of the so-called "Betekinder" (praying children) in Silesia, at the end of 1707 and in the beginning of 1708. Some forty years ago, Elberfeld was the scene of a widely spread and deeply affecting awakening of children. We have sound Christians and eminent dear men among us, who date their spiritual life partly from this awakening of soul. A similar event is recorded in the history of the celebrated reformatory at Beuggen (Switzerland), which was more than forty years under the management of the excellent Zeller (father-in-law of Bishop Gobat). In the first decade of its existence, this richly blessed institution was visited by a remarkable awakening among the inmates. The sober Mr. Zeller spoke still in his later years of this blessed time with the greatest emotion.

It is said: "By their fruits ye shall know them." It is true, we know well, that awakening is not yet conversion, and that many blossoms do not bring fruit. We also know that many blossoms which were good may be violently knocked off, and it is not right to say: "We shall see what result it will have among the children, and thence we shall decide whether the work was of God, or merely the production of human fanaticism." For the work of God, as our Church history tells us, has often been hindered, and even violently destroyed by man. But even at this present moment, intelligent men—who, notwithstanding the hermetical seclusion of the children, have gained access to them—thankfully say that there is a lovely spirit among the children, and that a great many have seriously reformed.

After having said so much, we do not at all conceal from our eyes that errors may have been committed in the matter. The house-father Klug (we have known him for a good many years) is by no means a fanatic—on the contrary, a quiet, sober, almost timid man, who, in his joy at the extraordinary change in the children, and considering the abnormity of the case, has not known how to direct the matter. It requires, indeed, great energy of mind not to be carried away by such a case. Therefore we blame him for transgressing the house order—we blame him for not having separated the children, seeing the convulsions spread epidemically—we blame the nocturnal prayer-meetings of the children in the cellar and in the garret, &c.; but all this cannot influence us to regard the whole case in itself as reproachable. We have sometimes read that he who in a battle commits the greatest mistakes is the conqueror. Without mistakes, sometimes great mistakes, no victory is gained. The chariot of victory of our Lord drives through the mire of this world, and much of it adheres to its wheels—but nobody can contend but that it is the Lord's chariot. We are not blind to the irregularities which, through human infirmity and mistake, may have stained the cause of the Lord, but we cannot reject the essence of the cause on this account.

Elberfeld is at this moment a divided camp. It is not right if our friends declare everything to be purely the operation and the effect of the Holy Spirit, without acknowledging human infirmity and sin in it. Entirely wrong are those who, on account of those infirmities, deny that it is a work of God. We do not hope to come to any understanding with adversaries, to whom every awakening, be it quiet or violent, is an abomination. They have recourse to lies, calumnies, blasphemy, and still worse weapons, as a great many Rhenish and even Berlin newspapers show: they contend against the excesses and extravagance of religious life; but their true tendency is to stifle every salutary Christian revival. They will soon speak differently. While they urge that the fire should be put out in Elberfeld, it begins to burn at another part of Elberfeld, and it seems as if our Lord were pouring out over the whole province showers of mercy. It will be revealed who is the Lord!

SWEDEN.

PROGRESS OF THE GOSPEL AND ITS SPIRIT.

March 11, 1861.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Dearly beloved Brothers in the Lord,—This year also I must begin my letter by heartily thanking you for sending me Evangelical Christendom, that peaceful dove with the olive branch, always longed for and ever welcome.

The renewed exhortation to united prayer, during the week commencing with the 6th January, was received doubtless with goodwill in many parts of Sweden, especially as several of our religious papers reproduced the invitation. On the 8th and 9th of January, the Christianstad Tract Society held its quarterly meeting in this parish, at which representatives from nearly forty parishes were present. Each day united prayer was offered, with much devotion, at these large gatherings. How delightful the thought, that the incense of prayer ascended at the same time from innumerable places on our sin-infected earth, opening as many opportunities for God's Holy Spirit to accomplish His work amidst these hosts of praying ones, whose hearts would then be open to receive His gracious influence!

I have great pleasure in stating that the Agent of the Evangelical Alliance in Stockholm, Captain Berger, whilst travelling on the business of the Alliance, has visited this parish, and spent several days under my roof. He despatched during that time a large number of printed circulars to influential persons in this neighbourhood, containing a translation of the Berlin Committee's and Sir Culling Eardley's letters. It is also gratifying to be able to say that the religious contests, bitterness, and party spirit which prevailed, have to an astonishing degree yielded, and vital Christianity, peace, and joy take their place. I am enabled to give you the most striking evidence of this with respect to both the exalted and the humble in our land. Previous to the new toleration law, passed about six months ago, the Baptists had great difficulties with respect to marriage. They were not recognised by the State, and the heathen clergy would not marry them; and their marriage not being regarded as legal, no property could be claimed in connexion with it. At length, and in reply to the inquiry made by the Bishop of Hernosand, the King, as the supreme bishop in the Church, issued, on the 20th March, 1859, the following rescript: "Inasmuch as the Church law does not provide that the publication of the banns of marriage ought to be refused, merely on the ground that one or both parties desiring such publication, do, on their own acknowledgment, separate in some respects from the Evangelical Lutheran Confession; and as it is not charged with apostasy from the State Church, to which, therefore, he must be considered as still belonging, His Majesty cannot discover any obstruction to his lawful marriage." Notwithstanding this mild declaration, very few clergymen can be found in our country who can be persuaded to unite Baptists in marriage. In the province of Skania, I am, perhaps, the only clergyman who has promoted their lawful marriage. Such marriages became ultimately so numerous, that I could not but regard myself as in a position somewhat similar to the well-known English blacksmith at Gretna-green. I have just, in these latter days, been served by a neighbouring incumbent with the following charges: a, that I have united Baptists in marriage; b, that on their removal from this parish, I have not named in their certificate that they are Baptists; c, that I have not given the date of their last communion.*

My reply to these accusations is, that His Majesty's royal letter, above cited, does not regard a person's own acknowledgment as furnishing a reason for refusing publication of banns, but that the individual in question must still be considered as belonging to the State Church; and as it may be added that if any one was even convicted of being a Baptist, he ought, in obedience to the old law, to be expatriated, and, according to the new toleration edict, to enter a separate, legally constituted Baptist community, I have, when special scruples of conscience appeared, assisted to publication of banns and legal marriage certain poor persons who, admitted to the holy sacrament in our Church, have subsequently been perplexed about baptism; and further, that the royal letter required just such a certificate of removal as that complained of. It is said that my defence occasioned considerable amusement when read in the consistory of Lund. No decision has yet been given in the case. As I have given you an evidence of our monarch's forbearance towards those of differing opinions, I will add a proof of the growing forbearance which is found amongst his subjects. According to the new law, Dissenters have undoubtedly a right to form religious communities in this country. But, as soon as they do this, they are strictly forbidden, under a severe penalty, to preach their peculiar doctrines elsewhere than in their own church or chapel. It appears that, in consequence of this, the Baptists have agreed not to form Baptist churches on the conditions of the toleration law, but to content themselves with the indication furnished by the above-cited royal letter. They declare therefore, at least many of them, that they will not separate themselves from the national Church, and that they desire to have fellowship with the Christians in the land as brethren. For this purpose it is manifestly necessary that they shall not be partisans. On the other hand, the godly within the State Church—the so-called "Läsare". or "Readers," at least in this neighbourhood, who have no dissenting opinions—have agreed that, so long as the Dissenters continue peaceable and avoid all proselytism, they will hold fellowship with them in confidence and brotherliness, according to Phil. iii. 16 compared with Titus iii. 10. Such is the development of Church matters in the south of Sweden during the last six months. Have we not great reason to thank God for it? May this state of things increase more and more in the same direction, to the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ!

The fact, however, must not be concealed

* The Church law requires that all her members shall, at least once a year, receive the Lord's Supper, and it is a fact well known that the police force in Stockholm have been ordered by their chief to go to the Lord's Supper, that they might not be hindered in giving evidence on oath before the courts.

that the last post from the North brings intelligence of a baptism by legal coercion there. Oh that our clergy would consider the absurdity of this course!

The cry for a separation of Church and State is heard in our land from an increasing number of voices. It is perceived more and more that the Diet is not the proper forum for deciding Church questions. The gifted and zealous Dean of Gotheberg, Dr. Wieselgren, has declared, in presence of a large gathering of the people, the importance of an independent Synod, and others have coincided with him. Curious events hasten this. One is the strange fact that the Bishop of Gotheberg has been censured by the public prosecutor for the manner in which he proceeded in a matter of Church discipline.* Another is the fact that a clergyman, deprived of his office by the spiritual court, has had the sentence altered to suspension by the secular judge. A third is that a parish clerk, who has published a most shameless attack on Christianity, is suffered unmolested to retain his place, and lead the singing of the congregation. All this, and much besides, contribute to open the eyes of the people to behold the bondage of the Church. May the Spirit of the Lord guide the continually increasing spiritual movements in the land!

The Free Scandinavian Church meeting is fixed to be held in Christiania, the capital of Norway, and to begin on the 29th July. The first meeting was held in Copenhagen in 1857, the second in Lund in 1859. The meeting is open to Christian laymen as well as clergy, and foreign brethren are always welcome guests.

Yours in Christian love,

CARL BERGMAN.

A MISSION TOUR FOR THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

"The right hand of the Lord is exalted; the right hand of the Lord doeth valiantly."—Psalm cxviii. 16.

To the Members of the Committee of Council of the British Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, and Christian brethren who have contributed with pecuniary aid for promoting the Evangelical Alliance in Sweden.

Honoured and very dear Brethren in Christ Jesus our Life!—In consequence of the important mission which, as travelling secretary, I have received from the branches of the Evangelical Alliance in London, Geneva, and Stockholm, to labour for the extension of the Alliance in Sweden, I propose now, with the Divine assistance, to give an account of my travels during last summer. Permit me first, however, to say a few words concerning the general conference on the 18th June last.

The meeting having been opened, followed by a psalm, Pastor Ahlbing then offered up a fervent prayer, and held a short discourse upon a text taken from the Prophet Joel. This was followed by an account of the progress of the Swedish branch during the past year, from which the following are extracts:—

"In this place," says a clergyman, writing from a large country town, "we associate on friendly terms with our Baptist and Free-Church brethren, visiting alternately at each other's houses. During my last illness, I have had the most satisfactory proofs of this. Everybody knows that I am a strict Lutheran, but both Baptists and Free-Churchmen have shown me and my family the warmest brotherly sympathy during those days of trial"

A rector, aged 80, writing to a friend at Stockholm, whom he believed to belong to the Baptist communion, expresses himself thus: "All we unworthy creatures, to whom God, by His grace, has given a living faith, ought to know and recognise each other in Christ, and walk together in life and in death. All sectarian disputes should vanish as dust before the tempest. Amen."

A young clergyman in the province of Jemtland writes: "The evening before yesterday I had an opportunity of hearing an earnest and animated discourse from the Curate H—— in B—— village. The labours of Curate T—— in B—— have been much blessed. The Pastors R—— and A—— are powerful preachers, and are not sparing of the Gospel. Pastor L—— has lately been awakened and found peace, and confesses in public and in private his faith in the Lord Jesus. They all

* The case was a complaint made against an incumbent, because he had, at a domiciliary visitation meeting, said strong things against the producers and vendors of brandy. The sentence was that he should be reproved by the Bishop, and the Bishop was complained of by the magistrate because the reproof was not thought severe enough.—Translator.

seem to be more tolerant towards persons of different opinions, and are not eager to bring forward disputed points of doctrine, nor to contest interpretations differing from theirs. They preach Christ crucified. The lay preachers do not all show the same wisdom in their proceedings. The Baptists in general are more moderate; several of them are employed as village schoolmasters, the duties of which they perform faithfully and diligently, seeking to lead to the knowledge of Christ the souls of those committed to their care. To God alone be glory for the spread of the truth and the triumph of His Gospel. We have heard with rejoicing of the great revivals in other lands, and look forward with joy and hope to a brighter future for our poor, cold country."

A missionary society, based upon the principles of the Evangelical Alliance, had been formed, in the course of the year, in Oster Wahla parish, in the province of Upland. The second paragraph of the rules of the society is as follows: "As members of this society are invited all those poor sinners who have experienced the transforming power of faith in their hearts; whose first object in life is to glorify in word and deed the Saviour who bought them with His blood, and who are therefore prepared to go forth without the camp, bearing His reproach."

The passages of Scripture selected as subjects for meditation at the Conference, were the following—I. John v. 1.; John xvii. 20. 21; John xiii. 35. All the speakers agreed in saying, that the Evangelical Alliance is founded on scriptural principles, and is of great necessity; that love must follow when faith has been implanted in the heart by the Holy Spirit of God; for it is natural that the regenerated man, in consequence of his renewed nature, should love God; but if there is a want of love to God, there will also be a want of love between the children of God, wherefore love is an object for which they ought continually to strive. (1 Cor. xiii. 1.)

Rector Hammar gave a short, but interesting and touching account of the Waldenses, and proposed that measures should be adopted to collect funds to assist them in their work of evangelising Italy. Rector Elmblad warmly seconded this appeal, urging that they ought immediately to proceed to action, saying, "Let us not delay an hour, not a moment;" on which a considerable sum (with regard to the auditors) was collected.

Mr. Johansson, who had been so kindly received in England, and allowed to accompany some of the agents of the Alliance in their travels, having returned a few days before the meeting, had much that was interesting to relate. Mr. Wiberg spoke on the Mortara case.

Among the numerous assemblage were two foreigners, who, although now no longer subjects of the same earthly king, were received as fellow subjects of the same heavenly King. The one was Mr. Schaumann, Professor of Theology at the Imperial University in Helsingfors, and the other Pastor Fredriksson, from Nyland. The meeting was concluded with prayer and singing. A spirit of zeal and love prevailed among us, for which the Lord be praised!

On his return home, Rector Hammar gave an impartial account of the meeting, which was of service to the Evangelical Alliance, and quite different from the article that appeared in the Watchman newspaper.

VOYAGE TO CALMAR.

A few days after the conference, I left the port of Stockholm in the steam-boat Svea. At the dinner-table, which, in consequence of the calm weather, was tolerably well filled, a lively conversation arose concerning watering-places and amusements. An elderly lady of a sickly appearance, who with her daughter sat opposite to me, engaged eagerly in the conversation. She was on her way to Carlsbad. Just before we rose from table, I felt myself constrained to utter a word of warning—how people wander from watering-place to watering-place, spare neither expense nor trouble, and take great care of their bodies, while they are indifferent with regard to the life and health of their souls; and yet that which is of earth must sooner or later return to earth again, notwithstanding all that is done to preserve it. The loud and confused conversation was now suddenly broken off, and a pause ensued. People looked significantly at each other and rose from the table. Oh, how little is He known who "came to His own!" In the afternoon I had an opportunity of continuing the important subject with the sick lady, who was not unwilling to listen to those truths.

The following morning, between three and four o'clock, we came in sight of the cathedral of Calmar, with its four towers, which, in the dim morning light, looked at a distance like a ship of the line at anchor. This town is, among other things, remarkable for the so-called "Union," by which Sweden, Denmark, and Norway were united under one crown, which was first worn by Queen Margaret, called the Semiramis of the North, the clever, bold, and magnanimous daughter of the Danish king Waldemar.

Calmar is situated upon the eastern coast, and is separated from the island of Oland by a narrow strait, called the Straits of Calmar. As the steam-boat did not enter the harbour, but lay at anchor for a short time in the roads, the landing was difficult—passengers and freight being packed in the same boat. I was one of the last who jumped from the ladder of the steam-boat, and just as I reached the overloaded boat a wave caused it to roll so violently that I lost my balance, and fell among boxes, flour-bags, and barrels. But the Lord preserved my life and limbs, and brought me and my only child safe to land.

The spiritual tendency of this place has hitherto been strictly on the side of the Church; so that religious meetings conducted by laymen have been considered contrary to the doctrine of the Church, as it has been represented by priests and inculcated in some books. No one dared to interpret the Holy Scriptures: that was left to proper teachers, whose words were implicitly believed.

A wholesome change has, however, now taken place, and a bright life of faith shows itself in many a Christian. There are certainly still some persons who look with suspicion on the new form Christianity has taken, and hold themselves aloof—to which Rector T——'s voluminous work, "The Seven Trumpets," has much contributed. The eyes of others, on the contrary, have been opened by the disapprobation this author so decidedly pronounces against all lay agency. Some few have unhappily fallen into Antinomian error.

MISS FRYXELL'S BOARDING SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES AT ROSTAD—"THE DEN OF THIEVES BECAME A HOUSE OF PRAYER."

What has most favourably acted upon the Christian life in Calmar is the boarding-school at Rostad, where the Lord, by His Holy Spirit, has kindled the fire of His love. This establishment is, in truth, the only one of its kind in our country. Miss Fryxell, whom the Lord has endowed with great gifts for the management and guidance of children, devoted her whole life to that important branch of Christianity. With a view of acquiring the necessary information for the missionary calling, she passed a year at the institution at Basle, intending to proceed thence to instruct heathen children in the knowledge of their best Friend and Saviour. But the Lord had otherwise appointed. In consequence of weak health and the repeated advice of physicians, she was forced to return to her own country, where the Lord in His wisdom and goodness had pointed out to her a wide field of usefulness. "From day to day," she on one occasion remarked, "I obtain grace to perceive that my beloved Lord wanted me at home." As a testimony how the eternal concerns are prevailing at this institution, may be mentioned that it happens not unfrequently that loud prayers are sent up to the Saviour from the garret, whither the children resort to pour out their hearts in privacy and bewail their sins. At morning and evening prayers, other persons beside the inmates of the school are allowed to be present; and Christians from the town may there be seen sitting among the children, and learning with them.

Miss Fryxell is a Christian with a large heart, who does not look to the Church forms, but to the mind of the Spirit; wherefore she also receives the children of parents who do not belong to the Lutheran Church. On the occasion of some travellers, who held contracted views concerning communion of saints, she begged me to read the tract, "Two Meetings*," after which her pupils sang sacred songs for four voices.

From the house, which stands upon an eminence, there is a beautiful view over a part of the straits, the town, and the castle, where the great Gustavus Adolphus, the champion of religious liberty in Germany, occasionally resided, and where the paintings on the walls of the bedroom of Gustavus Adolphus, representing wild-boar hunts, are said to have been painted by Eric XIV. himself. Some years ago, Rostad was a celebrated tavern, where the children of the world held their bacchanalian feasts. Such mighty changes the Lord bringeth forth!

Through the kindness and hospitality of this dear sister, I had easier access to the Christians in the town. I am under particular obligation to Miss L——, who not only arranged a meeting at her own house, but encouraged others to do the same; so that on several occasions I was enabled to represent

* The one was held in Exeter Hall the 1st of June, 1843. An account of it was communicated to the editor of the Pictorial newspaper by Pastor George Scott. The other took place at De-la-Croix's Hotel, Stockholm, the 18th June, 1858—arranged by Dr. Steane and Mr. Hinton.

to them the importance of union among those who, by the Spirit, are united with the Father and the Son.

SOCIAL CHRISTIAN PARTIES.

At a "sewing society" for missions, held in a garden, a schoolmaster read a passage from "Prætorius," a book which is in very general use among Christians of the State Church. As far as I know, there is no Lutheran religious book which lays so much stress on the Lutheran view of baptism as this. I afterwards read one of the tracts of the Alliance.

At a party at Miss W—'s a lively dispute arose between a spiritual-minded clergyman and some of the ladies, concerning a sermon of the celebrated Pastor A—in Mådesjö Church. Among other things he was said to have expressed himself as follows:—"My colleagues, what do we in these days for the salvation of souls compared to the unlearned and lay preachers, who, with the Bible in their hands and the Bible in their hearts, go from house to house, speaking the Word boldly?" Some severe words were also said to have been uttered against the State Church. The ladies, although disapproving of the harsh expressions with regard to the Church, defended his cause, considering him to be a Christian whose labours for the extension of the Kingdom of Christ have been blessed. At the request of the hostess, the above-mentioned clergyman finished the evening with prayer, which unhappily, in consequence of the preceding conversation, did not breathe a spirit of brotherly love. A few days afterwards, this same clergyman preached in the cathedral on the 1st Corinthians, xii. 4—11. This sermon produced an unpleasant impression upon most of the Christians, and was unfavourable to their mutual love, because the preacher, in sharp language, several times evidently referred to Pastor A—'s great gift and labours. Miss L— was much grieved at the sermon, and begged me to go to the clergyman and speak to him, if by the grace of God he might be induced to cease from his opposition: I had already felt myself constrained to pay him a visit, and I was kindly received. Before I could introduce the subject, he himself began by regretting, in humble terms, the harsh words which he had spoken in the pulpit: when I mentioned what an unfavourable impression it had made on many of the Christians, he answered me, "I have been grievously unwise, and I have been justly punished by the Spirit." The following Sunday he bore a good testimony of having taken up the admonition, for the sermon he then preached was an outpouring of peace and love. Thus the Lord binds the hearts of men, reserving to Himself the victory!

Before setting out from the town, I visited in order to distribute some tracts among the prisoners. I introduced myself to the director of the prison, and he accompanied me. Having finished our round, I mentioned to him my wish concerning the tracts. On his inquiring what sort of books they were, I answered: "They were such books that might, perhaps, lighten the burdens of his office, and diminish the expenses of the State." He looked over them, saying he would place them in the hands of the chaplain of the prison. I afterwards visited the chaplain, by whom I was most kindly received. He thanked me for my books, and promised to make of them the use I wished. The director of the prison is accused of ill-treating the prisoners, and another has been appointed in his place.

DEPARTURE FROM CALMAR—THE WALDENSES' VALLEY.

From Calmar I followed the coast in a northerly direction. The postillion I got was very talkative; he insisted upon his being a true Christian, and, nevertheless, he swore and profaned the name of God continually. I succeeded in showing him that he contradicted himself by his own words, and at last he was silenced.

In the evening I went to Pastor Rundquist's, where I was most cordially received. The pastor and his wife are both liberal and earnest Christians, and friends of the Alliance, so I could freely communicate to them my views concerning the union of God's children. They said there was much show of godliness, but little living piety. After supper the servants were called together, and we prayed and meditated on one of the Psalms. It was late in the evening when I left this happy home in Waldenses' Valley, as they called it. Mr. R— accompanied me a good part of the way to the post-station a large village on the coast. About three years ago a great revival took place here, and since that time there are many who "walk in the truth." The winter 1858-59 the progress of the living Christianity was especially remarkable. The present state of things was not equally satisfying. Many minds were troubled about the question whether they were right in receiving the Lord's Supper in the State Church. Others had fallen into the pernicious delusion which seeks to prove that sinners are sinless; this fatal error had caused an inevitable separation in spiritual communion from the sincere Christians.

In compliance with a special request, I made an explanatory speech upon the origin and progress of the Evangelical Alliance. The spacious, newly-constructed mission-house was the place of meeting on this occasion.

The clergy stood, alas! not on the side of the living Christianity, but rather seemed to make common cause with its opponents; the peasantry in this place was known to be ungodly, wayward, and much given to drinking. From Monstera I returned, following the coast, and saw again, after an absence of ten years, the beautiful estate of which was once the property of Gustavus Vasa. The present owner of this fine property, Baron Rappe, has devoted great sums to the Lutheran Mission. A broad and deep river with its dark water flows through the splendid park, forming several small islands covered with trees, shrubs, and flowers, as luxuriant as in a southern climate. In the park are two old oaks, said to have been planted by Gustavus I. The day after my arrival being Sunday, we attended Divine service together in a little church about six miles off. In the afternoon we discussed the sermon, and the following is some portions of what we remembered: 1 John iii. 1-2. "The Roman Catholic Church teaches that it is not right to seek for assurance of having received the spirit of adoption, which false principle resounds but too often in the Swedish Lutheran Church; but such doctrine is contrary to the Word of God. The spirit of adoption which is given us, is not less really imparted for its being concealed; but spirit is continually longing to be manifested: 'When shall I see Thy face?' 'It doth not yet appear what we shall be.' It was not revealed in the house of Herod what would become of John the Baptist. The future state of Stephen and of all the martyrs that succeeded him was as little known to the world; but there will come a day when they will appear in glory."

One morning at Strömserum we spoke of the Evangelical Alliance, and I read to my friends the Berlin address, which received their approbation. We made an excursion to some of the islands at the mouth of the river, and landed on the most beautiful, from which we had a fine view over the sea, then slightly agitated by a breeze. At a distance of two Swedish miles we could see the ruins of the fine old castle of Borgholm, on the island of Oland.

After our eyes had some time enjoyed the view of visible things, which, however beautiful, are yet perishable, we turned our thoughts to their Creator, and the eternal kingdom of grace which He has established through His well-beloved Son. Miss R—— took out her bible and read to us the latter part of the 20th chapter of Acts, which became the subject of a lively and edifying conversation. We then read a Psalm, and afterwards united in prayer. Praised be the Lord, who thus feedeth His children with the heavenly manna! After morning prayer the next day, we read from the "morning meditations" of M. T. Roos, "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep." After having offered my best thanks for the kindness that had been shown me, I started in a southerly direction, and went to

RYSSBYLUND—RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSY.

Ryssbylund belongs to Mr. Kylberg, and there he and his brother have established an agricultural institute. About twenty persons of the country people are instructed there, and while learning what belongs to this life, they do not neglect that which concerns the life to come. A deaconess from Stockholm superintends an orphan house in the neighbourhood, and during last autumn a "sewing society" was formed here, whose members meet once a week. Their works were sold by auction, and the proceeds amounted to 780 rix dollars. This money was given to an establishment for blind and deaf persons in the parish of Hjorthed.

At Ryssbylund, a religious controversy arose one evening, between a veterinary surgeon on the one side, and the brothers K——, Baron Sparre, and myself on the other. On our first question, this in many respects learned man acknowledged that he believed the Bible to be the Word of God. We considered this question necessary, in order to show him with what weapons we intended to contend. But in the course of the long conversation which followed, he retracted what he had before acknowledged, and rejected the clearest truths of Scripture. As soon as the Son of God, and redemption through His Cross, were represented to him the only foundation for a sure peace with God, the carnal mind arose in defiance. His Christianity consisted in the faithful performance of his duties, and in good works, and thus having a good conscience. When I represented to him the necessity of having another's righteousness, to be able to possess "the testimony of a good conscience towards God," he grew angry, and exclaimed: "I am not such a child either." Would that you were a child, thought we, for "whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein." Seeing such determined opposition and irritation, and midnight approaching, we wished our adversaries good night, having during several hours vainly endeavoured to convince him from the Scriptures "that Jesus was Christ." (Acts xviii. 28.) We went away together, and in my room united our supplications at the throne of grace for this opposer of the truth. These brethren knew little about the Evangelical Alliance, wherefore I explained its object, and gave them a few tracts on the subject, which they thankfully received.

THE ISLAND OF OLAND.

In forming my plans of travel, I had not included Oland; but as I sat in the carriage, I became so convinced of its importance, that I directed my course towards the coast, and after a few hours' drive through the forest, arrived at the ferry, Rafsudden. The straits at this place are so narrow, that the objects on the opposite shore can be easily discerned. What most attracts the attention is the number of windmills, which are placed like a chain of videttes on a barren plain called Alvaren, extending as far as the eye can reach. The wind being favourable, the crossing over to "Stora Rör" was effected in half an hour.

In consequence of a conversation between the ferryman concerning the power of kings and their help, I directed their attention to a King that is mighty and a Helper in all need, and gave them a printed handbill, on which were the following lines:—

If thou hast but Jesus,
Who thy sins hath borne,
If without selfish, dubious poising,
Thou but receiv'st His free gift love,
Trials would be felt no more
Thou nought in life, in death could daunt.

These lines have become very precious to me since the summer of 1859, when for a whole hour before an accident occurred which endangered my life, this sweet call of the Spirit sounded in my ears.

The first earnest Christian I met at Borgholm, the only town on the island, was a tradesman whom I had not seen since 1849. Since that time the Lord had wrought a great change in him; for now he had felt himself a sinner, but had become a child of grace. When I entered the little room behind the shop, he was standing before an open Bible. He did not recognise me at first, but appeared much pleased on my mentioning my name. "Come," said he, "look here, look here," as pointing with his finger he read aloud, "But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ." (Philippians iii. 7—9.) While reading these verses aloud, the tears rolled down his cheeks. He was as a child, thanking his heavenly Father, that as a lost being in himself he had been allowed to exchange his own unclean righteousness for the righteousness of God. The death of his daughter at the age of eighteen, in consequence of fright, occasioned by the running away of the horses in a carriage; this accident contributed also (he had many years been inquiring after the truth) to carry him to the foot of the Cross, and there seek consolation and peace. The accident also led to her conversion, and she fell asleep in Jesus.

PUBLIC MEETING.

A meeting was held in the large room of the school-house, and was well attended. The speaker who succeeded me was a Captain in the royal navy. Almost everywhere, but especially in those places where Christians had mission-houses, or large rooms, I felt myself constrained to set forth the blessings of the Gospel, according to the grace which the Lord granted me, and this for two reasons—first, because the people expressed a great desire for it; and secondly, because it was necessary to show on what ground I laboured for Christian union whether it was from human motives, or from the love of God in Jesus Christ. 1 John iv. 11 was my text on many occasions.

At the close of the meeting above mentioned, I met Baron F——, an old friend of mine; he was curate to an old clergyman in the neighbourhood of the town. Having been informed of my arrival at Borgholm, this dear brother, in concert with the Cantor, had wished to give me the information and advice necessary for my journey, and very kindly did so that same evening.

THE CLERGY.

The island of Oland forms a part of the diocese of Calmar; it is fourteen Swedish miles in length and about one in breadth, and is divided into thirty-two benefices. There are no Dissenters. The people are intelligent and lively, and so willing to receive the heavenly seed, that they will leave their cythres and rakes in the busiest harvest time, and hasten to the places where the Word of God is preached. It is in the northern part of the island especially that the Lord Jesus has gained the greatest number of victories, and the instruments He has employed have been generally people in humble life. From what I could learn, Baron F—— is now the only earnest pulpit preacher, since a highly-gifted spiritual clergyman removed to the continent last May, through whose testimony to the Divine mission of Christ many a sinner has been inscribed in the Book of Life. The first awakening took place about twenty years since in the parish of Källa, through the powerful preaching of the late Rector Ringberg. This revival has always preserved a strict church character, showing a shyness for lay agency, and continuing the use of books which lay more stress upon sanctification than justification. This little Christian flock now stood alone, while a more evangelical spirit was working round them in missionary and sewing societies, the distribution of tracts, and free meetings for religious exercises, conducted by travelling clergymen and laymen.

The clergy have contributed to preserve the exclusive character above mentioned; and from the pulpit they not unfrequently denounce Baptists and Separatists, those "disturbers of the peace," and warn their parishioners neither to hear them nor to allow them to hold meetings in their houses. If I could gain Schoolmaster L——'s confidence, and my friends, much would thereby be obtained, as he was the leader of the little flock in Källa; but they feared I should not gain access to them, because they were particularly on their guard against travellers who preached the Word of God. Meanwhile I was the bearer of verbal messages of friendship from Baron F——, who had been some time in service in that neighbourhood, and was personally acquainted with Schoolmaster L——.

Having thus become acquainted with the state of affairs, I committed the matter to the Lord, praying for the guidance of His Holy Spirit, that His name might in all things be glorified; and then I determined to direct my course towards the north. Before leaving the town, I went with Captain —— to pay a visit to the clergyman, with whom he had a long conversation, and found him not unfavourably disposed to a freer evangelical activity.

The Alliance lecture was held at Mrs. S——'s, which was attended by the Christians in the town. We commenced and ended as usual with prayer and singing, and the Lord was among us with his peace-giving Spirit.

JOURNEY FROM BORGHOLM.—PREACHING IN THE OPEN AIR.—GOD'S PROTECTING HAND OVER HIS CHILDREN.—BÖDA.—A SCRIBE PUT TO SHAME.

At Klinta, a large village, a number of people had collected at a farm belonging to a peasant named J. Nilsson, and situated near the sea; some were seated on benches, others on the grass under the shady trees.

After prayer and singing, I read the account of our Saviour's crucifixion as given by St. Luke. Towards the end of my discourse, I spoke of the importance of "believing in the light" (John xii. 36) while it is near; now is "the accepted time," for a time might come when the Lord would "remove the candlestick out of its place" (Rev. ii. 5). Ay, that it not unfrequently happened that the Gospel light had been taken away from a whole nation, and removed from one kingdom to another, which is the severest punishment of Almighty God; and whenever the Gospel light has fled, there the people are rejected, and a dreadful darkness prevails. I afterwards heard that, as scriptural as these observations were, the parish clergyman took offence at them, supposing that the candlestick referred to Baron F——, and the darkness to himself. After I had finished, the schoolmaster sang some of Ahlfell's "sacred songs," with accompaniment of guitar; and then Baron F—— uttered a few encouraging words. Lastly, Captain ——, who had just come from a church service, followed by a military parade in the churchyard, addressed some anxious inquirers in the farm kitchen. An outpouring of the Spirit manifested itself among us. The weather was particularly favourable, and the sun, which set in a dark cloud in the west, looked like a ball of fire, as it gradually disappeared in the smooth, transparent waters of the Baltic.

Meeting at Pinnetrulla the following day, at the house of the Churchwarden P——. Visited the afflicted wife of a so-called alderman, dwelling in the same village. Her husband was given to drinking, and very violent when intoxicated. Poor woman! her mind was much depressed, and this had strongly affected her bodily health. I endeavoured to comfort her with the only true comfort, the Word of Life; how that all things work together for good to them that love God, "and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." We passed some time in prayer before separating. O! precious Cross! O! precious Crown!

A meeting the next day at Roratorp, the house of P. Larsson, an intelligent peasant and zealous worker for the kingdom of God. A missionary society had been formed here, which was connected with other societies of the same kind in the neighbouring parishes. A general meeting was held once a month. Two meetings were held here, which were as numerously attended as the room would allow. I was urged to visit a sick man, who lived at some distance. No one had yet been able to compete with him in scriptural knowledge, and wherever he came he conducted himself in a haughty and overbearing manner. I was accompanied on the way by an old woman of seventy, and a poor, pious peasant. When we had got more than half over the Alvaren under a burning sun, this poor man invited us into his cottage to rest, and gave us some milk, after which we continued our way, and reached the place of destination. The people in the house were busy baking. A young woman came forward in a friendly manner and opened the door to a small room, where I saw a healthy-looking young man lying in a bed in consequence of lameness in his feet; and this was the former bold disputer of Holy Writ. After the entrance of his wife, who suffered daily from giddiness and headache, I read a portion of the 11th chapter of John, 9th and 10th verses: "As long as we walk with Jesus we walk in the day, and in His light who is the light of the world; but if we walk without the fellowship of Jesus, we walk in the night—the night of sin, unbelief, and death; our steps are uncertain and tottering; we wander away from the path, stumble, and fall." Thus had he also fallen, and thus had the Lord chastised him, that the Sun of Righteousness might arise with healing in His wings, that he also might walk in the day. He listened to the word of grace like a poor needy sinner. We conversed together for some time, and after offering up a prayer to a merciful God for his true conversion, I took leave, when he expressed his gratitude for my visit, and cordially pressed my hand. On my return I was accompanied by the same old woman, who on the way thither had told me of her conversion.

At the supper-table, to which some Christians had been invited by the host, we had again an opportunity of speaking of the life-giving and precious bread of heaven, by which we are strengthened in the inner man, and enabled to run with patience the race that is set before us. The portion of Scripture chosen for consideration the next morning was the 87th Psalm, applied to the Evangelical Alliance. Distribution of Evangelical Alliance tracts as usual.

From this spot, a pleasant forest road led me to Kalla parish. L——, the schoolmaster, lived at a short distance from the school-house; and having traversed a beautiful meadow, I reached his red-painted little house. His manner was friendly, though rather serious and reserved. He accompanied me back to the highroad, during which we spoke on sacred subjects, especially of the great movements of the present time. He advised me to seek a lodging at John Nilsson's, in Quamstad village, saying, "you will be better off there than where the people at Borgholm recommended you." To my surprise and joy he wished me to hold a meeting in the afternoon of the same day. I was glad of this recommendation from L——, because I felt sure that the persons to whom he directed me were some of the Kalla Christians, whom I particularly wished to meet. Half-an-hour afterwards I arrived at the place, and being charged with greetings from L——, and assurances that I could lodge there, and announcing myself as an acquaintance of the late Pastor Ringberg's widow, whom I met on my journey, I could not be otherwise than hospitably received.

In the afternoon, a meeting was held here, when I received special grace "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power"—the third chapter of I John being the portion of the Scripture—to set forth the distinguishing marks of the children of God and of the children of the devil; the difference between having sin and committing sin. The meeting terminated with a prayer from L——, the schoolmaster, who, immediately afterwards, gave me a hearty shake of the hand, saying, "That was no new thing, but the good old Word of God."

The next morning the 133rd Psalm was read and commented upon, together with some corresponding passages from the New Testament, after which some of the Alliance tracts were distributed. I made a short visit to N. L.—'s widow read some of the "Pilgrim's Songs," and conversed about them with her and her daughter, who were both seeking the Lord. The mother asked me if it was a sin not to be able to sing, because she had been told that those who were not able to do so, could not be the children of God.

A few hours before my departure, I had an opportunity of speaking with John Nilsson's wife, who was the only one in the house that had learned to know her Saviour. Next the schoolmaster, she was considered to have most experience, and was consulted by inquiring souls. Weak health had sometimes a depressing effect upon her mind, but her faith in the Lord was unshaken. Among other things, she said, "whither should I go, miserable creature that I am, with all my daily shortcomings, if not to Jesus, who I know will receive me, and lift off the burdens; but it is pleasant to meet with sympathy and consolation, and, according to Scripture, 'bear one another's burdens.' Yet there are Christians here who are unwilling to enter on the subject of others' experience in spiritual things, who turn it aside with some text of Scripture, saying that 'we are under the law.'"

The following extract from an excellent treatise by M. F. Roos, "On the difference and agreement between Christians in this life," may not be out of place here: "Some speak more about Christian experience, or the work of the Holy Spirit in the heart; others of the work of redemption which the Son of God accomplished, and of a child-like faith, whereby the varieties of Christian experience are not denied or set aside, though not so distinctly shown; some make use of certain terms concerning repentance and the new obedience; others, again, express themselves differently. Some would rather see a child of God cheerful, others would have him to be mournful, or at least serious." If the Bible were more read, and laid to heart, and prayed over, the differences between the people of God would not be as striking, as is now unhappily the case.

When I left Quarnstad, John Nilsson's wife accompanied me to the highroad, holding my hand; and, thanking God for my visit, wished me God's blessing on my labours, and a happy journey.

At Gaxa, John Persson, a Christian peasant, gave me a horse to Böda. I obtained a lodging at Carl Nilsson's, a peasant at Swartvik, not far from the school-house at Böda. In the afternoon, a meeting in the large school-room at Böda. Read John xvii.; described the unity of the first Christians—causes of the decay of the Church—Constantine—the middle ages—Reformation—orthodoxy—want of love—Evangelical Alliance; its effect in England and other countries—revivals in America, Great Britain, and Sweden—prayer-meetings. Prayer and songs began and ended the meeting. Several persons went away in the middle of my address, because it was not an ordinary Bible lecture, and they got no "food for their souls." Some of the dissatisfied afterwards came back, and I and other friends spoke to them, in the schoolmaster's room, on the importance of that part of the Word of God which inculcates "love to the brethren," asking them whether there was no "food for the soul" in the xvii. John simply read, without any comment. Some one proposed that we should address ourselves to God in prayer, on which a young woman offered up a truly devoted and fervent prayer. Then followed one of the Pilgrim's songs, and we continued alternately conversing, singing, and praying for some time, till the dissatisfied regained confidence, and we separated in the most friendly terms. Before my departure I visited the Provost, who told me that when he was curate there, twenty years ago, the condition of the common people was very deplorable, which was partly owing to their fondness for brandy. A happy change had, however, taken place, in consequence of the rarity of this pernicious liquor, which even at the post stations was no longer to be had. Outward tranquillity prevailed, and the desire to hear the Word of God had increased. They were grateful for the information I gave them concerning the Evangelical Alliance, and I rejoiced to find them willing to receive the precious truth. We separated after a cordial leave-taking on both sides.

MEETING AT MADERSJÖ,

at the house of P. Svensson, a peasant and experienced Christian, with a good knowledge of Scripture. Matthew vi. 19—21 was the portion of Scripture I had chosen. Early the following morning I received the visits of some women, who were anxious about their souls, with whom I held some conversation and prayed.

SEWING UNION AT BORGHOLM, where I had the pleasure of again meeting my dear friend, and we spoke together "in psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melodies in our hearts to the Lord" (Ephes. v. 10). The object of these unions being generally to provide clothes for poor children, and thus be in more opportunity of moving the hearts of the children and their parents through the Word of God. Many a good, natural child of the world is induced to attend these meetings, and, by an outward appearance of godliness, gain the name of "reader." I therefore addressed to them a few words of warning, of the danger of being lulled into security by the performance of charitable deeds, and associating with true believers, and thus becoming like the foolish virgins, who, for want of oil in their lamps, were not able to enter into the marriage chamber.

During my absence from Borgholm, Captain — had received a letter from the Admiral in command at Carlskrona, forbidding him to stand up and preach. The cause of the anti-Protestant, not to say anti-Scriptural order, was an article in a newspaper, the subject of which was briefly as follows: Early one summer morning the writer of the article was walking in the beautiful King's-park, situated on the seashore, pouring forth his feelings on the majesty of nature, the song of the birds, &c., &c., &c. While thus absorbed in his pantheistic reveries, he was disturbed by the sound of human voices singing a psalm; and on looking round he perceived a party of ladies and gentlemen, who had met to praise the Creator of all things. Rom. i. 25. This had caused an irritating effect upon his mind, and in his anger he wrote the article in question, mentioning the captain's name, and representing the impropriety and profanation of thus holding divine service and singing psalms, which properly belonged to the temple and to the office of the priest.

That an officer should figure as a "reader-preacher" in a public newspaper was doubtless considered to be humiliating to the royal navy, and must thus be prevented.

When I then reflected upon the many opportunities the Lord, of His infinite mercy, had afforded me of working for the extension of that "kingdom which cannot be moved"—whether it referred to the alliance of man with God, or to the alliance of God's people among themselves—I became still more firmly convinced that it was the call of the Spirit that induced me to change my travelling plans at Rysesbylund, and visit Oland; and when I add to this the blessing with which the Lord crowned my weak efforts, which I experienced both during the journey and after my return home,* I must, from the depths of my heart, exclaim—"Thou art the God that doest wonders; Thou hast declared Thy strength among the people" (Psalm lxxvii. 14).

"Being recommended by the brethren unto the grace of God," I repaired to the ferry at Röhalla, whence I sailed over the straits and arrived safely at Calmar.

I sincerely wished to have sent the whole of my report at once, but as that would cause too great a delay, I now forward what I have been able to prepare.

LAPLAND.

ACCOUNT OF THE MISSION TO THE LAPLANDERS,

ADDRESSED TO THE CHRISTIANS IN STOCKHOLM, AND COMMUNICATED BY THEM TO THE COMMITTEE OF THE BRITISH BRANCH OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Beloved friends of Missions,—If we look at the map of Scandinavia, we perceive that the northern part of the united kingdoms of Sweden and Norway is divided by a long and often lofty mountain ridge, stretching from the rise of the River Tornea in the north, in a southerly direction through the districts of Jemtland, Dalecarlia, and Wermland. On both sides, and in some places on the summit of this alpine range, our Lapland people dwell, most numerous on the eastern side, which tract of country may be regarded as Lapland proper. This Lapland was formerly much larger in extent than it is now, and embraced the whole peninsula. The Swedes and Norwegians, a more powerful and energetic race, encroached on the aborigines, who retired first to the primeval forests, thence towards the Fells, and ultimately found refuge in the inhospitable region where they now struggle for existence. The number of the Laplanders has, time after time, been reduced to something like 6,000. This population, compared with the teeming multitudes in Heathendom, is but as a drop in the ocean: nevertheless they are a people purchased, as well as ourselves, by the precious blood of Christ, and designed to be heirs of the Kingdom of God. They ought therefore to receive the knowledge of this salvation from Christians, and it will then be found that even Laplanders believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and stand at the last day on the King's right hand.

* In a letter from the neighbourhood of Källa: "The swell experienced after the storm, which many persons have constantly raised by their contending for the law, has, wonderfully enough, considerably diminished since your visit here."

It is difficult clearly to trace the origin of the Laplanders, but it is believed, from their bodily appearance, their visage, their language, and mode of life, that they came from some of the many tribes of Central Asia. If this is correct, then they are undoubtedly the first who set foot on Swedish ground, and we have reason, in a certain sense, to regard them as our ancestors. If the Lapps have seldom experienced the protection of civil law, they have been more grievously overlooked in moral and Christian respects. When the Evangelical reformed doctrine was introduced into Sweden, all ordinances belonging to the Church were extended throughout the land, even including the Fells, and ordained clergymen were placed there. Let the following example show the zeal for the welfare of the Laplanders manifested by the clergy. Many a Lappish youth rarely saw the clergyman before the day of confirmation, and could perhaps read, perhaps say, and often the whole amount of instruction previous to confirmation was given during a single afternoon, sometimes in one or two hours. The youths were then confirmed in the baptismal vow, and entered on the communion roll as members of Christ's Church, knowing little more than the deer around them. When the period came round for the annual visit of the clergyman to the Lapp chapel, a number of these so-called Christians assembled to hear a short sermon, to pay their church dues in cheese, flesh, or money, receiving a glass or two of brandy from the minister's keg, and then partaking of the Lord's Supper. And this constituted the Evangelical training of these people according to the general order of things. Often has the missionary in his wanderings met with aged Laplanders who could not read, had never seen a Bible, and never heard of Jesus the Saviour of sinners.

To understand the condition of the Laplanders we must bear in mind their scattered and migratory state, making it very difficult for stationary teachers to reach them, especially if the teacher is deficient in zeal for these scattered sheep, and only remembers them when they are seen by him once or twice in the year. It is plain, therefore, that if this long-rejected and oppressed people are ever to be converted to Christianity and made partakers of Gospel light and life, this must be done by earnest missionaries devoted to the work. Such a mission has now entered its twenty-fifth year, and under the guidance and blessing of God has effected much; but, alas! it is even yet so feeble that we are disposed to enquire with the Disciples, "what are these among so many?" It is, nevertheless, a work of God, as will appear if we briefly trace its origin and progress. About thirty years since, a slender youth walked the streets of Stockholm, an orphan, descended from a noble family in the south of Sweden. He was unknown and unnoticed, but in God's wise counsels he was marked as a powerful instrument for good to Lapland. But he must first himself experience the great change whereby he should be made a partaker of the grace of Christ, and being penetrated, filled therewith, become possessed of his mind and influenced by his love, and thus be endowed with power from on high for his future work. God so ordered it that all this took place, not by means of a Swedish clergyman, but by a foreigner, the excellent English pastor, George Scott, who was the instrument in God's hand of the young orphan's enlightenment and conversion. With marvellous consistency and decision, the young convert held fast his integrity, though exposed to contempt and injustice from those who misunderstood him. With a truly Christian and earnest zeal he cared for the everlasting welfare of himself and others. Around him he saw many, in ignorance and thoughtlessness, living without God in the world—crowds of neglected children growing up to be the prey of vice and crime—the Bible seldom seen and rarely used; and he was ready with the sword of Christ, which is the Word of God, both within and around the capital, to labour in love for the good of ol' and young, inviting them to enter the kingdom of Christ. In his deep poverty, he was compelled to sell a silver table-spoon given him by his godmother, and therefore much prized, to procure a brief subsistence. Means for the support of the young missionary-elect had been obtained by Mr. Scott from England, and he knew this, but regarded this money as too holy to be taken by him while he had any property of his own. You already conclude that this youth was our beloved Tellfröm, now labouring in Asele Lapland. While Tellfröm was thus engaged, a book came into his hands, descriptive of the former and present state of the Laplanders. The perusal of this book deeply affected him, and he could not shake off the impression made on his warm heart by the statements he read. To his earnest prayer he received an answer, which he could not mistake: "Thou shalt go to Lapland, and offer to its benighted people the Word of Life." Tellfröm obeyed the heavenly calling, and prepared to enter upon this work and labour of love, weighing carefully the privations and dangers therewith connected. He was sometimes perplexed because of his poverty, and the question how he was to reach Lapland and be sustained there, caused him considerable anxiety; but he acted upon the direction: "casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you." By the good hand of God, and the exertions of his faithful friend, Mr. Scott, the way opened. A Swedish missionary society had just been formed, and Tellfröm, at the close of a religious meeting, made the first collection for that society. The society adopted Lapland as a field of labour, and in 1836 Tellfröm was appointed its first missionary there.* With joy, hope, and yet trembling, he entered the country from Umea, and resided for a season with the clergyman at Lycksele, where he soon acquired a knowledge of the difficult language, and began his cautious, calmly fervent labours both amongst Lapps and Swedish settlers. His ten years' work there would, no doubt, have been even more successful had he not, by exposure, brought upon himself a rheumatic fever, which for ever destroyed the elastic energy of his youthful and previously healthy body. By a visit to Stockholm, where he lodged in Mr. Scott's house, he partially recovered and returned to his beloved work, accomplishing what was possible.

He has trained, in the village school of Kraften-Lycksele parish, a number of Lapp youths of both sexes, who have returned, after two years' residence and instruction, to carry home the influence of Christian light and love, for the advantage of their ignorant parents. Nor have the Swedes been forgotten by our faithful friend. He has on his numerous and extensive journeys sought every opportunity, by conversation, instruction, and addresses, to bring old and young to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, and precious fruit of this labour has appeared. He established the Lycksele auxiliary to the Swedish Missionary Society, the temperance society, and a society called "Friends of the Word," for the circulation of tracts, Christian literature, and especially the Holy Scriptures. Amongst the youths placed under Tellfröm's instruction was a peasant's son from a distant Fell village. He was modest, thoughtful, diligent, and evidently led by the Spirit of Christ; and he was ere long accepted as an agent of the mission. Isaac Nordfyell has proved a worthy coadjutor to Tellfröm. In the summer of 1845 Tellfröm undertook, by desire of the society, a journey on foot throughout Lapland, for the purpose of ascertaining the most likely localities for additional schools. The village of Latsjö, in the parish of Fölinge, was first selected, and arrangements were made for establishing a school; and to this place Tellfröm and Nordfyell removed in the beginning of 1846. They commenced their work by holding a missionary prayer meeting, and they soon witnessed that which confirmed them in their opinion of the ignorant and debased condition of the people. During the first years of their labours, they only discovered more fully the prevailing wickedness and misery, and could not escape painful contact with the flood of ungodliness which threatened to destroy all good. But they endured all by the grace of God, and to our surprise; and pursued their way with such meekness, love, wisdom, and prudence, and were so untiring in their evangelizing efforts, that at the beginning of the third year, the blessing of the Lord came down upon that unpromising field, and a powerful awakening took place, undoubtedly the first that ever took place in that province. This awakening embraced not only the Swedes, but a large number of the Lappish school children, and not a few of the adults. This created no small stir in the neighbourhood. The kingdom of Satan was in danger, and ignorance, banded with unbelief, entered willingly into the service of the enemy, and a determination was soon manifested to destroy the newly-established mission school. The catechists meanwhile remained quiet amid all the uproar, peacefully doing their work, and leaving it to the Lord to make His cause victorious. The triumph came before they could have expected it, and this victory of truth over falsehood opened new doors and hearts for God's Word, and led to a great extension of the good work. On every side were heard songs of praise to Him who had protected His servants, brought to nought the designs of the enemy, and preserved in continuance an open and abundant well of water for the many awakened souls who thirsted for salvation. The Lord be praised to all eternity; a bright light had sprung up in the formerly dark land by this institution; the old, almost bestial life, in its many unmentionable forms, gradually disappeared; and Christian social circles, where spiritual songs, religious conversation, and the reading of God's Word and good books were heard, took the place. The wonders accomplished by God's blessing on the labours of His servants, during twelve years in Jemtland, cannot be described with ink and pen, but some things may be named. In a land where the Bible was almost unknown, many thousand copies are now found, not to mention the innumerable books, tracts, and religious papers put into circulation. The missionary work, of which all were ignorant, is now known and loved; temperance associations, based on Christian ground, have removed many obstructions in the way of successful evangelistic effort; thousands of rational beings, and thousands of bushels of grain, have alike been snatched from destruction and rendered useful. The society for the cultivation of sacred music has been beneficial; regular Bible classes for the consecutive reading and study of Holy Scripture are held on the Sabbath afternoons; missionary societies prosper greatly; provident societies have also been established by Tellfröm; but chiefly the unwearied declaration of Gospel truth in all directions, and the consequent awakening to serious concern, must be regarded as the mainspring of the whole.

All history shows that a Christian people are not always found in the spirit of triumph. The same crowd who now shout "Hosanna!" may soon cry "Crucify Him!" But it is no less true, that the greater the amount of grace and privilege bestowed upon a people, the greater is the return which the Lord expects from them; and if this land does not gratefully embrace and value the abounding grace which God during twelve years has offered, he continues righteous as when he said by the Apostle: "Because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved, God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness."

At the close of 1857, our dear friends removed, much to our sorrow and loss, but by order of the Missionary Society, to Asele Lapland, where in the village of Gafsele they established a school, which others had twice before attempted without success. The people received them most gladly. After a few days' preparation, the school was in full operation with a number of Lappish and a few Swedish children. The accommodation for the school and the families of the catechists was very insufficient, but uncomplainingly they laboured on for one-and-a-half years, establishing all their other departments of usefulness in addition to the school. They have secured the confidence of the clergy, and by the incumbent's desire Tellfröm has the use of the church monthly for the missionary meeting, and on all church festivals he conducts a preaching service in the church. The zeal and liberality of the villagers have been manifested in the erection of suitable school buildings, which were consecrated to their important use on the very day on which the late King, Oscar I., died.

A working meeting has been formed amongst the females, which is useful. Here also opposition and enmity have been encountered, not so much, however, from the ignorant and rude, as from so-called religious persons, who only seek to promote party spirit. Much subtlety was manifested in endeavours to undermine the good work by seeking to injure those who had charge of it, and destroy confidence in them. But these experienced warriors, not even ignorant of perils amongst false brethren, and clad in the whole armour of God, quietly stand in the evil day, and faithfully attend to the "great work" given them to do. For this assault also they committed to the Lord; and when it appeared that the attack must succeed, the Lord destroyed the whole fabric of lies; and over the ruined plot of the enemy God's servants sing again the praises of the Lord, for He is good, and His mercy endureth for ever.

We desire, in closing, to ask with all humility whether something may not be done for the school in Gafsele by some working circle in Stockholm to send useful articles as gifts to Tellström, who shows his wisdom in the manner in which he distributes what is intrusted to him to aid and encourage the scholars. "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase, so shall thy barns be filled with plenty."

ITALY.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

IS THERE NO PROTESTANT SCHOOL IN FLORENCE TO WHICH CONVERTS CAN SEND THEIR CHILDREN?

In the last number of Evangelical Christendom appeared a letter from Florence, which has excited some astonishment in various quarters. The writer, though on the spot, seems more ignorant of the state of things there than people at a distance from it. He says, for instance, that there is in that city no school to which converts can send their children, and on that account he wishes to establish three schools in Florence before his return to England. If you kindly turn to Evangelical Christendom for October last, and read the account of the meeting of the Gustavus Adolphus Society at Ulm, in Germany, you will find that, on that occasion, notices were given in regard to the state of evangelization in Italy. Among these you find the statement that at Turin there are three Protestant schools, at Genoa two, at Leghorn three, and at Florence two. This statement was made by one whose knowledge of the facts no one can question, and whose veracity no one can doubt.* Besides the two schools already mentioned, one for boys and one for girls—both in connexion with the Vaudois mission—there is a very good one carried on by the deaconesses from Kaiserswerth, and also a Swiss school. Your correspondent also mentions an infant school, but of that I have not been able to procure any further information. This would, however, make five, no inconsiderable beginning for a place so lately opened to evangelization, and ought to be made known to British Christians, so as to calm the anxiety they might be led to feel about the children of the converts at Florence. For the future we may entertain the hope that, in the providence of God, the number of these converts may greatly increase, and in consequence the want of more schools for their children also proportionably be felt, so that it may be desirable to open many more. I am sure that every one will rejoice when such a moment comes. We are now only speaking of the present time, and simply stating facts.

THE PREACHING OF THE WORD OF GOD IN FLORENCE

is well attended in both places where it is carried on in the Italian language, at the meetings mentioned by your correspondent, where Sigs. Magrini and Gualicri are the Evangelists; and in the locale belonging to the Scotch Church, where Professor Geymonat, of the Vaudois College, preaches and expounds. The priests are, it seems, furious. To frighten the people away from the meetings, threats have been issued that bombs would be bursting some of these days at both these places of worship. A friend writes to me from Florence: "We certainly are coming to a crisis—it behoves us to stand fast in the faith. The attitude of France towards Popery exasperates the priests, they will make a last effort to move the people to rebellion, and unless the civil force is firm to duty, much mischief might be done, but in the end we know that truth will prevail."

The Vaudois mission is in great trouble just now about the locales for preaching. Notice has been given to Mr. MacDougall, the Scotch minister in Florence, that if he continues to allow the Vaudois to preach in the same place of worship where the Scotch have their services, they must all quit. In Pisa there have been troubles, and also at Leghorn, where a kind of barn, or place consisting only of four walls, was bought to be fitted up as a place of worship. When it was nearly finished, about a fortnight ago, orders came from the Governor to discontinue the work, for a representation had been made to him that it was too near to a Roman Catholic Church. Mr. Revel immediately went to Leghorn, saw the Governor, and explained to him the real position of the place, of which he knew nothing, showed him that the two congregations could in no way interfere with each other, and the Governor promised to consider the matter. This ended, however, in a reiterated refusal. Two years ago, permission was given to build a theatre on the same spot. That would not have interfered with the Roman Catholic Church! Representations have now been made to the authorities at Florence, and we shall see how the matter ends.

THE YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATION CALLED THE BALSILLE.

This is an association formed by the young Vaudois students at La Tour a few years ago. It has now two sections—one still at La Tour, one at Florence. They mutually encourage each other by correspondence to remain united in spirit, feeling that union is power. They meet in Florence every Friday evening, begin by prayer. They prepare papers on theological subjects to be read when together, and some little piece of Italian poetry as an exercise. They terminate with prayer, which they consider to be the most blessed part of their evening occupations, and also exercise themselves in singing.

THE ADVENTURE OF A YOUNG VAUDOIS STUDENT.

The priests began during carnival time to preach against the Protestants, and to cover them with abuse. M. Geymonat and some of the students of the Vaudois College went to hear them, some taking notes of what the priest said. This annoyed the people greatly. One day the church was nearly dark; another time some young men got round one of the students, and asked him "why he took notes?" "We never go to your meetings," they said. They were told that they would be welcome if they did. They continued to tease the young student, and going out of church they gave him blows. They insulted M. Geymonat, and a young English lady who was there too, because she rather incautiously said, "O, poor people, what stuff you are hearing!"

Two days later another young student, M. Gay, went to the Church of San Felicità, to hear Father Souse. The priest fell out terribly against the Evangelicals. "They had mutilated the Bible,"—"they had taken away many parts, amongst others the epistle of St. James!" Gay was sorely tried, but he kept quiet till, just as he was going out of Church, he saw a woman say: "They are strange, those Protestants; they pretend that they are all priests!" Whereupon he could contain himself no longer, and, holding up his book in the sight of all, he said: "It is so, and this is the Word of God where it is written, and I can prove it!" Upon this the people surrounded him, pushed him, it even came to blows, while he only continued to hold up his Bible, saying, "it is the Bible, the true Bible!" This took place outside the church, while the angry crowd kept crying, "Protestants! Protestants!" Policemen in the meantime came up, and arrested M. Gay as the cause of the disturbance. It was as well for his safety to do so, surrounded as he was by an incensed mob. The priests in the meantime got up the story that he had disturbed the service, which was not true. He was taken to the Mutali prison. During the first days no one was allowed to see him, and he must have been rather dull, poor fellow! not being permitted to have any books. After some days, however, Mr. Revel got permission to go and see him along with the "Judge Instructor," who made light of the case. He did not seem to be cast down, and it must be mentioned that he had been kindly treated during his imprisonment. After a regular examination had taken place, he was let out.

This account is taken partly from private letters, partly from the Gazetta del Popolo, a daily paper published at Florence. The article is written by Professor B., a Roman Catholic, but one of liberal views, as will be seen by the following extract:—

"The Vaudois and religious liberty are two affections, almost two passions, with me. I love them (the Vaudois) because, during many years' intercourse with and intimate knowledge of them, I have never, from any of them, heard a lie, or even a concealment of the truth, whilst (who can contradict me?) we can scarcely take a step without hearing a falsehood. I love liberty of conscience, because without it all our newly acquired independence and annexation would be worth nothing."

P.S.—Just as I had sent off my letter to you, one came from Florence, and I will give you a few more facts. The number of girls in the Vaudois school is nineteen at present, and many more are just going to enter. The boys' school has about the same number, and there also many new ones are announced. At the school of the deaconesses there are thirty-six children, mostly foreigners, but it is open to Italians, as many as like to come. It is cheap, and they receive an excellent education. I forgot to mention in my letter that there is also a Sunday school commenced by the Vaudois students. Two or three young men have joined themselves to the young men's association, which I have already mentioned to you.

Two ladies went the other day to the Church of San Gaetano, to hear whether the priests really said such bad things against the Protestants. They came back astounded at what they had heard. The priest had said "that there was more hope of the Mohammedans being saved than the Protestants. The latter would certainly be damned for ever! One could understand why the St. Bartholomew massacre had taken place, to rid the world of that plague!" The writer adds: "The iniquity of Italy is great, and many love to have it so. It will take time to bring about a better state of things. Those who are in the vanguard, to fight their way through this mass of ignorance and superstition, have no easy task."

They are still opposing the opening of the Protestant place of worship at Leghorn. They pretend that a road must go through the place.

The Lord reigns! May that be our consolation!

TURKEY.

MISSION FIELD OF TURKEY.

BULGARIA.

From the Rev. W. Morse, Adrianople.

Previous to 1764 the Bulgarians had their own patriarch and bishop; but at that time the crafty Samuel I., Greek Patriarch, procured the absorption of the Bulgarian patriarchate into that of his own Church.

The Bulgarians of European Turkey are now three or four times the number of the Greeks; and they justly feel that they can submit no longer to such degradation and oppression, and they strongly desire the recognition of their ancient privileges.

After the granting of the famous Hatti-Houmayoun they applied for the independent recognition of their Church. They were refused, but this only tended to strengthen them for another application. There are ten to urge it now where there was but one three years ago.

Meantime the breach between them and the Greeks has been growing wider and wider. The Greeks accuse the Bulgarians of plotting against the Government; the Bulgarians proclaim their fidelity to the Porte, and substitute in their liturgies the name of the Sultan for that of the Greek Patriarch. They have demanded the reading of the service in the Sclavie instead of the Greek. The contest has sometimes been so fierce as to lead to bloodshed in the churches; but the Bulgarians have generally gained the upper hand. Thus last year, at the election of the Greek Patriarch, Turnova, Sophia and Philippopolis refused to send delegates, saying that they did not recognise the Greek Church.

During the recent visit of the Grand Vizier through Bulgaria, petitions were sent in from almost every town for the independent recognition of their Church. It is now time for an answer; but the Porte, beset with so many difficulties, is inclined to put off so perplexing a question.

A short time since the Bulgarians resolved, in a council of 150 delegates from the various towns, that if the Porte did not give them an answer to their petition within fourteen days, they would accept the proposition made to them above twelve months ago by the Pope, to acknowledge him as the head of their Church, and at the same time to retain all their ancient Church privileges, and thus become Catholics in a body. This is favoured by the intrigues of the Jesuits, and politically by all the power of France. Above two years since, a paper was started with the captivating title of "Bulgaria," which claimed to be strictly devoted to the Bulgarian interests. It was extensively taken; soon began to show its Catholic leanings; and next threw off all disguise. This paper has assiduously urged upon the Bulgarians this course, and it is probable that some of the delegates sincerely desired such a result, while others resorted to it as a means to obtain their rights; yet if they cannot do this, preferring Popery to returning to the Greek Church, it is for the political interests of the Porte and of England that this separation should take place, and we have confidently expected that it would. Sir Henry Bulwer has expressed his opinion to the Porte, but as the question has political bearings, he has not thought proper to urge it. Should the Bulgarians become Catholics, the cause of truth will be greatly retarded; whereas it would be greatly promoted if they could secure their rights through the aid of Protestant England. As may well be supposed, the past two weeks have been weeks of solicitude and prayer; and this morning it was a relief to hear that the Bulgarians have deferred for the present the execution of their threat. They may execute it hereafter, and at this critical time it is especially becoming that Christians should make them the subject of prayer.

The bearings of this question on our work are apparent. When letters were sent out to the various towns, inquiring whether, if the Porte did not give a favourable answer, they would accept the proposition of the Pope, one of the first things done was to consult the missionaries. At Turnova, the brother of the man who has been elected head man of the nation went to consult with Mr. Long; at Eski Zagra, the head teacher conferred with Mr. Byington; and the same thing has taken place here. In this struggle also, the Bulgarians are led to examine the teachings of the Scriptures, and to compare them with those of the Greek Church. One of their leading delegates here has put out a pamphlet, in language so earnest and forcible as to remind us of Luther at the commencement of the Reformation. The awakened state of mind which they are in also leads them to inquire why they may not as well become Protestants as Catholics; so that, in case they should decide to go over to the Pope, some, doubtless, would meanwhile become Protestants.

Meantime our books are selling extensively. One of the students sent from Bebek into the Sophia field has sold above 5,000 piastres' worth in two months, and the work will, perhaps, be full upon us before we are prepared for it.

PHILIPPOPOLIS.

From the Rev. Mr. Clarke.

The interest felt here and in many other places seems to render a school desirable. We anxiously await the time when an efficient band of young men will enter the surrounding villages and preach the Gospel, for the people are now ready to hear. Whenever our helpers and colporteurs have been to these villages, they have found willing listeners; and the Bulgarian peasants, who are now learning to think for themselves, feel that the religion that has only an ignorant priesthood for its teachers is not according to their want. Thus far the masses have been blind followers of blind leaders, while the educated, though despising the priests, have feared to take any open measures against their empty forms, but have devoted themselves to education.

During the past few months the work has been advancing, and the Scriptures are in the hands of many as seed to germinate. Three colporteurs have been engaged in selling the Scriptures, and have sold about 10,000 piastres' worth in nine months. One travelled west, through Samokoa and Usoup, and returned by Salonica. A second went north, to Sophia, Nissa, and Widin, stopping at several great fairs, and met with much success.

Another subject awakening our anxiety is the rising of the Bulgarians against the Greek hierarchy. They feel they have rights, and claim them. The Bulgarians here are not ready to follow their Romish leaders, though what they will do, if their demands are not granted, is more than we can tell. We leave them in the hands of Him who can assist them.

PERSIA.

DEATH OF THE NESTORIAN PATRIARCH—HIS SUCCESSOR—BEARING OF THE CHANGE ON MISSION PROSPECTS—DEPLORABLE CIVIL CONDITION OF PERSIA—VICTORY BY THE TURCOMANS—CHEERING ASPECT OF THE ARMENIAN MISSION FIELD IN PERSIA—SPREAD OF THE GOSPEL TO THE RUSSIAN POSSESSIONS ON THE CASPIAN—THE WEEK OF PRAYER AMONG THE MISSIONARIES TO THE NESTORIANS—YOUNG MEN'S SEMINARY.

Mount Seir, Oroomiah, Dec. 27th, 1860.

Many of your readers may be interested to learn the demise of the Nestorian Patriarch, Mar Shimon, which occurred a few days ago. It is, as a matter of course, an event of considerable importance to the people, who have looked to him as their religious, and, in a sense, as their civil head. Mar Shimon was hardly past the prime of life, a man of commanding person, good abilities, and quite irreproachable morals. When under the influence of his most talented brother, Dia Isaac, he was disposed to maintain cordial and friendly relations with us; but, unfortunately, he was more frequently advised by his more hostile and bigoted brothers, and other evil-minded men. In general he was opposed to our labours—openly so far as a crafty policy would allow, and secretly to an extent that was unquestion-ably a great detriment to the progress of the Gospel, particularly in the Mount districts. He has long been in feeble health, and it is not improbable that the belligerent state of the Mount districts for the last two years, and the differences existing between him and the Turkish authorities, have hastened his death.

His successor is an amiable youth of seventeen or eighteen years. He appears to be liberal-minded and cordial in his bearing towards us. He visited Oroomiah last summer, was a regular attendant upon our worship, and gave encouragement that he would enter our seminary the present session. He cherishes a profound respect for his uncle, Dia Isaac, who is a valuable co-worker in the Gospel here, where he resides. Upon the receipt of the mournful intelligence, Dia Isaac repaired to the patriarchate, and it is not improbable that he will remove there with his family. Should this desirable arrangement be effected, we should calculate upon the permanent sympathy of the young Patriarch with Evangelical labours. Should it not, the relapse of the young man into the more hostile and intolerant policy of his other relations and advisers may be apprehended. That he will occupy the medium or semi-neutral ground of his predecessor is not to be supposed, and either extreme will hardly fail to work for the furtherance of the Gospel. Under the benignant counsels of his good uncle, an enviable post of responsibility and usefulness is before him, which we hope and pray he may be enabled to choose for himself; but should he yield to his more violent and unprincipled advisers, he will find himself without the respect or prestige of his predecessor, and will have to commend the Gospel to his people by the contrasts he will furnish. Those who pray for the Gospel in these lands will not fail to remember its interests at this critical juncture.

The civil condition of Persia could scarcely be more deplorable than at present. Nearly the whole of the Shah's available army, 80,000 in number, has been captured or routed by the Turcomans, almost without the firing of a gun. About 40,000 are reported to have been carried captives to Tartary, with the whole artillery, commissariat, &c. The captives are retained for redemption, at prices dictated by their conquerors. The remainder of the army have fled, only, as it would seem, to encounter the fury of the King, who is irreconcilable at their stupid and cowardly conduct. It is believed that many of the surviving officers will be executed without mercy as soon as they fall into the hands of the enraged Shah. The catastrophe will necessarily demoralise and weaken the Government, and can hardly fail to hasten the interference of the Great Powers in the settlement of affairs, probably already beyond the control of the present incumbent of the throne.

The Armenian field in Persia has never looked so ripe for the Gospel as at present. Their population in the whole empire is estimated at about 40,000. Those in this locality are purchasing the books issued from Constantinople, and some seem to be inquiring after the truth. We need better assurances of protection before inaugurating labours among them. And yet are we not commanded to go forward, trusting in the Lord to divide the waters before us as we advance?

The leaven of the Gospel seems to be working quite effectually among Armenians in the Russian possessions of Tiflis and the Caspian, although no foreign helpers are there employed. Our hearts have often been cheered, particularly with accounts from Shirwan, in the vicinity of the Caspian. An altogether unusual restiveness and spirit of religious inquiry exists among Mussulmans also in our vicinity.

We ourselves, and our village congregations, some forty in number, most cordially join in the concert of prayer proposed by your Alliance Committee. We anticipated most beneficial results from the meetings. How significant and providential is this world-wide concert!

The watchmen join their voice
And tuneful notes employ,
Jerusalem breaks forth in songs,
And deserts learn the joy.

Our seminary of fifty young men are gathered for their winter session on Mount Seir. Good application and considerable seriousness prevail. We have the promise of a pleasant and profitable session.

Letters just received inform us of the expected return of Dr. Perkins, the senior member of our mission, the coming spring.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER AT NAGERCOIL—INCREASED INTEREST AMONG THE NATIVES IN THE ORDINANCES OF RELIGION—DEVOTIONAL EXERCISES CONDUCTED BY CONVERTS—RICHARD KNILL—HOPES AND ASPIRATIONS.

FROM A MISSIONARY.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.
Nagercoil, South Travancore, Feb. 4, 1861.

Dear Sir,—I have long promised myself the pleasure of writing to thank you for so kindly and so constantly forwarding to me Evangelical Christendom; and now, as we have recently held our special prayer-meetings, in answer to the invitation of the Evangelical Alliance, I think I cannot do better than, after thanking you for the magazine, to give you a very short account of the manner in which the people under my care kept the feast of prayer.

When I have finished reading your excellent periodical, I pass it on to those of my young men who know enough of English to be able to read it with profit; and it is more in their behalf than in my own even that I thank you for it. It enables them to see that they belong to a very large family, and that in almost every nation under heaven, and in almost every tongue, the name of Jesus is praised and adored. They learn, too, that Protestant Christianity is the same all over the world, and that its disciples everywhere are heirs to the same promises, though subject to the same trials of faith and patience. When they read of what others suffer for the name of Christ, they do not look upon their own fiery trial as some strange thing happening to them. They learn to look on such things as consequences of a profession of faith in Christ, and I am sure they are the better for informing themselves of what is passing in the world among the servants of Christ. I hope they will reap so much good from it that their profiting may appear to all. Accept therefore, on their behalf and my own, my best thanks.

The special services began on the 6th Jan. On that day I had the happiness of preaching to a good congregation of Tamil Christians on the same subject, on which hundreds even have been discoursing in scores of languages all over the world,—viz., the promise of the Spirit. The people under my care at present number over 6,000 professing Christians, who live in villages scattered over about twenty square miles of country, and are taught by nearly fifty catechists; and on that day these fifty men were preaching in their several congregations on this one subject. We had translated into Tamil the addresses contained in your August number, and had 1,000 copies printed and circulated among the people of the missions in Travancore, so that they were prepared somewhat for the services. Last year, at our home station, we held special services, in answer to the invitation of the Loodiana missionaries; but this year the services have been more general.

On Monday I attended a meeting at one of our large classes, in a district in which some two hundred, from three or four congregations in the neighbourhood, were present. Nine prayers were offered, and I for one felt it good to be there. On Tuesday I went to another village, when about the same number met together. Ten prayers were offered up, and the presence of God was manifestly felt by many. Amongst those who engaged in prayer were a Brahmin, a Soodra, one who had been a Mohammedan, the rest being Shanars, or rather such were their designations when they were heathens. Now, however, they are without difference, all being one in Christ. They met on that platform which is common to all who wish to come to God. The prayers offered were for a closer union and deeper spirituality among the disciples of Christ. May their prayers be answered!

On Wednesday and Thursday I was at our home station; the meetings were well attended, and the influence good. I am thankful to say of the people of Nagercoil, that since the commencement of 1859, they have taken increased pleasure in the ordinances of God's house, and have of their own will established there a free weekly and daily prayer-meetings in the village—amongst them one for women, held every day at twelve o'clock. They have, I believe, received the first droppings of the heavenly shower, and now we are looking up for the fulness of the blessing.

On Friday I was present at a meeting in the northern part of my district, and was glad to see a large number of men and women from the different congregations in the neighbourhood, though many of them had to travel some five or six miles, and though it was the beginning of the paddy harvest. The majority of those present were formerly slaves to the Soodras in these parts, and were for years kept in a state of absolute ignorance and wretchedness. Now, though there are very few amongst them who can read, yet by patient and continued instruction, many have been taught the first principles of the doctrine of Christ, and are, I hope, going on to know the Lord. Two or three of them engaged in prayer, and though it was with a stammering tongue, it was most pleasing to hear. After the meeting concluded, as most of them came from a distance and were to return in the middle of the day, they all—Shanars and Parias by caste—returned to the house of the catechist to take a little refreshment before they set out. I was the more pleased with this, as it arose with themselves. The meeting was held in a chapel built by the late venerable Richard Knill, at the time he was a missionary here. The chapel is very old now, and must soon be pulled down to make room for another, at least as soon as funds can be obtained for the purpose. I could not but think of the good man who rejoiced so much when the chapel was commenced, and thought how much more he would have rejoiced, could he have seen his chapel filled as it was with those who professed and called themselves Christians, praying for the outpouring of the Holy Ghost on all ministers and teachers of God's Word.

On Saturday I was again at our home station, when prayers were offered, and an address on the coming of the Kingdom delivered.

On Lord's Day, the 13th, I preached at the head station of the Jamestown district, which, for the time being, is under my care. At every station on this day also, sermons were delivered on the subject appointed, and in most congregations an evening prayer-meeting closed the services of the week. I have learnt since from the reports of the catechist, that in many of the congregations the people met together three times a day for prayer, during the whole eight days.

When I think of how many thousands have been engaged in offering prayer to God during this week, and remember the promise, "If two of you shall agree on earth, as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father who is in heaven," I feel assured great good must follow these special services. The Lord is now pouring out His spirit. The fact of this invitation being given by the Evangelical Alliance is a proof that He is, and that it has been so generally accepted, is another. But I, for one, want to see the people more alive to God, less anxious for this world, and more zealous in making known the Gospel of Christ.

We have not in these eight days asked that signs and wonders might follow; but we have asked for the Spirit. We are willing that He should blow upon us as the gentle zephyrs blow, or that He should come as a mighty rushing wind. We are not anxious about the manner of His coming—we want only His presence.

Begging that you will remember us and our people in your prayers,

I remain, &c.

TRIUMPHS OF EDUCATION AND TRIUMPHS OF GRACE.

We have been favoured with an interesting extract of a letter from another missionary in India, which we subjoin:—

. Ellore.

Our mission is a most interesting one, the great body of the people are very well to do, and as far as I can judge, highly intelligent, and as far as the great towns are concerned, in the main, well educated; the greater number after the native fashion, but not a few even highly educated in the great school established in Bunder (Masulipatam) by our brother, Mr. Noble, who is the senior missionary. He came out with Mr. Fox, of whom a touching memoir has been published, and now for nearly twenty years he has laboured at his post without intermission from sickness or absence, for a single week, I believe. His is a noble school; it is reserved exclusively for the higher classes, which our brother has interpreted to mean higher castes, and certainly it is a noble sight to see those boys. The Hindu, and especially the caste Hindu, is of all times most interesting in youth—sometimes these boys are actually lovely (in form and face)—eyes beaming with intelligence, finely-formed features, a noble bearing, and an insatiable thirst for knowledge, and great docility are so many attractions in the caste boys. As they grow up, these generally fade away, and it is a well-known fact that after a time the Hindu intellect becomes stationary, if I may use the term, and no further increase of knowledge is made, the burning thirst for money usurping every other principle. There are 180 boys in Mr. Noble's school (that was the number when last I was in Bunder), and many good scholarships granted by Government and by private individuals, keep many of the boys in the school for a much longer period than is generally the case; and as Mr. Noble is a man of superior education, the standard in the school is very high. But besides these triumphs of secular education, I am glad to tell you there have been some nobler triumphs of grace. When I joined, in 1857, there were five young men firmly grounded in the faith and well grounded in the truth of God, living with Mr. Noble. Since then two have entered upon the Lord's work; one, a fine, intellectual young man, has charge of sixty boys in our Anglo-Indian school here; another, not so intellectual, but more enthusiastic, is engaged in itinerating work with Mr. Darling, and a more powerful preacher I have never heard; so you see the seed has become reproductive.

Lately we have had the Spirit stirring among us, after (as we thought) a long intermission. A fine, loving boy, who for years had been reading and praying in private with Mr. Noble, came to him one Saturday, and said: "Sir, I can no longer deny my conviction. I want to confess Christ openly, as I have believed on him in my heart." Mr. Noble said: "Very well, come to school on Monday, and I will give you an opportunity of confessing Christ before your schoolfellows; then I will receive you." On the following Monday all were assembled together to hear the Word of God read, and Mr. Noble said: "Boys, most of you give me satisfaction in your lessons, and many of you are good boys, but very few believe on Jesus Christ our Lord. Is there any one here who believes in Jesus? if so, let him stand up." No one stirred. Again the words were repeated to them. The little boy stood up in the middle of the school and said: "Yes, I believe on Jesus Christ." Mr. Noble again asked: "Do you really believe on Jesus as your Saviour?" "Yea, I do truly believe," said the little boy. Mr. Noble then sent him to the Mission House, and he had to go immediately before the judge, and declare his desire to become a Christian, which was boldly done, in the presence of a weeping mother and threatening heads. He truly made a good confession before many witnesses; and though many attempts were afterwards privately made to withdraw him from the faith, he stands firm by the grace of God.

Then came the painful part to Mr. Noble. Many fine and hopeful boys were withdrawn from the school; every boy who had shown the least attachment to Mr. Noble, or to Christianity, was taken away. The same happens at every conversion, and is a source of great grief. One fine boy was thus removed and taken to a distant village, and every effort was made to shake his principles, temptations even against his morals having been freely used. This is a most common trial for young professors, but grace was given from above. He stood firm, and making his escape in the night-time, he reached Bunder, and received an asylum from Mr. Noble. Thus two brands were plucked from the burning in one week, to the confusion of Satan's emissaries and the triumph of the Lord's people. About the same time the Spirit visited my family, and my head servant, a remarkably intelligent man, and his wife, and Mrs. A——'s ayah (female servant), became obedient to the faith, confessed their penitence and faith in Jesus Christ, and were admitted into the fold of Christ. At the same time several new members were added to Mr. Darling's congregation, near the banks of the Krishna. I mention these facts to show you that, though to our mortal ken the work seems slow, we are not without encouragement and evidence that the Lord is amongst His people, and in His own good time will hasten His own work. "The people will be willing in the day of His power." I am convinced He will at last hear and answer the prayers of His saints, and when He begins to work, the labourers will not be able to compass the work, as was the case in our own land lately. I was going to write you something of my own work, but I must close at once, praying for a great blessing to be poured upon your prayer union, and upon the university generally.

I remain, my dear brother,

Yours very truly in Christ Jesus,
J. N. A.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER AT ABBEOKUTA—A WEEKLY MEETING FOR PRAYER INSTITUTED—THE WAR AND ITS CONSEQUENCES—INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIAN BENEFICENCE—A LIFE SAVED AND A SOUL SUBDUED.

Abbeokuta, Feb. 4, 1861.

The missionaries in Abbeokuta agreed some months past to observe the week of prayer beginning with Jan. 8, 1861. We invited our friends in the interior to join us, but the war in which the country is engaged prevented it. We are, however, a considerable body, European and native missionaries, native helpers, and converts of our various Churches. We have no place of worship sufficiently large to hold the number of persons which an extraordinary occasion might call forth. We therefore requested as many of the native Christians as were so disposed to meet by themselves. Many did so. Several prayer meetings were therefore held at the same time in various places, some attended by native Christians alone, and another by Europeans and natives together. The recommended programme was followed; we could not amend it. The three Christian sects that are in Abbeokuta united in it—namely, members of the Church of England, Wesleyans, and American Baptists. It was a time of great comfort and refreshment to us, and we look still to the Lord to grant us still greater blessings.

After the last meeting it was proposed and responded to, that we should hold a general meeting for prayer every Monday afternoon at half-past four o'clock, at the Ake Church, as being most central, to be conducted by each missionary in turn. One subject of prayer, one object to be obtained, was more immediately proposed—the preservation of the Churches more immediately affected by the present war, and the speedy restoration of peace. We trust, as the Lord has given us hearts to pray, so he will give us in due time the blessings we need.

The war now going on is costing many lives; it is not a mere slave war, but one with deeper interests at stake. We see also that it is drawing many to us who rejected our teaching in times gone by with contempt. Christian sympathy is felt for them in their distress—many have perished of hunger and neglect, and many have been rescued by Christian benevolence from the last stage of want. It is one of the means that our Saviour has given of drawing the heathen to the side of Christian truth. Active kindness and benevolence are powerful means—the heathen feel it. Our success in this country has been, under God, mainly due to the sympathy British Christians have shown to the negro slave: this opened the door of the country to us, and led the people to respect us from the first. The continued action of the same Christian principles draws the people more and more to us; to illustrate it I will give an instance. A poor man had a wife: she gave birth to a child, and in a few days died, leaving a healthy babe. The father, not knowing what to do, tells his friends to bury mother and child together. A native Christian recommends that the child should be preserved and taken to the missionary. It is done. The child grows. The father remains in his farm ill, for many months; at last he returns to town, and seeks the child whose death he had ordered. He prostrates himself before the child's nurse, pours out his thanks to her, and the next Sunday is seen to attend Christian worship. This occurred only a few days since. The poor man has taken up his abode with his child, and seems loth to leave her.

With many thanks to you for the information and pleasure we derive from your excellent publication,

Believe me to remain, Rev. Sirs,

Yours very sincerely,

H. TOWNSEND.

Brief Literary Notices.

The Penitent's Prayer: a Practical Exposition of the Fifty-first Psalm. By the Rev. THOMAS ALEXANDER, M.A. Chelsea: Nisbet and Co.

This is a very excellent book, and will be read with much advantage and profit. The author proves that he has a talent for patient research, and has here given the result of his study. Old mines, which were thought to be exhausted, or of whose existence the many were ignorant, he has worked again with advantage; and the numerous extracts from old and scarce works with which the book abounds are so skilfully arranged, as to give a pleasing variety to the subject without destroying its unity.

In addition to the ordinary version of the Psalm, we have a literal translation, which will be read with interest by those unacquainted with Hebrew; and still more some half-dozen metrical renderings, some of which are quaint, forcible, and beautiful; as will be readily believed when we mention the names of their authors, and their respective dates: Miles Coverdale, A.D. 1549; W. Hunnis, 1550; Geo. Withers, 1632; Geo. Sandys, 1636; Richard Baxter, 1692; and last, though not least, a version of exceeding beauty, by Mary, Countess of Pembroke, the date of which is about 1570. Thus the feelings of the true penitent may find much that is helpful in the way of confession from the poetic lines of sin-burdened mourners.

The question in what light a true penitent looks at sin, is one of great practical importance; for there is much spurious repentance in this world. Some repent towards themselves; others repent towards their fellow-creatures; but the true penitent sees that every act of sin is as a missile, which, while it strikes himself and others, does not stop till it reaches the throne of God. There is its greatest evil. Hence David says, "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight." On which our author remarks: "There is a sense in which this self-accusation of the Psalmist is not true. David had sinned against others besides God. He had sinned against this woman; against the child which was born to them of their adultery; against the woman's husband, whom he, in a way the most cunning and cowardly, foully did to the death: against every inhabitant of the whole land did the King sin; against his own household and every member of it; and against his own body had he sinned. . . . And yet, he says, 'Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned,' &c. The stars are bright and beautiful, and shine clear and full in the darkest night; but when the sun rises, the darkness flies away, and the golden stars are seen no more. They are all still there, and they shine as brightly as ever they shone. The sun in his beauty rules the day, and takes to himself all the glory. This is David's meaning here. He has not forgotten that his sin is sin against the sons of men. But the great thought of God fills his whole heart. He has eyes for none but God; Thou God seest me—seest me so distinctly, and hast me as surely before Thee, as if Thou hadst none but me to think about; as if Thou sawest me only; and, therefore, I see Thee as if I saw Thee alone; 'Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned.'" This is a fair specimen of the author's style and manner.

Lawrence for the Sanctuary. By Mrs. P. J. TURQUAND. With Introductory Preface and Memoir by her Husband. London: Tressider. P. 100.

How often does it happen that the Church is bereft of some of its most beloved and useful members in the earlier periods of the Christian life, when opportunity has been afforded only to give, and scarcely to unfold, the promise of surpassing excellence! So it was in the instance of the young and talented wife of Mr. Turquand. He gives a beautiful sketch of her character—beautiful from its simplicity and evident truthfulness; and the essay which follows, from her own pen, found by him among her papers after her demise, evinces powers of thought and composition, and an earnestness and elevation of piety, which fully warrant its publication.

Tales of Old Times in England. (For the young.) By LOUISA HATCHARD. Bath: Binns and Goodwin. P. 121.

This is the work of a young writer, and she writes for the young. Her first essay is highly creditable to her knowledge and skill: so much so that we trust she will meet with sufficient encouragement to induce her to resume her pen, and bring her story down to the more modern periods of our national history. The present volume commences with the Roman invasion, and ends with the Norman.

PAMPHLETS AND SERMONS.

The Scottish Episcopal Church, from its rise to the present time. By the Rev. J. D. MILLER, M.A. London: Seeley. This pamphlet constituted one of the papers read at the tercentenary celebration of the Scottish Reformation at Edinburgh. It exhibits a dark page in Scotland's ecclesiastical history, but we believe it to be faithfully drawn, and the contemplation of it may help to strengthen our Scottish brethren in their adherence to a sound Protestantism in doctrine and in their Church order.—God is Light: a Sermon preached at Great Waldenfield, Suffolk. By J. B. HEALY, B.A. Cambridge: Macmillan. We scarcely ever read a sermon from which so little is to be learnt, and that little so utterly destitute of the Gospel. We have failed to discover one Evangelical truth in it from beginning to end; while it opens with a puerile sneer at the doctrine of inspiration. From our hearts we pity the congregation destined to listen, Sunday after Sunday, to such vapid ambiguities and doctrineless generalities as make up this discourse.—What to Preach, and How. This is a seasonable reprint from the writings of one of the old Puritan divines, edited by the Rev. Thomas Mills, an Irish clergyman. It is a discourse founded on Ephesians iii. 8, and is characterised by the sound doctrine and peculiar style of the day in which it was written. It is especially designed for ministers, and is well worthy of their attention.—Fain Philosophy the Spoiler of the Church. By the Rev. CHARLES BRIDGES, M.A. Seeley. This is a sermon—of which the very style was sufficient to betray the author, even if he had not given his name—preached in York Minster at the consecration of the new Bishop of Carlisle. It furnishes a salutary warning against the speculations of the new school of theology of Maurice and Co. The sentences are all pithy, and pertinent, and weighty; but the sermon lacks argumentative force, and, though it cautions against some vital errors, it does not undertake to refute them.—Christian Progress: a Sermon preached in the Chapel of Trinity College, Cambridge, at the commemoration of Benefactors. By J. B. LIEHTFOOT, M.A., Fellow and Tutor. Macmillan. Perhaps the occasion on which this sermon was preached, demanded of the preacher nothing beyond a few commonplace paragraphs, as destitute of Evangelical sentiment, as of strong and vigorous thought. If so, he succeeded admirably.—Popery: its crimes, and our duty in reference to it. A Lecture, by Rev. R. DICK DUNCAN. Edinburgh: Oliphant.

Called forth by the tercentenary of our Scottish Reformation, the pages and paragraphs glow and burn with a fervid eloquence. If the delivery of the discourse were aided by a passionate oratory, it must have thrilled the congregation that listened to it. They did well to urge its publication, and we wish it may circulate widely.—Oxford Rationalism and English Christianity. By J. CAIRNS, D.D. London: Freeman. A reprint of a series of articles which appeared in the Dial newspaper. They are characterised by a sound and searching logic, and expose the fallaciousness and empty pretensions of Infidelity under its latest phase in "Essays and Reviews," while they are written with gentlemanly moderation and Christian fidelity to the truth.

TRANSACTIONS AND MEETINGS.

Some time since the Committee adopted a letter of respectful condolence to her Majesty the Queen Dowager of Prussia on the death of the King, which was transmitted to the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance at Berlin for presentation to her Majesty. This document we now lay before our friends with the Queen's reply:—

TO HER MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY THE QUEEN DOWAGER OF PRUSSIA.

May it please your Majesty.—The Committee of Council of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance desire to offer to your Majesty their sincere and heartfelt condolence on that mournful dispensation of Divine Providence which has bereaved your Majesty of your august and beloved consort, and the kingdom of Prussia of their revered and patriotic King.

It might too much aggravate your Majesty's grief were we to recount the noble qualities which composed the character of the late lamented Sovereign, or to dilate on the Christian virtues that adorned it. We cannot, however, refrain from expressing the grateful admiration with which we shall ever hold in remembrance the cordial reception which he gave to the great assembly of Christian people from all countries, convened by the Evangelical Alliance, with his own permission and sanction, in the city of Berlin, in the year 1857. The personal interest which his Majesty took in all the antecedent measures which issued in the gathering of that memorable Conference, the condescension with which he was pleased to participate in its proceedings by his repeated presence at its meetings, and, above all, the generous and kindly welcome which he gave to all its members at his royal palace at Potsdam, not only won their gratitude and elicited their warmest prayers for himself and his royal house, but evinced his Majesty's deep concern for the true welfare of the Church of Christ throughout the whole world. Nor while we deplore that, in the inscrutable wisdom of God, his Majesty was so soon after visited with that affliction which withdrew him from the cares of State, shall we cease to reflect, with sentiments of melancholy pleasure, that these transactions shed their hallowed influence upon some of the latest acts of his life and reign.

While we thus dwell on circumstances which endeared your Majesty's late royal consort to our hearts, you, Madam, will be solaced in your affliction by the remembrance of multiplied instances of his piety, as in public so especially in the relations of conjugal and private life. Nor can your Majesty regard it otherwise than as a consolatory privilege that by the tender assiduities of devoted affection you were permitted to mitigate the sorrows and sufferings of his declining days, to soothe his departing spirit, and to share in the last mournful honours which were paid to his revered memory. And now that he is graciously removed beyond the toils and conflicts of earth we humbly cherish, with your Majesty, the assure hope that through his sincere faith in the great atoning sacrifice of our blessed Saviour, he has entered upon a glorious immortality.

Will your Majesty, then, condescend to accept this expression of our unaffected condolence? We mourn the loss which your Majesty and the royal family, which the Prussian nation, which the Church and cause of Christ have sustained by this sorrowful bereavement. But with our grief we unite our humble prayers that your Majesty may be supported by the grace of that Holy Spirit who is the Comforter of those that mourn, and that Almighty God may so impress upon the royal family, and especially upon the sovereign who now occupies the throne, the solemn lessons of this Providence and the memory of a rare example of royal piety and excellence, that this great calamity may be overruled to the lasting benefit of the nation, and to the glory of His holy name.

REPLY OF THE QUEEN DOWAGER, forwarded to the Committee of Council by the Rev. Dr. Krummacker, chaplain to the late King of Prussia, and a member of the Berlin Committee :—

The sincere and heartfelt condolence which the Committee of Council of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance have expressed in the address on occasion of the doleful loss the Almighty has inflicted on my grieving heart, by the decease of my beloved husband, the late King of Prussia, has been transmitted to me by Pastor Krummacker. I feel myself moved to offer to the Committee the assurance of the beneficial effect their admiration and attachment to my beloved king and husband, and the touching remembrance of the reception they met with from him in the year 1857, and of his deepfelt interest in the labours of the Evangelical Alliance to promote the true welfare of the Church of Christ, has had on my aching heart, which, though full of grief, has by the Almighty's grace never ceased to be rejoiced to His holy will. Receive, with the expression of my heartfelt thanks for the feeling of attachment and sympathy—of which every word of your address is a true witness—the assurance of my sincere esteem and benevolent sentiments.

(Signed) ELIZABETH,
Queen Dowager of Prussia.

GENEVA CONFERENCE.—The Committee have received from the Geneva Committee the completed programme of arrangements for this Conference in September next, which the reader will find at pp. 167-8.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT IN BULGARIA.—A letter has been received from the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance at Constantinople, dated Feb. 27, 1861, addressed to the President of the British Organization, on the subject of the efforts which the Bulgarians of the Turkish Empire are making to throw off from their National Church the oppressive domination of the Greek Hierarchy. In a memorial addressed to the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance at Constantinople, dated Jan. 13 (25), 1861, and signed by the bishops, priests, and laity of the Bulgarian community, the Bulgarians have solicited the friendly aid of the Evangelical Alliance in this struggle for religious freedom. The Constantinople Committee, that they might become the better acquainted with the case, and ascertain in what way they could best comply with this request, appointed a sub-committee to confer with some of the leading members of the Bulgarian community, to whom they expressed the sympathy of the Evangelical Alliance, and an earnest hope that the movement might lead to the true enlightenment and elevation of the Bulgarian people. The Committee also addressed each of the Protestant Ambassadors to the Porte in behalf of these people, in a circular letter, which is here given as containing a succinct statement of the case :—

Letter addressed by the Constantinople Committee to each of the Protestant Ambassadors to the Porte, February, 1861.

Sir,—It is doubtless known to your Excellency that the Bulgarian people have for some time, with great unanimity, been seeking to throw off the yoke of the Greek hierarchy, and soliciting from the Turkish Government the restoration of their ancient right to choose their own bishops from among themselves.

The grounds of this claim are set forth in a memorial, dated Jan. 13 (25), 1861, which has been addressed to the Evangelical Alliance, by the bishops, clergy, representatives, and leading members of the Bulgarian community.

They commence by stating that the Bulgarian Church was entirely free from any dependence on the Patriarch of Constantinople up to the year 1763, when, through the intrigues of the then Patriarch Samuel, backed by the Greek Archons, the Turkish Government was induced to abolish the Bulgarian archiepiscopal see of Ochrida, and to place all the Bulgarian people under his jurisdiction.

They go on to say that the domination of Greek prelates over a Slavonic people has been, and continues to be, odious to the latter. The bishops, ignorant of the language of their people, and even hostile to its cultivation in schools or its use in churches, are regarded by the people as selfish and tyrannical, and as seeking to prevent all growth and development among them. They charge them also with gross abuses of power, and even with flagrant immoralities.

They claim that in imploring the Porte to deliver them from this domination, they are asking only for a restoration of ancient privileges; and that the Hatti-Houmayoun of 1856 in effect restores all the privileges granted to the Christian subjects of the Empire since the reign of Mohammed II.

They also remark that they are asking no more than is enjoyed by others under the Sultan's rule, and they specially instance the fact that the Greeks have four patriarchal sees—viz., those of Constantinople, Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch—and one archiepiscopal see (that of Cyprus) all independent of each other.

They repel the accusation that foreign influences lead them to advance this claim, protesting that the movement is a spontaneous one, and declaring their unshaken fidelity to the Government of his Imperial Majesty the Sultan.

Not having been able yet to secure the recognition of their ecclesiastical independence, they turn to the Evangelical Alliance as to the known friends and advocates of religious liberty, and invoke our aid.

The undersigned, on behalf of the Constantinople Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, would invite your Excellency's attention to this important movement, and beg that you would employ your friendly influence with the Sultan's Government in favour of granting the desired separation of the Bulgarian people from the Greek Patriarchal See.

Permit us briefly to indicate the reasons which lead us to make this request :—

1. The movement is, so far as we can judge, a national and not a factions one. We believe that it grows out of a remarkable waking up of the Bulgarian mind, which has led them to establish schools and to seek earnestly for the Scriptures so far as yet published in their spoken language, many thousands of copies of which have already been purchased by them.

2. We believe that the movement is in no way connected with any foreign intrigue, or any political scheme unfriendly to the Government. We believe that the Bulgarians are among the most loyal subjects of the Turkish Government.

3. The claim to the restoration of their right to choose their own ecclesiastical rulers—a right enjoyed by their people for ages, and undisputed until less than a century ago—is, we think, fully sustained by the Hatti-Houmayoun, which guarantees religious liberty to all the Sultan's subjects.

4. The recognition of their ecclesiastical independence of the Greeks seems specially reasonable in view of the fact that the Bulgarians are many times more numerous than the Greeks in European Turkey, numbering probably between four and five millions.

5. We have every reason to regard as legitimate the complaints of the Bulgarians, arising from the notorious rapacity and immoral conduct of the majority of the Greek prelates.

6. The continuance of Greek bishops over

Bulgarian dioceses seems to us very unfavourable to the moral and intellectual reformation of the people, which can naturally be best attained in the use, and accompanied by the cultivation of their own language.

7. It is evident that should the Government refuse them the right to choose their bishops from among themselves, a large portion of their community will seek to attain the same end by making terms with the Papacy; and thus a schism be introduced, hurtful to the Reformation, mischievous to the entire community, and detrimental to the interests of the Government.

8. We believe that the Government, by granting this reasonable request, would secure the gratitude and confirm the loyalty of the Bulgarian people.

9. The Turkish Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, taking a lively interest in every local question involving the principle of religious liberty, considers itself bound on this account to accede to the appeal made to its sympathy and support addressed to it by the Bulgarian community; and to express its conviction that the Government, by acting on this occasion consistently with this principle, sanctioned by the Hatti-Houmayoun, would promote its own interest while granting a claim founded on a right which it has conferred upon its subjects.

10. We have heard from various sources that the Government is already favourably disposed towards the Bulgarians, and therefore we trust that an expression of the views of all the Protestant Ambassadors would prove a timely aid to them.

We will only add that it seems exceedingly desirable that the painful and agitating suspense of the Bulgarian community should not be prolonged, and therefore beg your Excellency to use any influence which you shall judge proper toward the speedy solution of this important question.

We remain, most respectfully,

The London Committee resolved to communicate these facts to Lord John Russell, and also to correspond with the British Ambassador at the Porte. They have since received a copy of the memorial from the Bulgarian bishops, &c., to the Turkey Committee above referred to.

by Captain Berger, the travelling secretary of the Swedish Branch. By the kindness of Lord and Lady Calthorpe, a soirée for the foreign objects of the Evangelical Alliance is to take place at their house in Grosvenor-square soon after Easter, when this subject will be made prominent.

PERSECUTION OF SPANISH PROTESTANTS.—The following petition to the House of Commons was adopted by the Committee, and signed on their behalf by the Chairman and Secretaries :—

TO THE HONOURABLE THE COMMONS OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The Humble Petition of the Undersigned Chairmen and other Officers of the Evangelical Alliance,

Sheweth—

That Religious Liberty does not exist in Spain.

That converts to Protestantism in that country are treated as if they were guilty of a crime against the State; and that, in particular, two Spaniards, named Manuel Matamoros and José Alhama, are at this time suffering imprisonment for the sake of their religion, with a probability, in the case of the former, of his succumbing to the sufferings inflicted upon him.

Your Petitioners, therefore, pray that your honourable House will take the facts into your consideration, and will support Her Majesty's Government in any steps which they may feel themselves justified in taking, to promote Religious Liberty in Spain, with especial reference to the said M. Matamoros and José Alhama.

And your Petitioners will ever pray.

This petition—together with similar ones from Committees of the Evangelical Alliance at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Langholm, Carlisle, Liverpool, Southampton, Plymouth, Reading, Nottingham, &c.—was presented on Friday, March 15th, by Sir Robert Peel, Bart., who in the kindest manner had visited Matamoros in his dungeon. On asking whether any correspondence had taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Spanish Government relative to the persecution, Sir Robert took the opportunity of making a full statement of the case, bearing his personal testimony to the facts, and observing that the Christian men on whose behalf he spoke had committed no other crime—if crime it could be called—than that of possessing copies of the Holy Scriptures, and using them in conjunction with other people. He cited parallel cases (and in particular that of the Medici at Florence) which, he said, justified the call he made upon the Government for their active interference by moral influence, and their remonstrance with the Spanish Government on this most intolerant persecution. [The Evangelical Alliance will not allow the matter to rest till the subject is taken up vigorously by the Government.]

STATE AND PROSPECTS OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.—MEETING OF DELEGATES AND OTHERS WITH MEMBERS OF COUNCIL.

A meeting is to be held (D.V.) in London, in May, of persons deputed by local committees, and of other members of the Evangelical Alliance, to confer with the Council on the whole subject of Christian union, and on matters which have recently happened affecting it.

In reliance on Almighty God, and with the persuasion that by His grace the principle of Christian brotherhood is strong enough to bear the extraordinary strain which has lately been put upon it, it has been determined to hold this meeting, when, with the utmost frankness, all questions will be discussed, and the members of the Evangelical Alliance will be consulted on the best methods for its extension throughout the United Kingdom.

It is confidently believed that this meeting of Christian friends, convened from all parts of our land, for frank converse, for united prayer, and for receiving information of the work in which the Alliance is engaged, will, under the blessing of God, remove obstacles out of the way, and bind all our brethren in closer bonds of union, founded on the essential principles of the common faith.

The following are the arrangements :—

1. The meeting is to be held in Freemasons' Hall, on Friday morning, May 10, at eleven o'clock.

2. All committees in London and the provinces are to be requested to delegate members of their body, for whom hospitality will be provided in London. Members of committees, though not delegated, who may be in London at the time, will be informed by their respective secretaries that they are at liberty to attend. In addition to this, all members of the Evangelical Alliance, whether connected with local organizations or not, will be at liberty to be present; and on signifying to the secretaries in London their intention of coming, will receive cards of admission to the meeting of Council.

3. There will be a public dinner at four o'clock, and a meeting for prayer in the evening (open to the public).

SOIRÉES.—A soirée on the religious condition of England and Europe was held on the 13th of March, at the house of John Rudall, Esq., Eaton-square, when interesting addresses were delivered by R. Baxter, Esq., the Earl of Cavan, the Hon. W. Ashley, Rev. B. W. Newton, and others, on the January week of prayer, the religious state and prospects of Italy, and the persecutions in Spain.

Another soirée for similar objects was held on the 22nd March, at the residence of Anthony N. Shaw, Esq., York-place, Portman-square, when information was given by the Rev. C. Hebert, the Rev. P. Latrobe, the Rev. Dr. Lorimer, and others, on the progress and results of united prayer, on the work of evangelization in Germany and elsewhere, and the conference of Christians to be held in Geneva in September next.

ANNUAL SOIRÉE.—The annual soirée will be held (D.V.) at Freemasons' Hall on the evening of Tuesday, the 30th of April next.

NEW MEMBERS.—At the Ladies' Committee Meeting, on February 12, Miss M. Holgate, Abbey-gardens, St. John's-wood. At the Committee of Council Meeting, on March 14, Captain H. G. Anderson, Spondon, Derby; Rev. Richard Green, Wesleyan Missionary to Italy; Mr. Daniel Glass, Gracehill Academy, Ballymena; Rev. Gilbert Meikle, Inverary, N.B.

ESSAYISTS AND ESSAYISM.*

"ESSAYS AND REVIEWS" are not done with yet, neither are they likely to be. We have, however, reached a new phase of the controversy. First came the ominous volume itself, and the reception it met with was as if it had been the monster described by Virgil:—

Dixerat hæc, adytis cum lubricus anguis ab imis
Septem ingens gyros, septena volumina traxit;
Amplexus placido tumulum lapsusque per aras :

which may thus be set forth in plain English :—

He spake, and straight a huge and slimy snake
Dragged from the inmost chambers its seven coils,
Its volumes seven; calmly went round the tomb
And glid among the altars.

This manifestation was followed by expressions of astonishment and indignation which grew louder and more numerous. It was felt that such an appearance from among the cloisters of Oxford, and in the sanctuary itself, was not to be passed over in silence. Reviewers and private individuals made haste to express their dissent from the doctrines which were broached. The clergy were aroused, the bishops condemned, and Convocation itself uttered its voice against the book. Then came a multitude of minor publications refuting its principles, and defending the ancient faith. We have not yet done with these, and the cry is, "still they come." But nevertheless, men's minds are quieter, and the demonstrations to which we have alluded have convinced them that there is among us an attachment to the Bible and its teachings which it would take many Essays to shake. We hear less of legal proceedings, and men look to the press to furnish the antidote; and in all likelihood, at this moment, earnest, learned, and able masters of the pen, are preparing more voluminous and solid refutations than have yet appeared. In the meantime, we have had our interest awakened, among other things, by the announcement of an article in the forthcoming number of the North British Review, by one of our veteran writers. We were gratified to hear that Mr. Isaac Taylor, who has so many titles to honour, was the writer of this article, and we are glad to say that a copy of it has reached us in advance of the publication in which it is to appear. This article we have carefully examined, and we hasten to lay before our readers a short account of it, and of our views respecting it.†

The writer begins by saying that "it is not a criticism of particular books that we intend at this time; and assuredly it is not an assault upon individual

* See the article of Mr. Isaac Taylor in the North British Review for May, 1861.

† One of the first of the Quarterlies to speak at length upon the Oxford essays, was the Westminster, which, while it applauded the writers for their candour, reminded them of the inconsistency of their position, and invited them to go further. The tone of this article was very objectionable, although its instincts were right. Following the Westminster came others. The British Quarterly had a very able and searching article upon the subject, and one which would have done no small execution in a Church journal. Then the Quarterly came with a paper, the style of which was good, its attitude calm and decided, and its effect sudden and extensive. Such was the demand for it, that the Review ran through three editions, and it tended very much to enlighten public opinion, and to rouse the clergy to some personal, practical, and united action. For once, high Puseyites and low Evangelicals rowed in the same boat, showing that there are questions more weighty than of forms, patterns, tones, genuflections, and even sacramental and priestly efficacy. And now we have the Edinburgh, which comes out with an article of a very unsatisfactory character—unsatisfactory, because its apparent tolerance and impartiality marks a sympathy with the essayists, which is ill disguised, and reveals relics of the same spirit towards vital and Evangelical religion which distinguished it in the palmy days of its ancient ungodliness.

writers." He proposes rather to take up the most noticeable characteristics of the school from which the recent Oxford essays have emanated, or of the system which they represent. There is, however, some difficulty in designating this system or school, and therefore he truly says: "A designation is still needed which shall be at once appropriate, unambiguous, and inoffensive, within the grasp of which, without inflicting upon its objects any injury, either personal or polemical, a class of English writers may be comprehended, including at this time many highly accomplished men, who, by their intelligence and their influence with the public as writers, and still more so by their ecclesiastical position, have lately obtained a hearing for what are deemed antichristian opinions." We quite agree with this, and also with the suggestion that the name should assume nothing as granted, should not emanate from mere passion, should not be insulting, &c., but should be at the same time truthful and characteristic. The writer approves of the term Tractarians as applied to another school, and suggests that for convenience sake, these should be simply called "Essayists," a word which he would apply, not merely to the seven, but to the whole class to whom they belong.

Having selected and explained the appellation which he prefers, Mr. Taylor enters upon his subject, which is the "Present Movement in the Church of England: its Nature, Tendency, and Issue." That he is right in calling it a movement in the Church of England, is apparent from the fact that "as many as six out of every seven are professed members, and many of them clergymen of that Church." Nay, he goes further, and says, "It would be difficult, we think, to name so many as one in twenty of the class, lay or clerical, who belong to any other Christian communion." This furnishes matter either for congratulation or for regret. It is matter for regret that the Church of England, whose articles of faith are so well known, and whose formularies are so public, should have been subjected to an irruption of doctrine and speculation, which is felt to be opposed to her fundamental principles, but which takes shelter under the laxity of her discipline. It is, however, matter for congratulation that other great bodies—as the Wesleyans, the Independents, and the Baptists—have been preserved from the novelties in question. Our duty is not to enter into the causes of this, nor to show that such a state of things was predicted many years ago as almost certain to happen.

Of course, other denominations have to do with the controversy, and would have, were there not one in a thousand of the new school reckoned among them. The controversy is one of universal interest, and all sections of the Church are called upon to lend their aid in the refutation of erroneous doctrines and criticisms, and in the vindication of scriptural teaching and truth. Mr. Taylor thinks that as the conflict has begun, it must be mainly carried on and decided within the Established Church; but he also thinks that other denominations will be affected by the result. What that result will be, he is not bold enough to predict, but regards it as an easier and safer task to prognosticate what it will not be. "The Essayists," he says, "will not realise their own intentions. This we boldly predict. They have egregiously misapprehended the mood and manner of their countrymen at large, religious and irreligious, when they imagine that liberty shall be allowed to a clergyman, either to profess his belief in the resurrection of Christ, or to treat that alleged fact as an open question—a speculative point of little importance." Nor does he imagine that the timid expectations of the inert, the acquiescent, the unthinking, the unknowing conservative body in the Church of England—and not less in other Churches—will be realised; in other words, the matter will not be hushed up.

The seven essayists have succeeded in two things; they have aroused universal attention to their doctrines, and they have produced a volume which has had an immense circulation. They have also won for themselves the applause of men of their own party, and the commendation of Sceptics, Unitarians, and Atheists. Possibly they have been praised by many more. But such approval is a poor recompense, and is infinitely outweighed by the regret and disapprobation which the devout and thoughtful, the learned and the talented of all orthodox bodies, have openly avowed. They must feel that it is not mere prejudice and party spirit which is opposed to them, and that they are unfavourably judged by those among us whose opinion is of most weight and value. On these and other points, Mr. Taylor speaks frankly, soberly, and well; but for the development of his ideas, and their happy illustration, we must refer to his article. He also meets very well the sophisms and mystifications of which advantage has been taken to turn aside the point of the condemnation which has been pronounced, and to shelter those who have incurred it. It is too grave a question for mere quibble and cavil, and as there is no need for these on the part of the old theology, there ought to be no need for them on the part of the new. Have these men truth on their side? Then let it be boldly declared and maintained, and let them retain their places in the Church, whose offices they fill, and whose bread they eat. Nay, let them alone continue in the Church, and let them request all teachers of error to retire from its precincts. For if they are right, the others, the majority, are wrong, and the Church, which was instituted for the purpose of teaching truth, is teaching error. This is a graver inquiry even than whether the teaching of the Essayists is in harmony with the doctrinal standards of the English Church. Because if the doctrinal standards of that Church are not founded in truth, the sooner they are disavowed the better; and the day is to be desired when they shall be abolished. The real question is one of truth, and not only of comprehension, compromise, and liberty.

How is this question to be settled? Not by the voice of authority, nor by the Prayer-book and Thirty-nine Articles, but by the Holy Scriptures. It cannot be decided by an appeal to established and prevalent habits of opinion and modes of criticism, nor by the general feeling of the community. To these reference may be made, and from these inferences may be drawn, because it cannot easily be that we are nearly all wrong in a nation which has for three hundred years been reading the Bible, and calling it the final judge of controversy. To show that the Essayists do not agree with the doctrinal standards of the National Church, may perhaps be easy, and would prove them inconsistent, but it would not prove them wrong. We speak advisedly. But it would lead to a very different result, if it were demonstrated that they do not agree with the Bible, any more than with the Prayer-book; and, therefore, the appeal must be "to the law and to the testimony," and, "if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

We may be called upon to fight the battle of the evidences over again; and indeed we must. It will never do to confine ourselves to those secondary and subsidiary matters, upon which some lay so much stress, as if they were everything. Then when we have shown the foundations of the Bible still resting on the eternal rock of Divine wisdom and truth, we may test by its utterances all that is advanced by modern theologians of the rational school. As Mr. Taylor shows, there is nothing in the seven Essays which is new; but they furnish the occasion, or cause the demand, for the investigations alluded to. Germany, Holland, France, and England have again and again produced writers of the same class, but it has not happened among us that seven such writers have combined to produce a book, and to give it to the world as a sort of representative and symbol of Oxford theology.

Sooner or later controversies burn themselves out. It was so with Arian, Pelagian, Priscillian, and Nestorian discussions in the olden time. It has been so with the Socinian, Arminian, and other disputes of more recent date. When they have not died out they have sunk into oblivion, and peace has returned to troubled minds after argument, debate, legal proceedings, pamphlets, and ponderous tomes have exhausted their energy. This peace, like mercy, "drops, as the gentle dew from heaven, upon the place beneath." We hope it will be so now, and—to use Mr. Taylor's words—that the mass of Christian people shall cease to concern themselves about the matter, and the Essayists and their enterprise fall into well-merited oblivion. "Post nubila Phœbus," and none the less bright that he comes after the clouds and storms.

Our talented writer lays down as sufficient ground for rejecting the recent Essayism, and for condemning it—1. Its levity. 2. Its evasiveness. 3. That it rests upon a shallow philosophy. 4. That its conclusions are the products of a spurious or misdirected method of Biblical criticism. 5. It stands condemned by its incoherence, so long as those who maintain it profess themselves to be in any sense Christians.

Such is the indictment, and each of its counts is handled with a seriousness befitting its high importance and gravity. For it is no small thing to accuse men of eminence—men eminent as clergymen, eminent as authors, and eminent by their position—of misdemeanours like these. True we are reminded that this impeachment is not of the "Seven Champions of anti-Christendom," as they have been called; but an impeachment of their whole class. This prevents personalities, but it does not prevent a personal application of the charges. We cannot go into the arguments by which the successive points are established, but we are greatly deceived if they are not proof against any conclusive refutation. There is much in them which is ingenious, but there is also much that is solid and profound. As might be expected, special prominence is given to the accusation of shallow philosophy; and very properly so, because the known studies of the writer have been conversant with the theme, and because the new school has most preposterous pretensions to philosophy. It has always been so with the enemies of Christianity. Porphyry, and Celsus, and Hierocles find their modern counterparts in Hobbes, Hume, and almost every modern opponent of Biblical teachings; and the shallowest Secularist prides himself upon his philosophy. On this point, from much that is excellent we extract the following:—

All the religions in the world, we are told, stand on the same ground as to their claims, or their authority: some are better, some worse—some are malign, some are benign—some pure, some foul. But now among these various religions there is one, and there is only one, which in a good sense deserves to be spoken of as a religion of power; there is one religion which, whether it be true or false in its pretensions, has shown itself to possess a force to which human nature yields itself for the better; there is one religion that has had its martyrs by thousands without fanaticism; there is one religion that has sustained purity, self-devotion, noiseless virtues, in thousands of homes; there is one religion that, while it has made tyrants tremble, has made their victims patient, peaceful, triumphant. There is one religion now extant in the world, which, while it sorely perplexes sophists, civilises savages. There is anear us, whether it be true or false, A RELIGION OF POWER. It is so by confession of all men.

The Essayists, who are the promoters of a carefully concocted scheme—prepared years ago—come forward to try their hands upon this one religion—they say to amend it. They well know that they have nothing in their bag that is better, or that is of more value, than the stale and done-with drugs of a foreign market. Thus provided, the course they take is this: They flatly reject the credentials of this religion; they declare its authentication to be spurious; they designate its sanctions as antiquated fables; they release vice from its fears; they rob virtue of its stay and its hopes; they affirm that, in the early triumphs of this religion, it drew its motives from a delusion or a fraud. A word, then, is enough; the Essayists, to the extent of their influence—and wherever they are listened to—deprive of its power this only religion that has any power for good!

And yet who shall find fault with them, if indeed the case be as these writers affirm it to be? If it be so, then the religion of the Bible is the last fruitless struggle of the human mind to provide itself with a belief that should be commensurate with its wants and its woes, and that should reclaim it from its wanderings. If then, it be so, and if this be the dismal issue of this argument, then this human nature itself must be spoken of as all an outside affair. Man—vain and helpless, would best be represented by a figure of great height, and breadth, and pretension—cut out in pasteboard, and painted as a harlequin. As for man—there is nothing in him; and there is nothing for him: his last dream of immortal greatness is over; his last confidence in God is gone!

If, now, the reply of the Essayists be this, "You are working up an exaggeration for a purpose in argument;" and if they say that they intend nothing so deplorable as what we impute to them, then we are driven in upon our conclusion—that if, in their view, a religion that is without authority, and without sanctions, be sufficient for the needs of human nature, their knowledge of human nature can be theoretic only; and their philosophy of human nature must be—as we have said it is—a shallow philosophy.

Mr. Isaac Taylor has earned our hearty thanks for this calm and judicious analysis of the principles and tactics of the new school; for his manly and intelligent exposure of their hollowness, and for his earnest advocacy of the old truth of the Gospel. With a freedom from party and personal feeling which gives him great advantages, and with an honesty which is wholly disassociated from passion, he pursues his course through the forty-nine pages of his essay. There is nothing captious or offensive, but everything is written in a spirit which could scarcely ruffle the most morbid sensitiveness. We hope our readers will as soon as possible avail themselves of the opportunity to read the paper, and that they will share with us the author's hopeful expectations.

ANGELIC INTEREST IN THE WORK OF REDEMPTION.

These other sitting near the tree of life,
In robes of linen, flowing white and clean,
Of holiest aspect, of divinest soul,
Angels and men—into the glory look
Of the redeeming love, and turn the leaves
Of man's redemption o'er—the secret leaves—
Which none on earth were found worthy to open;
And as they read the mysteries divine—
The endless mysteries of salvation—wrought
By God's incarnate Son, they humbly bow
Before the Lamb, and glow with warmer love.

THE Bible makes us acquainted with the existence of angels, but contains no book or chapter occupied with information respecting them. We have no account of their creation, either of its time or its method, no dissertation on their nature, no description of their form or features, no history of their hierarchies, principalities, and commonwealths; but we are supplied, although incidentally, with some curious particulars relating to their appellations, their number, and their offices. Whether they had been long in existence when this world was created, or whether they received their being about the same time, and as a part of the universe then formed, we do not know, only we are told that they were spectators of at least a part of the great process of creation; for "when the foundations of the earth were laid the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." Subsequent events have connected them closely with the history of man. In his innocency what delight would they find in his society and he in theirs! Children of the same parent, and partakers alike of an intelligent and holy nature, their affection for each other was cemented by similarity of disposition, and by natural sympathy. Their worship was the same, not in its object only, but in its nature; and must have laid the basis, notwithstanding their natural disparity, for an intimate and hallowed fellowship:

Angels were wont their songs with his to blend,
And talk with him as their familiar friend.

At the fall the brotherly intercourse was broken. Expelled from Eden, the flaming sword of the cherubim prevented thenceforth the access of the transgressors to the tree of life. From that time we find angels employed in various offices about the persons of men; sometimes executing Divine judgments both upon individuals and communities, and sometimes interposing for the protection of some especially favoured servant of the Most High. But they have never seemed to possess an independent authority over men. They are God's ministers simply, by whom he conducts the government of the world.

For the restoration of their ministry, in its benign exercise, we are indebted to the scheme of redemption. The same act of sovereign mercy which reconciled us to God reconciles us to all the friends of God. When we have peace with Him through the blood of the Cross, we are reunited to all who love Him in every part of the universe. Hence redeemed man is an object of angelic love, and all the angels are "ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation." In the work of redemption itself, therefore, they may be naturally supposed to feel an interest. Passages indeed are not wanting in the sacred Scriptures which represent them as manifesting, not a superficial or transient interest, but an intense desire to investigate the grand subject of human salvation. The things which constituted the absorbing topic of prophetic research, when those ancient seers filled their inspired page with "the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow," are the things which, beyond all others, attract angelic notice. These are the things, as we are expressly told, which "the angels desire to look into" (1 Pet. i. 12). To this angelic solicitude to explore the mysteries of redemption there was a designed allusion in the attitude of the golden cherubim upon the mercy seat. As they were made bending their eyes down upon that mystic symbol, so are we to understand that the angels fix their observation upon the Redeemer Himself, the true mercy seat, whose propitiation is the only ground of pardon and eternal life. To Him, while He works out the salvation of His Church, they turn with unceasing attention, as being of all objects that which is worthiest to hold them in protracted, concentrated, and adoring thought.

Not, let it be observed, as if there were not other subjects inviting their research. It cannot be imagined that their own world would not furnish them with many fields of inquiry altogether worthy of their powers. How boundless is the range of knowledge which lies open to the human mind! How fruitful in subjects demanding the application of profound thought are those works of God with which we are conversant! What a multiplicity and boundless variety of objects solicit our attention and repay our investigations! Sources of intellectual improvement are supplied to an infinite extent even by this inferior and comparatively narrow portion of the universe to which our capacities are limited. And must we not imagine that the more glorious parts of creation to which angels have access, and amidst which they dwell, can furnish them with mental occupation befitting their larger faculties? Is it to be supposed that there are no recesses of hidden science for them to explore, no problems of celestial philosophy for them to solve, no works of nature for them to study, no arts and no inventions to exercise their skill, to illustrate their ingenuity, and display their taste? Compared with angelic occupations, our loftiest enterprises are but as the sports of children, and our widest sphere of investigation but as a speck in the universe. Yet from every other pursuit they turn away their minds, leaving vast fields of heavenly science unrequited, and it may be even unvisited, that they may occupy themselves with the sufferings and the glories involved in man's redemption.

Some knowledge of the purpose of the blessed God to save man from the consequences of his guilt the angels may be supposed to have possessed from the time of his disastrous fall; but the facts of his redemption, as they took place, one after another, in the incarnation of the Son of God, and the events of His mysterious sojourn on earth, must have greatly enlarged their knowledge. These events were as novel to angelic as to human observers, and unspeakably more attractive. Little notice comparatively was taken of them by the world in which they occurred, while the inhabitants of all other worlds were hastening hither to behold in them richer developments of eternal wisdom and Divine love than could be seen in any part of the universe beside.

Angels were in constant attendance upon the Redeemer during His thirty-three years' residence among men. Passing over the repeated missions of Gabriel—first to Zacharias, to foretell the birth of His illustrious precursor, and afterwards to His virgin mother, to announce her conception of Him by the Holy Ghost—we linger a moment on the story of His birth. Imagine the shepherds, in the stillness and solitude of their moonlight occupation, reclining on the grassy hillocks beside their flocks; some, it may be, gazing on the heavens and tracing the planets' course through the pathless sky; some in friendly converse on themes of patriarchal piety—of Boaz, the former lord of that very estate, and Ruth, "the Moabitish damsel" that gleaned in his fields—of David's heroism when on that spot he slew the lion and the bear before he encountered the giant-defier of Israel's God; and some whiling away the tedious hours with the rude melody of the village song; when in a moment every voice was hushed and every eye was fixed: a supernatural brightness dazzled them, and a celestial messenger in mid-air addressed them. He brought a message such as man had never heard, nor angel carried, nor God had sent before—"Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people, for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you: ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger." Instantly it was no longer a solitary angel, but a company of angels; no longer the beauteous light of one ethereal creature, but the united brilliance of thousands; no longer the music of a single voice, but the choral harmony of heaven, as they sing—

Before the sapphire-color'd throne,
To Him that sits thereon,
With saintly shout and solemn jubilee.

And thus they sung, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men." Again, passing over those instances of angelic interposition by which "the young child" was rescued from the murderous hands which sought His life, we find Him in the wilderness and angels ministering unto Him after His temptation. They were witnesses of His conflict with that fallen angel, the Prince of Darkness, once their own associate. They saw Him "first lay down the rudiments of His great warfare," and achieve those successive victories which were the prelude of His subsequent and final triumph over the powers of hell. And thenceforward, although there is no recorded instance of their ministration until we come to Gethsemane, we cannot question that they were constant attendants on His steps, fulfilling their office invisibly, though not therefore the less really, nor to Himself, it may be, the less consciously. But when He entered on His last sufferings they again appear. An angel strengthened Him in the garden, coming as if in answer to His cry when, "being in an agony, He prayed more fervently." What must have been the unutterable amazement of that angel when he witnessed the anguish of the lonely sufferer, and saw "the big drops of blood" rolling down His face and falling on the ground! That angel, let it be recollected, had seen Him in the bosom of His Father, and worshipped Him there, and now he gazed upon Him stretched on the earth and baptized in sufferings and the agonies of death! Was not this the deep mystery of God's incarnate love? But there was a depth profounder still, in which, as He descended down into its dark recesses, none of them were permitted to approach Him with the offer of their friendly aid. They saw Him on the cross, but He saw not them. His dolorous cry they heard, but brought Him no response, and no words of sympathy did they speak themselves. Mute and unseen they mingled in that crowd on the brow of Calvary, and then hastened away when all was over, meditating much what significance might be unfolded in that dying impassioned outburst, not of despair, but of triumph, "It is finished!"

But their offices were not ended. Did they not go with that sorrowing train who in the evening of the same day carried Him to Joseph's garden? Not ostensibly present, it is true, yet who will question that, as is said of the women who came with Him from Galilee, they "followed after and beheld the sepulchre, and how his body was laid"? Other watchers guarded that tomb besides the Roman soldiers. "The helmed cherubim and sworded seraphim" were there, as when the Lord opened the eyes of the prophet's servant, and "behold the mountain was full of horses of fire and chariots of fire. Then came the third morning, with its scene of unexampled wonders. Let the Evangelist describe it: "And behold there was a great earthquake; for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door and sat upon it. His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow: and for fear of him the keepers did shake and became as dead men." Amidst the terrors and the splendours of that majestic scene, "the sleeping Conqueror arose."

*Ille qui clausus lapide
Custoditur sub milite,
Triumphans pompa nobili;
Victor surgit de funere.*

His ascension shortly followed, and then, in the presence of His chosen witnesses, he was convoyed by troops of these celestial spirits to His everlasting throne.

As the facts of redemption, embodied in the personal history of the Redeemer attract angelic notice, so it will be readily conceived the loftiest minds in the universe occupy themselves with the philosophy of redemption. Vast questions and mysterious, perplexing to human thought, and by the human intellect inexplicable, are, as we know, involved in it. Nor, although their capabilities so far transcend ours, may these problems be solved by them, if solved at all, except by patient and devout research. The limitation of the atonement to man, while apostate angels are excluded; and then its further limitation in its actual result to a portion only of the human race, while its essential value cannot be less than infinite; the equity of substitution, even though the innocent being substituted for the guilty be a consenting party to the transaction; the essential malignity of sin to require such a sacrifice in order to its expiation; the influence of redeeming mercy upon the moral character of its recipients, purifying and ennobling their nature, and lifting them up from their depravity to a fitness for companionship with themselves, and fellowship with God; and the ultimate issue of the whole plan in the annihilation of moral evil, the extinction of death, the restoration of holiness, the incorporation of them and angels into one family, the universal reign of love, and the everlasting glory of the Creator and Redeemer;—these are speculations worthy of their powers, at once taxing and rewarding them.

*See, how they bend! See, how they look!
Long had they read th' eternal book.
And studied dark decrees in vain,
The Cross and Calvary make them plain.
Now they are struck with deep amaze,
Each with his wings conceals his face:
Now clap their sounding plumes and cry,
"The wisdom of a Deity."*

The present occupation of the angels affords still further illustrations of the interest they take in the work of redemption. That occupation is both celestial and earthly. Their original employment in heaven was to minister before His throne, offering up to God the worship of His celestial temple. So in that sublime song of the ancient Christian Church, "To Thee all angels cry aloud: the heavens and all the powers therein. To Thee cherubim and seraphim continually do cry, holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth: Heaven and earth are full of the majesty of Thy glory." But since the incarnate Redeemer has been seated at the right hand of His Father, a new element has entered into their adorations, and another chorus finishes their song: "And I beheld," says the Apostle John, "and I heard the voices of many angels round about the throne, and the living creatures and the elders, and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands, saying, with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power and riches and wisdom and strength and honour and glory and blessing." Now this worship is not simply the worship of God, but the worship of God and the Lamb. They pay Divine honours to the Filial Word, and deem him worthy of their adoration, whom they saw suspended on the accursed tree. But their employment is not restricted to the heavenly world. They do service on earth, and the service they do here is about the persons of the redeemed. "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Of all events taking place among men none awakens in their minds a livelier interest, or in their judgment is invested with half as much importance, as the conversion of a sinner; because in that event they see the result of the redemptive act of Christ, and the success of God's method of saving the lost. From the period of his conversion the heir of glory becomes the object of their friendly charge. Invisibly, yet really, they attend upon his steps; nor until the disclosures of eternity shall reveal it will it be known how much he is indebted to the ministrations of these benevolent and holy creatures. But the attentions they pay to the redeemed bespeak the interest they feel in redemption. Not to the heirs of salvation as men, but as Christians, as those who are purchased by the blood of Christ, are the angels attracted to them. They love them because Christ died for them, and watch over them because they belong to Him.

To the angels, moreover, and finally, an important part is assigned in the closing scenes of the mediatorial dispensation. At the voice of the archangel and the trumpet of God the dead shall rise; and "when the Son of Man shall come in his glory, all the holy angels shall be with him." Much in the solemn transactions that ensue will devolve on them. "The harvest is the end of the world, but the angels are the reapers." By them, as it would appear from this representation, the saints will be collected from the rest of the risen dead, and conducted to their station of safety and honour at the right hand of the Judge; and then, to complete their work, they will be the agents employed to drive away the accursed into everlasting punishment. For "the Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." Thus at the consummation of the great work of the Son of God, as previously through all the stages of its progress, prominence is given to angelic agency, "to the intent that unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the Church, the manifold wisdom of God."

FORBEARING ONE ANOTHER IN LOVE.

At the request of the Rev. Mr. Jackson, we publish the following correspondence, not that we think it contains anything we are called on particularly to publish, but because Mr. Jackson thinks his views were set in a wrong light before our readers in some remarks during a recent controversy; and because he thinks, also, that this correspondence will set him right. We are, therefore, happy to do him any justice or courtesy he requests; and all the more so, as we hit him, perhaps, not too softly in the mole referred to.

Mr. Jackson seems to confound two things—viz., the spirit or temper in which all differences ought to be argued or conducted, and the principles on which men act. Let us argue as Churchmen. As a Churchman, I hold that the connexion between Church and State is scriptural. I will do all I can to uphold, strengthen, and promote it.

will tell my Dissenting brother candidly, that such is my principle and my intention. I will tell him, also, that I intend as stoutly as possible to resist all attempts at "Dissenting supremacy." If he goes in for that, he may count me as an opponent; and, perhaps, in the heat of some controversy, I may fall into the snare of saying some strong things about Dissenting ambition, or so forth, which he will not like. But if I should say anything too hasty or harsh in that behalf, I hope he would overlook it as incident to human infirmity. I desire to resist his aggressive attacks as stoutly as I can, but not unlovingly. I feel bound to remember that he conscientiously believes the union of Church and State to be unscriptural, and that he is conscientiously bound, therefore, to do all he can to dissolve that political connexion. I think him wrong. I don't think he will succeed. I tell him so as frankly and good-humouredly as I can. I will not compare myself to Lord Palmerston, nor my Dissenting brother to Mr. Rowcliffe, lest he should be offended. In fact, he may reverse that position if he pleases. Only, whatever we do to uphold or sever the connexion between Church and State, let us try and remember that if we are true Christians—truly united to our loving Head—we have higher and nobler and sweeter matters on which to agree, than we have points on which we differ. If an anti-State Church Dissenter be courteous, and candid, and gentlemanly, and kind, and loving, and if he argue like Sir S. M. Peto, for instance—on introducing a Dissenting bill lately—surely he is as well entitled to hold his opinions and prosecute his principles actively, as I am mine. And if he do so, must I, therefore, say with Mr. Jackson, that "to hold out to him the hand of friendship would be mockery?" We had this principle fully discussed at Liverpool in 1845. Then it had been proposed that the Churchman should give up something, and the Dissenter give up something, and so forbear and unite. But that proposition was rejected as being wrong in principle, and impossible in practice. It was resolved that all should retain their own convictions; all pursue their own objects; but that the spirit and temper in which diverging conscientious convictions, and diverging political and ecclesiastical activities should be followed, ought to be the spirit and temper of the New Testament. Some Dissenters of a particular kind objected to this, and object still; some Churchmen did the same, as Mr. Jackson seems to do. But many thought, and many have found, that it is perfectly possible to differ toto cœlo on points even of much deeper importance than the union of Church and State; and yet to acknowledge brotherhood in Christ, and to feel and cultivate personal friendship. To the writer this seems to be the basis and spirit of the Evangelical Alliance. He was, indeed, once told in Cork by Churchmen, that he was engaged in a scheme to overthrow the Established Church, by joining so with Dissenters. And at the same time and place, he learned from some Dissenters that they considered their brethren engaged in a scheme "to prop up" the Establishment by the same Alliance. The writer's reply was, that he did not believe either result followed; but both could not possibly follow; and that our duty is to obey the Lord Jesus Christ's commandment, not considering what shall follow. "Christian forbearance," as we hold the term, does not require the Churchman to abstain from resisting the Dissenter manfully in his endeavours to overthrow the union of Church and State; nor does it require the Dissenter to abstain from those endeavours, if he really thinks he has the mind of Christ in that attempt; nor does it require either, or both, while thus engaged, to look on each other as foemen. We grant that human nature is apt to fall into this antagonism and acerbity; but it was just to endeavour to counteract this tendency, and to promote union, in spite of those secondary, though important differences, that the Alliance was formed. To a certain extent it has succeeded.—[THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND EDITOR OF EVAN. CHRIS.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Sir,—Mr. Jackson has put the issue of Churchiam v. Brotherly Love so distinctly and pointedly, that you will perhaps allow me to make a very few remarks by way of reply.

He objects to the fundamental principle of the Evangelical Alliance—viz., that "no compromise of the views of any member, or sanction of those of others, on the points wherein they differ, is either required or expected, but that all are held as free as before to maintain and advocate their religious convictions," as unreal. "The loving union which I long for is a reality. To grasp one hand in love, and with the other undermine the Church to which I belong, is no love to me."

Let us put a parallel case: A is member of Parliament for a certain borough. B is endeavouring to disfranchise that borough; but at the same time expresses the greatest personal regard for A, and desires to be on the most friendly terms with him. A also admits the desirableness, in theory, of their maintaining a friendly relationship towards one another, but pronounces it impossible while B persists in his aggressive conduct. "To grasp one hand in love," he alleges, "and with the other to disfranchise the borough for which I am member, is no love to me." What would be thought of that in the House of Commons? And shall we set up amongst Christian brethren a lower standard of charity and mutual forbearance than would be tolerated by ordinary men of the world?

Sirs, we are brethren! And, whatever value we may attach to our respective systems, surely the voice of brotherly love should be heard from above the din of their conflicting claims. Granted, for instance, that the loss of Church-rates would be severely felt in some country parishes: granted, that as an outward symbol of our Church's nationality, it may be more desirable to maintain them in such parishes as can secure the requisite majority, than to abandon them altogether. But are such considerations to be compared in importance with the great duty of letting all men know that we are Christ's disciples by the love that we have to one another? I regret exceedingly that Dissenters think it worth while to assail Church-rates either in detail or in gross. I am at a loss to conceive what good they can expect to arise from abolishing them, at all sufficient to compensate for the alienation and irritation caused by the struggle. But there can be no doubt whatever that the better part of them are actuated by a thoroughly conscientious motives in the line which they adopt, as those which influence the better class of Churchmen to adopt an opposite line. And I contend most earnestly, that we have no more right to withhold the hand of friendship and brotherly love from them, because they endeavour to carry out the principle of Voluntaryism, than they have to withhold it from us, because we endeavour to maintain the principle of an Establishment.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL MINTON.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RECORD.

Sir.—Few who know me will suppose that the issue which I desired to raise was, as Mr. Minton states, that of "Churchism versus Brotherly Love," or that I wished to degrade the standard of mutual forbearance to a lower level than that which is acknowledged and practised by men of the world. I willingly admit that the hold which the Church of England has upon my affections is of such a different kind to that which can result from any connexion between a Member of Parliament and a borough, which he represents today, and from which he may be turned out tomorrow, that I can see no parallel between the two cases. When, however, Mr. Minton says, "Sirs, we are brethren," he speaks in language which commands respect, and occupies ground on which I can with pleasure meet him, though here too, perhaps, our views may not altogether coincide. Does he mean, when he sounds this rallying note of Christian union, that he claims all Dissenters as brethren? If not, my position is not touched. The brotherhood which I acknowledge is one which has reference, not to a man's creed or profession, but to his practice. I look at the fruits of the tree (Matt. viii. 16), and I ask myself, are these the fruits which we may expect to find growing on trees of righteousness of the Lord's planting? I can say from my heart, "Grace be with all them that love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth," and in doing so I am not careful to inquire to what Church a man belongs. The Christian brotherhood to which I claim attachment is above all human systems. It depends, not upon man's predilections, but upon God's choice. Those, and those only, whom God hath chosen for his children are of necessity brethren, and not to recognise such a brotherhood is to dishonour God.

But further, Mr. Minton asks whether the maintaining of Church-rates, can be compared in importance with the love of the brethren. In my mind the question of Church-rates has nothing to do with the matter at issue. I am quite willing to give the Dissenter every relief from that which he may find a burden to his conscience; I might think him unreasonable in his demand, but I would not even tell him so; I would exercise the forbearance of love, and say, Let not such a question interpose to mar the enjoyment and the practical usefulness of our Christian fellowship. But he goes a step further; he not only will not pay himself, but he says, neither shall you; and upon inquiring what is the cause of this strange determination to exempt those who are willing to pay, I find that he considers Church-rates merely an outwork which must fall, ere the citadel within can be taken, and that his ulterior object is to level the Church of England with the ground.

Now let me not be misunderstood. I have a large acquaintance amongst Dissenters, with whom I have enjoyed the sweetest Christian fellowship, and whom I esteem very highly in love for their works' sake. Many of them have told me privately, and I have heard them testify publicly, that they have no sympathy with those who are agitating for the downfall of our Church. Towards such my feelings are unchanged; I believe them to be brethren, and I love them as such. But he who said to those who were really so, "Sirs, ye are brethren," was the same who, when he found an Egyptian smiting an Hebrew, slew the Egyptian and hid him in the sand. Far be it from me to justify Moses in such a course, neither is it my wish to smite any one. To his own master each man must stand or fall. But the difference between those who as brethren are to be reconciled, and those who as strangers are to be put away, is here made plain. If a man's "religious convictions," as they are called, when brought to the test of God's Word, are found at variance with "Christian forbearance"—if he who claims all Christian forbearance at my hands, will practise none himself, I do not wish to judge or condemn him; I merely feel that there is no mutual love to be cultivated with such a man. To hold out to him the hand of friendship would be a mockery on my part. I must be content to separate from him, though in parting I would do the best I can for his soul and for the Church in which he ministers, and say to him, Do not waste your time and your talents in the pursuit of an object which can neither do good to man nor bring glory to God. The field in which to work is wide enough, go forth and scatter in it that precious seed, the harvesting of which shall be your joy and crown of rejoicing at the last day; and in doing this you shall find both labour to engage and satisfaction to recompense the highest talents which you possess, and the noblest energies of which you are capable.

I am, Sir, yours very faithfully,

CHARLES JACKSON.

MR. YOUNG'S TRANSLATION OF THE SONG OF SOLOMON.*

THERE are few interested in commerce who do not agree with M. Lesseps, when he asserts that the formation of a canal across the Isthmus of Suez would be fraught with immense advantages to trade in general, if the canal could be dug in the first instance, and kept open in the second place, at a moderate degree of expense. But the conduct of our Government and of our merchants, with reference to that scheme, has shown that they entertain no expectation of its practicability.

In a similar way, there are many proposals with which, though, so far as theory alone is concerned, we perfectly coincide, yet, owing to the impracticability of their being carried out, we would altogether reject. Among such proposals we would class that for a revision of our English Bible. We are not blind to the defects of our authorised version, and we have had often occasion to deviate from its renderings; but we consider it impracticable to obtain an able revision of it at the present time, and we fear that a new English translation would not be an improvement upon the old. We refer in these remarks to any authorised revision proposed to be made under the sanction of Government. We can conceive very well a revision, if made by a competent scholar, on his own responsibility, being a step in advance; and we freely own that we consider the translation of St. John's Gospel issued by the four clergymen, and that of the Revelation executed by Dr. Tregelles, as decided improvements in the main on our version, as is also, in general, the translation of Job by Professor Conant, published under the auspices of the American Bible Union. We may, however, reasonably require that new translations should not be issued, unless they are decidedly in advance of the old. When we are asked to throw aside that version which we have from our earliest days learned to love and venerate, we are entitled to ask, whether what we are called on to substitute for it is anything very superior in kind.

There is abroad, among many who might be expected to know better, very great ignorance about what a translation should be, and about the qualities requisite for a translator. We have met with few young students of the Biblical languages who have not, on very slight acquaintance with the subject, thought themselves capable of executing good translations. But it is one thing to be able to translate from the Hebrew or Greek a few verses at an examination, and quite another to make a translation of even two or three lines which would really be possessed of some merit. It is necessary for a translator, not only to know the meaning of the words he renders, but also their peculiar sense in a given passage, and to be thoroughly acquainted with the construction and syntax of the language from which he professes to translate. Now this latter is just the rock upon which many split. The subject has an air of dryness about it, and therefore is avoided; and it is from this cause that works which give analyses of words, and avoid giving the student the trouble of examining into grammar, are so popular. It ought also to be noticed that no one man is capable of executing well a translation of the entire Bible. It is a work too vast for a single scholar, however eminent his attainments, to accomplish.

We are not acquainted with Mr. Young's proposal, farther than we gather from the little pamphlet before us. We are not sure, whether he considers his scholarship equal to the performance of such a task as the translation of the entire Bible, but we judge that he does, from the title which he prefixes to his translation of the "Song of Songs." We find, from the testimonials that we have been favoured with, along with his pamphlet, that Mr. Young is, by some high in the literary world, considered as "one of the most accomplished Hebrew scholars in this kingdom;" and another eminent scholar considers "that as a Biblical orientalist and philologist, he has very few equals, if any, in this country," and feels "confident that, if placed in a favourable position, he will soon establish a reputation second to few, if any, of the orientalist of Germany itself." Now this is high praise, and not altogether undeserved, though we must confess it appears to us greatly exaggerated. Mr. Young is no doubt—we judge from his works, for we do not know him personally—a man of considerable linguistic ability, but his works, which are numerous, consist chiefly of portions of the Scripture, edited in various Shemitic tongues, and a few small root-books. The most useful of his works are his editions of the "Pirke Aboth," a Talmudic tract, with an English translation, and of "Maimonides' Book of the Precepts," also in Hebrew and English. Had he confined himself to editing Rabbinical works with translations, or had he brought out a tolerably complete Rabbinical Grammar with reading lessons, or published a Rabbinical Lexicon, somewhat larger than his Rabbinical Vocabulary, he would have done good service in this branch of investigation. But Mr. Young must forgive us for saying that, though numerous, his works are in the main too superficial, and several of them we would have advised him to have suppressed altogether. However, his great defect, which we trust he will remedy, is in his want of acquaintance with Hebrew syntax, and with scientific philology.

From these remarks our readers will perceive that we are not satisfied with Mr. Young's translation of the "Song of Songs," which is submitted as a specimen of his proposed new translation. We differ in limine from several of his principles of translation. Thus, for instance, from that laid down in the following:—"Every separate word in the original is represented, as nearly as possible, by the same uniform English equivalent throughout the translation, in accordance with the meanings laid down in the Translator's 'Hebrew English Dictionary' [not yet published], the result of many years' careful study."

Now this principle is enough of itself to vitiate any translation; nearly all words are used in several senses in the same language, and if the same idea is to be conveyed in another language, a different word must be used to express the desired meaning. Very often, also, two different words in a language—take, for instance, Hebrew—must, if some distance apart, be rendered by the same word in another language, —one language having many, and another fewer words to express the same idea; there being also a difference in most languages between the words used in polite and in vulgar phraseology, the latter, though perhaps more significant, being inadmissible into correct writing.

To follow "the order of the words and sentences, as far as English idiom will allow," is not a judicious plan, as very frequently, though admissible, such an attempt to follow a foreign idiom deprives the translation of its beauty and power.

Far better would it be, and far more useful, to adhere as much as possible in a translation of the Bible to our English version, and not to depart therefrom unless a decided advantage in beauty or force of diction be thereby gained, or a mistake of our translation corrected.

As specimens of the poverty of Mr. Young's translation, we give the following, from the 7th and 8th chapters, together with our English version. We are not to be understood as giving here any opinion as to the renderings:—

MR. YOUNG'S TRANSLATION.

Come, my beloved, let us go out to the field,
Let us lodge in the villages.

THE AUTHORISED VERSION.

Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the field;
Let us lodge in the villages.

Let us go early to the vineyards,
 Let us see if the vine hath flourished,
 The tender flower hath opened,
 The pomegranates have blossomed,
 There I give thee my loves!
 The mandrakes give out fragrance, and at our gates,
 All pleasant things, new, yea old, my beloved,
 I have laid up for thee.
 Who maketh thee as my brother,
 Sucking the breasts of my mother?
 I find thee without, I kiss thee,
 Yea, they do not despise me;
 I lead thee, I bring thee into my mother's house,
 She teacheth me,
 I cause thee to drink of perfumed wine,
 Of the juice of my pomegranate;
 His left hand is under my head,
 And his right doth embrace me!

Let us get up early to the vineyards,
 Let us see if the vine flourish,
 Whether the tender grape appear,
 And the pomegranates bud forth:
 There will I give thee my loves.
 The mandrakes give a smell, and at our gates
 Are all manner of pleasant fruits, new and old,
 Which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved.
 O that thou wert as my brother,
 That sucked the breasts of my mother!
 When I should find thee without, I would kiss thee;
 Yea, I should not be despised.
 I would lead thee, and bring thee into my mother's house,
 Who would instruct me:
 I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine
 Of the juice of my pomegranate.
 His left hand should be under my head,
 And his right hand should embrace me.

But we have graver faults to find with Mr. Young than mere defect in style, or lack of beauty in his renderings. He makes mistakes of considerable importance in his translation. Thus he renders ch. i. v. 7: "Tell me, thou whom my soul hath loved, where thou delightest, where thou liest down at noon." There is no instance of רעד being used absolutely in the signification of to delight, but it is often used thus in the sense of to feed, to tend a flock; and this mistake has led Mr. Young into a greater, that of making the hiphil פָּרַץ "thou liest down," instead of, as our authorised version has it correctly, "where thou makest [thy flock] to rest," or lie down, which is always the meaning of the word.

A grammatical mistake occurs in his rendering of ch. i. 1, "go out . . . and feed thy two kids," for שְׁנֵי בָּקָרִים is in the plural, and not, as Mr. Young supposes, in the dual number. His error has probably originated from the use of the suffix יָהּ, which, however, is the regular suffix for the second person feminine affixed to plural nouns.

But verse 9 is even more wonderfully translated: "To my own joyous one in chariots of freedom, have I compared thee, my friend." This is simply an absurd translation—we can see no intelligible meaning in it at all; but we suppose the following to be the method by which Mr. Young would derive the meanings for the words here occurring in his forthcoming Hebrew Lexicon. To the unused root סרס is given in the lexicons, the idea of gladness, leaping for joy, hence Mr. Young would say comes סרסו "joyous one;" to פרע is primarily assigned the meaning to loose, to let go, hence he would say comes פָּרְעוּ freedom. Query, of what form does he consider the noun—whether as a contraction for פָּרְעוֹן; or would he vocalise it פָּרְעָה, a word nowhere found? We have supposed this case, as, we regret to say, it is in this way many so-called Hebraists in this country set to work. But all this is inadmissible. The word סרסו is simply the feminine of סרס, which is used to signify a horse or a swallow, the real meaning inherent in the root being the idea of leaping, and that of gladness a secondary meaning, and one not found at all in the root סרס, but in its cognate שוּרַץ. The feminine may possibly be connected with either meaning, but the mention made here of chariots, decisively proves that a mare is meant; and the allusion to a fine steed in the royal chariots of Pharaoh is very suitable, horses being imported from Egypt into Palestine (1 Kings x. 28, 29). Compare the comparison in Theocritus Idyll. xviii. 30, 31, of Helen, to ἡ ἀρμὰς θεισسالδὲς ἵππος, and Hor. Carm. III. ii. 9—12, speaking of Lyde—

Quæ, velut latissima campis,
 Ludit exultim metuitque tangi.
 Nuptiarum expers, et adhuc protervosa
 Cruda marito.

The meaning which Mr. Young assigns to the proper name פֶּרֶדָּה—which he chooses, in violation of all usage, to consider as an abstract noun instead of a proper name—is quite untenable. The fact is, the word is not Hebrew, but Coptic; probably either p. r'a, the sun; or according to De Rouge, pr. 'au, the great house (Vide "Zeitschrift der D.M.G.," vol. xii. p. 720, and Brugsch "Die Geographie der Nachbarländer Egypt," p. 93). The rendering of our authorised version, "I have compared thee, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots," is derived from the version of the Septuagint, in which the word is taken as collective.

Mr. Young's translation of ch. iii. 6 is—"What is this coming up from the wilderness,

"Like a palm-tree of smoke,

"Perfumed with myrrh and frankincense

"From every powder of the merchant?"

We can only say of this that it yields a bad sense, and is again in defiance of Hebrew usage, as, whether we adopt the reading תִּמְרוֹת ע' or תִּמְרוֹת ע', the meaning is "without doubt," as Gesenius says, "columns of smoke," or, as our authorised version has it, "pillars of smoke;" and the word is in the plural and not in the singular, as Mr. Young has translated it.

Passing onward, we note, in ch. iv. 4, another indefensible rendering: "As the tower of David is thy neck, built for an armoury, the chief of the shields are hung on it;" in the place of the rendering of the authorised version, which is here again correct, "whereon there hang a thousand bucklers," which every scholar knows is the only assignable meaning to the Hebrew מִלְחָמָה in this place. Mr. Young's translation has not even the merit here of improving the sense. The reference in the passage is to a custom common among the orientals.

We pass by many smaller mistakes—such as the translation of ch. ii. 13, "and the vines, the tender flower," instead of "and the vines are in blossom," the neglect of the article, the considering "Nadib" as a proper name, &c.—and come in the last place to Mr. Young's rendering of ch. vii. 7-10, the first part of which he considers to have been spoken by the bridegroom, and the second by the bride, thus:—

"Yea, let thy breasts be, I pray thee,

"As clusters of the vine,

"And the fragrance of thy face as citrons,

"And thy palate as good wine."

(BRIDE.)

"Flowing to my beloved in uprightness;

"He speaketh with the lips of the aged;

"I am my beloved's, and towards me is his desire."

We must here again confess we cannot see the meaning of "flowing in uprightness;" there are two intelligible meanings of the Hebrew, either with reference to the wine "flowing straight" down into the throat; or with reference to the speech of the beloved one, taking דָּבָר to be used here with reference to the speech, which is not so good. The best sense is perhaps extracted by considering the moisture of the palate to be delicately alluded to, slipping through the lips of the sleeping lovers—a reference frequent among the Arabian poets. As to Mr. Young's rendering of שָׁנִים by "the aged" instead of "those that are asleep" (authorised version), it is incorrect, as that would require שָׁנִים אֲשֶׁר, and he falls into the same mistake with our version in considering דָּבָר to mean "to speak" instead of "to slip through."

Here we must bring to a conclusion our remarks upon Mr. Young's translation, which has rather lessened than increased our opinion of his scholarship. He is, however, a scholar in many respects worthy of commendation, though we consider he is too defective in taste and in critical skill, to be qualified for the position of a translator of the Bible. Gladly would we see him occupying some Oriental chair, where he might have leisure to pursue his studies, and time to remedy his mistakes.

We would urge him rather to pursue his studies in Rabbinical Hebrew, than to pursue his translational labours; and let him above all things examine closely such works as Gesenius' Thesaurus before he publishes his Hebrew Dictionary, which we fear will prove to be a failure, from the specimen we have in this translation of the "Song of Songs."

Foreign Intelligence.

THE succeeding papers, from different parts of the world, seem to us replete with valuable information. Our French letter is principally occupied with further illustrations of the collision into which the Popish clergy of France have brought themselves with the Government by their violent invectives against the Emperor for his Italian policy. It concludes, however, by a brief advertence to the Alliance lately formed among the Free Churches of the countries which use the French language. We have the plan of their union lying before us, and so important a document we must publish, but necessarily postpone it until our next number.

Those who are watching the progress of enlightenment, of the liberty of the press, and the formation of public opinion in Spain, will read with much interest the curious colloquy in the Cortes, between a member and the minister, which our correspondent relates. That dark country seems struggling to emerge into the light.

It will be felt alike gratifying and remarkable to read in our German letter how Popery has overreached itself in the different Concordats it obtained, first from Austria, and then from some of the minor States, provoking a reaction which has abolished them all. We can scarcely believe that we are not suffering under some illusion when we read that, by the recent enactments, "all the subjects of the Austrian Empire are equal in the eye of the law, all qualified for office in the State, all free in the exercise of their worship." We refer our readers to the letter itself.

We give a continuation, this month, of the Mission Tour in Sweden, and an intelligent paper on recent Ecclesiastical legislation in Denmark.

Our Italian section is particularly full and interesting. Each of the four papers possesses its own value, while they combine to give us hopeful views of the advancement of Evangelical truth in different parts of the country.

From still remoter nations and British colonies there is much to interest the reader, especially on Medical Missions and the Week of Prayer.

FRANCE.

Paris, April, 1861.

THE PAPACY AND MODERN CIVILISATION.

The struggle of which I have so often spoken, between the French Government and the clerical party, is becoming more and more open and serious. What at the commencement was simply a state of coolness and distrust is now one of avowed hostility. Of this new and striking proofs will be furnished by all the facts which will find a place in this letter.

Ab Jove principium. Before turning our attention to the bishops and priests, let us say a few words on the last allocution delivered by Pius IX. It is a vehement manifesto against the ideas and laws of 1789. The Pope has no fear of pursuing with his anathemas liberty of conscience and worship, and the equality of citizens before the law, the admissibility of members of different religious communions to public offices—in a word, what he himself calls liberalism, progress, or modern civilisation. He declares that the Court of Rome has already made every reasonable concession to the people of the Pontifical States, and that further political or civil changes would be contrary to the duties of the Papacy. He refuses to be reconciled to Italy. Pius IX. says that no alliance is possible between good and evil, light and darkness, Christ and Belial. But he generously offers to pardon those Italians who may come to him, penitently striking their breasts, and confessing and weeping over their deviations from the right path!

Very well. Thus it is that the Roman

Pontiff has responded to the counsels of Napoleon III., who left nothing undone by way of proposing terms for effecting an arrangement between the Papacy and the Italian nation. Our Government now understands how vain are any such efforts. Pius IX. is not content with condemning the notions put forth by demagogues, the views of Mazzini, and the revolutionary spirit; his blows are aimed at civilisation itself; that is to say, at the institutions represented by France and the Napoleon dynasty. All or nothing: such is the device which Rome has inscribed upon her standard. We shall see what will be the end of this great quarrel.

Public opinion has been greatly exasperated by the Papal Allocution. The Legitimist and Romish journals, except the Monde, which shrinks from no enormity, have been ashamed to undertake the defence of such a document. They have raised some petty and miserable controversies on the translation of some phrases of this address, not having the courage to justify the incredible assertions of their spiritual chief; for in France the equality of all citizens in the eye of the law, is a principle which has obtained universal ascendancy and recognition.

Poor Pius IX. is ill-advised. What he regards as firmness is blind obstinacy, and he will end by losing the cause which he is bound to maintain. His temporal sovereignty is only a question of time: it is already virtually abolished, and no human power can restore it.

SENTENCE OF THE COUNCIL OF STATE UPON THE BISHOP OF POITIERS.

I mentioned in my last letter (Evangelical Christendom, page 171) the pastoral letter of M. Pie, Bishop of Poitiers, who compared Napoleon III. to Pontius Pilate, and I said that that defamatory libel had been submitted to the examination of the Council of State. Judgment in the matter has since been given; and an Imperial decree declares that there has been an abuse of authority in the letter, and orders that all copies shall be suppressed.

The report on this subject by one of the Councillors of State presents some curious features. First, M. Pie refuses to recognise the competence of this high tribunal; he even denies the authority of the Organic Articles, in virtue of which he has been brought under the jurisdiction of the Council of State. The Romish bishops have a very easy manner of explaining everything. They accept certain portions of the laws, and reject others, as they think fit. Thus, they receive, without the least remonstrance, the pecuniary support and the honours which are secured to them by the Organic Articles, but upon those points which impose some bounds to their wishes they contest the legality of these same Articles! This means, in plain terms, that they take the benefits without the costs, which is ridiculous! Secondly, M. Pie pretends that the bishops have a right to give the people instruction upon every imaginable subject, and that they ought to exercise a power of direction, as it is called, over civil society. The prelates of the Romish Church would thus transform their pulpits into political tribunes, as was done by the preachers of the French League in the sixteenth century, and the State would be the humble servant of the clergy! It might do well enough in the middle ages, for these two authorities to occupy respectively a position like this, but it would be an egregious mistake now-a-days.

As to the famous comparison with Pontius Pilate, M. Pie has not the courage to go through with it. He has written to the Council of State that it was simply a hypothesis, an argument in futurum, but that Napoleon III. has too much wisdom to imitate Pontius Pilate, &c. Nobody is the dupe of this ridiculous explanation.

But the Bishop of Poitiers has been very indifferent to the sentence for abuse, on account of which his letter was condemned. What is the penalty which it involves? Very little for bigots. M. Pie ascended the pulpit on Easter-day, before an immense auditory; and then, instead of discoursing to his hearers upon the resurrection of Jesus Christ, he expressed the happiness he felt at having received, from all parts of the Christian world, the very highest approval of his pastoral letter. So we have here a new martyr, and a cheap one too! The Pope has probably congratulated the prelate on having abused the French Emperor, and only waits the opportune moment to invest him with the Roman purple!

CIRCULAR OF THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE RESPECTING THE OFFENSIVE PROCEEDINGS OF THE ROMISH CLERGY.

The French Government was fully aware that the prosecution of the Bishop of Poitiers was not sufficient to check the encroachments of the sacerdotal body, and after a long cabinet council, M. Delangle, Minister of Justice, addressed to the Attorneys-General of the Imperial Courts a circular, directing them to summon before the tribunals every bishop or priest who should exceed the limits of his au thority. The document in question is at the present moment the subject of the most furious comment by the press. I will indicate the causes and consequences of this.

The period of Lent is a time of great activity with the Romish clergy. The prelates write pastoral letters which are read to the people in all the churches of their dioceses. The parish priests, their curates, and the monks especially—Jesuits, Dominicans, and others—deliver sermons, morning and evening, every day in the week. The occasion was a favourable one assuredly to excite agitation in the minds of the people, and the clerical party largely profited by it. It would be difficult to give you a just idea of the violent language indulged in by the Romish orators. They censured, abused, and condemned, without scruple or restraint, the policy of the Government, and even the high public functionaries and liberal writers who had dared to resist the pretensions of the Papacy. Their effrontery was really as shameless as it was unprecedented.

The Minister of Justice had received numerous reports from the prefects and his other agents, respecting the offensive character of the preaching of the Roman Catholic clergy. "Some of them," said he, "forgetting that a priest's mission is to watch over the religious instruction of the faithful, give themselves to criticise the acts of the Government, and labour to make the Emperor's policy an object of mistrust and reprobation. Others, yielding to the impulse of a blind zeal, attack the sovereign personally, and seek to overwhelm him with insults. Others, again, taking advantage of the intellectual weakness and credulity of their flocks, find a delight in troubling people's consciences, by announcing imaginary misfortunes."

Having characterised the abuses committed by Romish ecclesiastics, the Minister of Justice cites the articles of the Penal Code, which punish with imprisonment, from three months to two years, and even banishment, the clergy who, whether by the living voice or in their writings, censure the laws, the Government, the Imperial decrees, or any other act of the political authorities. M. Delangle ends his circular by requesting the Attorneys-General to employ against the systematic hostility of the clergy, the weapons which the law has entrusted to the Government to maintain order and tranquillity. "It is time," says the head of the judicial administration of France, "that legality should re-assume its empire."

This circular has been generally received by the nation with approval and sympathy. Doubtless the penalties with which the priests are threatened by the code are somewhat harsh, and among a people who enjoy great liberty they may seem excessive. We, for our part, wish that the clerical orators had more extended rights. But it should be particularly observed that the Jesuitical party has itself called down the severest punishments on its adversaries, and has applauded every judicial sentence by which the mouths of Protestants and freethinkers have been closed. If the same weapons are now employed against the priests, whose fault is it? Will the dignitaries of the Papal Church at length understand that common rights and common liberty form a safeguard for all—for themselves, as well as for their antagonists? This would be a very useful lesson, from which our entire country might profit.

I must add, that the members of the clerical faction, having long enjoyed not a little indulgence from the civil power, and believing that its complaisance towards them would never cease, disgracefully used their influence to oppress their fellow-citizens. You can scarcely form an idea in England how a bishop or an archbishop, some six years ago, was wont to lord it over his diocese. The prelate was a sort of pasha or mandarin of the highest rank, presiding over and governing all, and arranging everything according to his mere whims, or his ambitious views. If a prefect had the audacity to thwart him, that prefect was speedily ejected. The presidents of the Imperial Courts, the deans of academies, the heads of military bodies, the mayors of great cities—yes, all the public employés, even the most exalted, went before Monsieur the bishop, and obsequiously paid him their homage, being persuaded that there was no better means of preserving their place in the State. The prelates therefore looked upon themselves as the most eminent personages in the country, and ruled the populations of the provinces with a rod of iron. Their ideal was the priest accompanied with the soldier, and that the nation should be forced to bend its head beneath this double tyranny. You can now judge why independent citizens applaud the new measures, which restrain, within juster limits, the authority of the clergy.

SUPPRESSION OF RELIGIOUS HOUSES.

Other recent acts show that the Government is resolved to put a stop to the encroachments of the Jesuitical party. Some Redemptorist monasteries have just been suppressed in the North of France.

According to our laws, no monastic association can be founded without the authority of the Minister of Worship. The legislator thought that it belonged to the civil power to determine the number of those institutions which impose special obligations upon particular individuals, and separate them from general society. What, then, is the law as to monks? There are, in our provinces, a certain number of monastic foundations which exist without having been authorised. Government, continually influenced by the wish to make itself as agreeable as possible to the sacerdotal body, shut its eyes to these illegal establishments. Its mode of proceeding having altered of late, it has commanded the monastery of Redemptorists at Douay to be suppressed. The interdict has also extended to the monasteries of Lille and Hazebrouck; or at least the foreign monks, who reside in those religious houses, have been ordered to quit.

It appears, in fact, that there were a number of Belgians and Germans among these Redemptorists, and that they endeavoured to excite discontent among the masses. Their pretext was the exercise of charity; their real object was to raise up obstacles to the powers that be. These acts of prohibition or expulsion are therefore dictated by serious motives. France may allow of the presence of monks, since the Romish Church has need of such instruments; but France is not compelled to tolerate restless and factious foreigners, who employ their sacred character to stir up the worst passions.

VALENT PROCLAMATIONS OF THE ULTRAMONTANE PARTY.

It is almost superfluous to add, that the circular of the Minister of Justice and the suppression of these convents have excited violent clamour and bitter complaint in the Ultramontane camp. Though the Jesuits and priests are ready enough to strike others with merciless force, they are not at all resigned to being struck themselves, and their remonstrances are the more furious as they are not accustomed to be curbed by the stern hand of public authority.

Hence a chorus of outcries and maledictions. All this anger would be simply amusing if the questions involved in the struggle were less serious. The Monde, the Gazette de France, the Union, the Ami de la Religion—all the Ultramontane and Legitimist journals—announce, in mournful language, that the time of the great tribulation is come, and that the coming of Antichrist draws nigh! They proclaim that this persecution resembles that of Nero and Diocletian! All Europe, all humanity, is threatened to its foundations, because the Popish preachers can no longer insult the Government, and because a few vagabond monks have been expelled the country! These reverend personages, however, swear before heaven and earth that they are ready to descend into the catacombs and to mount the martyrs' scaffold! This is childish nonsense. Napoleon III. is not a modern Nero, and his councillors will never play the part of the old inquisitors. The bishops retain their palaces, their large revenues, their equipages, and their splendid retinues; and the Jesuits follow in peace their labours, and even their intrigues. Only they must henceforth be a little more moderate, and abstain from lighting the torch of civil war. Is this asking too much?

What is most intolerable in the statement of their grievances is, that they complain of being less free than their adversaries. Nothing is more untrue. They have the same liberty as their fellow-citizens to publish books, to circulate pamphlets, to write in the periodical press—in a word, to express their opinions. They have even the privilege of speaking to thousands of auditors in the churches, while private citizens cannot convene meetings, or form associations, to repel the invectives of the Jesuits. How, then, can the sacerdotal body be said to be less free than the rest of the nation? But the fact is, that the ministers and agents of Rome are so in the habit of exerting a monopoly of power, that equality of rights is, in their eyes, a sort of slavery! So soon as they are put upon a level with the other inhabitants of the same country, they deem themselves persecuted; and Nero, they say, is already at the door. It is to be hoped that experience will teach them to fight with equal weapons. We wish nothing more; we shall accept nothing less.

Harsh proceedings towards Protestants are becoming more rare, thank God; for in proportion as the Government frees itself from the influence of the clergy, it is better disposed to do justice to the Dissenting communions. Nevertheless, in some little towns and remote villages intolerance still endeavours to lift up its head. Here is a recent case in point.

INTOLERANCE OF A MAYOR.

M. Schlumberger, a rich and active manufacturer, died at Corbie, a little town in the department of the Somme. He had by his skill and energy furnished employment and subsistence to two thousand workpeople. He was universally respected, lived an exemplary life, and was very charitable to the poor. But he was the only Protestant in the commune. His family solicited a place for his mortal remains in the cemetery, which is communal property. Baron Cayx de Saint-Aymour, Mayor of Corbie, in concert with the Popish curé, brutally answered that the gates of the cemetery would be closed against the corpse, and he ordered the grave, which had already been dug, to be filled up. The relations then applied to the prefect of the department, who immediately granted their request. But this was not all. When the pastor, having been asked to perform the funeral service, entered the cemetery, the same Baron Cayx de Saint-Aymour disputed his right to speak over the tomb of his respected co-religionist. The minister of Christ paid no attention to this extravagant prohibition, and delivered an edifying address surrounded by an immense concourse of spectators. This affair has excited the attention of the Parisian press. The Mayor of Corbie has been justly blamed for having exceeded his authority, and violated the law. He has attempted, in a long letter, to justify himself, but his defence is an awkward affair. Barons and curés should be aware that the opinion of the nation condemns whatever is contrary to the liberty and equality of religious communions.

ALLIANCE BETWEEN SOME OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES OF THE CONTINENT.

A Protestant journal of Paris, the Archives du Christianisme, publishes the provisions of a Union or Alliance formed between the Free Evangelical Churches of France, Geneva, Neuchâtel, Canton de Vaud, Berne, and Belgium. "The Churches which constitute this alliance," says the document in question, "professing the same faith, and animated by the same spirit, manifest and draw closer, in fraternal love, the bonds by which they are already united together; each of them preserving its autonomy and its full individual freedom." The authors of this plan of union then set forth the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel which are admitted by the united Churches, and they add, that the delegates of these congregations will hold regular conferences in central places, in order to carry on together works of piety and evangelization. To a permanent committee, of three members, will be entrusted whatever concerns the Alliance in the interval between one conference and another. This is an interesting effort to secure closer intimacy and collective action among the servants of Christ. X. X. X.

SPAIN.

FREEDOM OF WORSHIP.

Sir,—Nothing has ever tended more to retard the Spanish nation in its progress in literature and the sciences, and, ultimately, to hasten its decay among the kingdoms of Europe, than the blind pertinacity with which she has always insisted on the unity of her religion. The greatest boon which wise and enlightened Spaniards in all ages have ever craved at the hands of their sovereigns, is "libertad de cultos." It is painful to think that, for want of this simple concession, thousands of men and women have been sacrificed in the flames, their property confiscated, and their families held as infamous. But the picture is too dark: I gladly turn from it to a prospect more cheering. Never was there so bright a prospect of that boon being speedily and fully bestowed as at this moment.

It is true that Isabella II. and her confessor, Padre Claret, still set their faces against it as a flint, but there is reason to believe that her ministers see it their duty to point out her own true position, in connexion with those events which have recently occurred in other kingdoms of Europe, and the startling consideration that her Majesty is now the only Bourbon who continues to occupy a throne.

After the recent grant of liberty to the serfs of Russia—the religious privileges accorded to the Protestants of Austria—the French Emperor's Easter Sunday's donation of 2,000*f.* towards the erection of a Protestant church at Biarritz—to say nothing of what has been done and is still doing in Italy—Spain now sees it impossible to defer the emancipation of its people from that state of mental slavery which they have endured for centuries, by reason of a cruel and mistaken policy.

The religious periodicals of Madrid, leaning on the high authority of the Pope's last allocution, are obliged, at last, to admit, in so many words, "their conviction that liberal institutions are incompatible with Roman Catholicism." What a concession to Spaniards groaning under the tyranny of the Roman Church, and longing for civil and religious liberty! Yes, these same journals say, and so have persons in high positions in Madrid long since said, though privately, that freedom of worship must come—it cannot be prevented—and that the question is only one of time. Under these circumstances, it is deeply interesting to watch the dawn of the great event, and mark its signs of approach. Here is one of them.

In the sitting of the Cortes of the 5th inst., the following curious incident occurred, the importance of which, as a step towards the expected freedom, none but Spaniards can thoroughly appreciate:—

Senor Figuerola (a deputy), addressing the Home Minister, said: "In the article of a journal which has not been permitted to circulate, although attacking neither the religion nor institutions of the country, there is a document of a Spanish bishop, Father Claret, the bad literary taste of which forms a contrast with the good ones of other prelates. This document, and the comments which accompany it, have been condemned by the red pencil of the Fiscal (Censor). Now I wish to know whether the minister to whom I am addressing myself has had any intimation of the suppression of the Clamor Publico, and whether such suppression is on account of this article or of those comments? because, in the latter case, the Congress cannot but be alarmed at the nature of the instructions given to the Fiscal for the suppression of writings of that kind."

The Home Minister: "The Fiscal has no other instructions than those written in the law. I cannot say at this moment, because I have not read the article, whether or not I agree in opinion with the Fiscal as to the propriety of the suppression."

Senor Figuerola: "Then I beseech the Congress to permit me to read, not the writing of Padre Claret, which is of a bad kind, and, moreover, circulates and runs everywhere in print, but what the Clamor Publico in its comments says respecting it, and which comments are the objects of the suppression. The words are these: 'Within the last few days, the neo Catholics have transmitted, by the post of the interior, to many persons known for their liberal opinions, a certain exhortation of Father Claret, printed on the half of a small quarto sheet of paper, and adorned with two roughly-engraved woodcuts, one representing hell, the other the most holy Virgin Mother of God and consolation of the afflicted. We are amongst the number of those favoured with this present. The pious and charitable soul that sent it to us yesterday, under cover, has had the goodness to add a few comments, to show the Evangelical spirit with which it was animated, and its goodwill towards us. In the cut representing hell may be seen a sinner, condemned to eternal torments, which infernal spirits are busily engaged in stirring up with horrible malignity. But besides this, the devout anonymous person of whom we speak has written in the margin of that odious picture, contrary to the maxims of Jesus Christ (and which is a mockery of our holy religion, the fountain of hope and love), various letters and references, to signify that every one of us is the reprobate which is so represented, and that all of us are condemned to the flames and to the torments of hell in consequence of the political doctrines which we maintain, and the ideas which we recommend. The exhortation to which we refer is conceived in these terms.' Then follows the exhortation of Father Claret, which I will not read, for the reasons already stated. The Clamor Publico goes on to say: 'We call the attention, not only of the civil authorities, to such a document, in which are condemned to hell those who frequent balls and theatres, but of all men of liberal opinions, be the party what it may to which they belong, in order that they may unite their voices with ours against the iniquitous means employed, for some time past, by this party to alarm the conscience and promote superstition, by introducing unhappiness and bitterness in the hearts of the people, and inspiring with fear the minds of the credulous, fanatical, and ignorant. Let not the men who now govern, nor any constitutional party, be guilty of entertaining any such illusions. The crusade which has been commenced, the war of extermination which is preached is against all those, without exception, who have accepted the great reforms of the present epoch and the conquests of civilisation. We should all be confounded under the same blow by the triumph of those new barbarians who profane the Gospel, and wish to make the God of charity, clemency, and mercy, a God of hate, rancour, and vengeance. Alas for us, the reaction should prevail! In every street

A fact which proves how far distant we are from this conviction, is the deeply interesting debate which has recently taken place in the First Chamber of the Kingdom of Saxony. In this country, the cradle of the Reformation, a land exclusively Lutheran, where the most narrow-minded confessionism is dominant, the Church, deprived of every kind of independence, has been hitherto governed directly by a Ministry of State; yet nevertheless, even here, the want of an ecclesiastical constitution has made itself felt. But what sort of constitution has been proposed to the country? In the first place, it is not the Church itself, but a political state body, the First Chamber, which has been charged with the deliberation of the project, and I will now acquaint you with some of the features of that project itself, which will astonish your English readers beyond measure. The parishes were to have the election of their elders, but not of their pastors, who were still to be imposed on the people by authority. The principal personage in the parish, on whom the proposed constitution would have devolved the chief inspection, the first rank in religious ceremonies, a place of distinction in public worship, and at whose death, or at the death of whose wife, the bells would have tolled—this personage is the patron, to whom, moreover, belongs the right of the nomination of the pastor. The constitution would have created a general synod, but with consultative powers only, and without publicity. The adoption or the rejection of its resolutions would have depended, as always, on the supreme bishop (summus episcopus), who, in Saxony, is a Roman Catholic king. One more feature shall close this description. This attempt at reform not only required all the pastors, but all the professors and tutors employed in public instruction, from the university to the village school, to take an oath of subscription to the symbolical books. By this we are to understand, not only the Confession of Augsburg and the Catechism of Luther, but the Formula of Agreement (Formula Concordiæ), which is a learned and voluminous treatise of dogmatic theology! Well, this project of a constitution, so astonishing in the character of some of its articles, has been rejected, after long debates, as too liberal! Nevertheless, principles have been mooted, and debated before the public, and there is no doubt that with time they will make their way. Is it possible that, in the country of Luther, the Word of the Living God—the Gospel of His grace—which alone emancipates human souls—which only gives vitality and freedom to His Church—should not complete its work by breaking down the narrow barrier of political institutions, and by overthrowing all the pretensions of a clericalism which will never bring about the triumph of the kingdom of Jesus Christ? Let the breath of the Spirit of God, with its Divine power, make itself felt, and the Church will, from blessed experience, comprehend that sublime saying of Paul, “Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.”

DENMARK.

ECCLESIASTICAL AND RELIGIOUS PROGRESS.

ECCLESIASTICAL LEGISLATION.

At the last session of the Diet, Bishop Monrad, the Minister for Ecclesiastical Affairs, endeavoured to take a first step towards the introduction of a Church constitution, by moving a bill for the erection of presbyteries (menighadsraad) in the different congregations. The erection of presbyteries was indeed permitted in 1856, and they have been formed in several congregations; but by the proposed bill they might be instituted if the congregation desired it, notwithstanding that the pastor should be opposed to it, whereas, hitherto, his consent was necessary. The bill also regulated the duties of the presbyteries, and conferred upon them certain rights which they did not previously possess, e. g. to propose three of the candidates for a vacant living. It was laid before our seven Landmødes (diocesan synods), but it met with little sympathy; the ministers, however, laid it before the Landsting soon after its opening in October of last year. It was opposed by those who wish no good to the Church, and by others who, entertaining the opinions of Pastor Grundtvig, are altogether adverse to the Church having any constitution at all. They fear that the indefinite liberty which the pastors and Christian people now possess, would be abridged by a constitution based upon secular instead of spiritual relations, and that the introduction of prescribed forms would tend to annihilate Christian life; and when the Minister proposed that those only should be electors who professed their adherence to their baptismal vows, they said that this would produce hypocrisy. The fact is, they are opposed to every measure of the kind. The majority of the committee of the Landsthing argued against the bill, because the spiritual life of the congregation is not so vigorous as to render such a constitution useful, because it was only the first step to further measures, and because it was not based on the principle of the free congregations, set up since the abolition of the parochial system (see Evangelical Christendom, vol. xiv., p. 36)—which, however, are very few—but upon that system itself. But the bill passed by a very slight majority. In the Folkething it did not reach a second reading before the session broke up.

By another bill the same Minister sought to convert the tithes of the clergy into a fixed salary. From the tithes, aided by a contribution to be paid by the more richly endowed livings, a Church fund was proposed to be formed. This paragraph of the bill was rejected, chiefly because the friends of the cause thought that the interests of the Church were not sufficiently guaranteed. The other paragraphs, not of much significance, were adopted by both the Things.

By a third bill he aimed to regulate the duties of the tithe-owners. One-third of the tithes, charged with the obligation of maintaining the fabrics, is for the most part in the hands of private persons. After several changes made in it, the bill passed both the Things. But two very essential paragraphs were rejected—one that every tithe-owner should pay a contribution annually towards a Church fund, for the erection of new churches, and the other that the tithe-owner should give a contribution to a considerable amount towards building a new church when the present one was deemed too small. These paragraphs were objected to by the Landemodes, on the ground that they were a violation of the rights of property; and in the Landsthing they were rejected for the same reason. By the help of the Folkething, the Minister succeeded in procuring the adoption of some motions (of a very mitigated form, however) by which the erection of new churches is a little facilitated. In this House also, during the session, the sentiment was reiterated that the Church has no property at all, but the opinion was opposed by the Minister.

THE DANISH CHURCH OF SCHLESWIG.

Another of your Danish correspondents, some months ago, represented to your readers the situation of the Church in Schleswig (see Evangelical Christendom, vol. xiv., p. 38); and to the description then given, of the accuracy of which I am firmly convinced, I have nothing to add. He has shown that the Danish Government is indulgent and just, and that no persecution of the Germans in Schleswig has any existence. The Danish districts have Divine service in the Danish language, the German in German, the mixed every alternate Sunday in each. In two recent instances the Government has further shown how much it wishes to do justice to all its subjects. With regard to confirmation, it allows the instruction of the catechumens to be given in the language which prevails in the school of the parish, but prescribes that the reiteration of the baptismal vows and the blessing shall take place in the language which the catechumen prefers. And further, the catechumen is permitted to choose the pastor by whom he will be instructed and confirmed. Besides this, that nobody may have ground to complain that his children must be instructed in the Danish language, all who wish to do so may engage a private tutor (several parents may engage one jointly), who shall have the right to instruct their children in the language they prefer. Notwithstanding these concessions, the Germans are not content. They still complain of religious persecution, and it would seem, therefore, that their complaints proceed from political, and not from religious considerations.

SPIRITUAL CONDITION OF THE WHOLE.

We have reason to thank God that the spiritual life which, for the last few years, has been quickened amongst us, continues to make progress, and from various parts of the country we hear tidings of awakenings. But they bear a different impress from those in America and Ireland. The national character of the Danish people is reserved. They do not speak much about their feelings, still less about the results of their labours. Much consequently is unnoticed, which it would delight the heart of the Christian to hear. But often those who are acquainted with Christians in different parts of the country, are delighted with the news that the churches are crowded with larger congregations, that Bibles and tracts are more widely circulated, and that many are roused to a concern for the salvation of their souls. The good work advances quietly but constantly. The progress is due, under God, to several pious laymen—mostly peasants, who gather meetings and speak at them, but who have, many of them, seceded from the Church—and to pious pastors, whose numbers constantly increase. A heterodox sermon is seldom to be heard, the Word of God is preached firmly, although not always with force and persuasion. Many of the pious pastors assemble with their congregations at Bible meetings (Bibellæsning), at which hymns are sung and the Bible is expounded. The number of such meetings increases every year. Two of the bishops, if not more, hold meetings of this kind at Copenhagen, and several of the pastors; while in the country towns and villages many follow their example. These meetings are generally crowded, even when the churches are thinly attended; they are held on Sundays, or week-day evenings, where the pastor has two or more churches, and the faithful are neither deterred by dark nights, nor by having three or four miles to go to the houses in which the meetings are held. The holy cause of missions is embraced with greater and greater zeal, and two of the bishops have lately recommended it in their charge. We hope, in the course of this summer, to have a great missionary conference at Aarhus. A missionary school is to be founded, and branches of the Danish Missionary Society are formed in different parts of the country. From 1859 to 1860, 13,907 Bibles and New Testaments were sold, or otherwise distributed; and amongst them 6,951 New Testaments, by the agents of the British Bible Society at Copenhagen. Our Tract Society, instituted in 1858, has published about 89,000 copies, or about 141,000 sheets, and thirteen new tracts. It has 170 agents all over the country, who, without remuneration, sell the tracts. In several parts of the country, almost every parish has its own agent of the society. At present we have no colporteurs, our institution is as yet so young, and our means are small; but we hope in time to have many of these Christian men pursuing their vocation among us. V.

SWEDEN.

A MISSION TOUR FOR THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

In conclusion of this account (see last month's number), I feel constrained to add the following rejoicing news:—

REVIVALS.

From the province of Wernland, N— parish, a Christian friend writes as follows: Prayer answered the 13th of January. The united prayer-meetings—the second week of January—have been the mighty means through which the Lord, in this remote quarter of the world, has saved many souls from the impending eternal damnation. Yes! the Lord has done marvellous things among us, wherefore we express our deep feelings of gratitude towards God and our dear brethren of the Evangelical Alliance in Great Britain, from whom the exhortations to these prayer-meetings have issued. I have been witness to the conversion of hundreds of men since I began to carry forth the message of peace and love in these regions, but scarcely have I seen any more glorious than those phenomena with which God, with His rich blessings and His Spirit, has crowned our weak efforts in the parish of N—, and some adjacent farms.

From the 8th to the 27th of January we have been assembled to united prayer, with the exception of three evenings. Besides this, some few believers have united separately in the village of J— every morning and noon, and thus continued the first fortnight.

The first evenings of the week, our prayer effected that our most bitter enemies were moved to open their houses, with some interest; and this our first victory gave a special occasion to thanksgiving, mingled with sighs and tears from old and young. But not yet did we see any awakenings among the dead world, but it was like a sound before the rain; we bowed down our heads and prayed—raised them again—but saw only some dark clouds on several foreheads. Finally, on the 13th, when we should offer our thanks for received answer to prayer, our unbelief must give way, and thanksgiving must arise—"The Lord is not slack concerning His promise, as some men count slackness" (2 Peter iii. 9). What happened? Some evenings before a girl had been struck by the sword of the Spirit, but was restrained by fear of man and shame from revealing her soul's distress and praying aloud, lest anybody should hear her. She had been a quiet and amiable person. When she had been a little while at the meeting, she was obliged to go out and pray, but she could not utter a word. The Spirit forced her to enter the meeting hall again, and then, overpowered by the remembrance of her sins from her tender years to the present time, she burst forth in praying with a piercing voice, as if this moment should be decisive for her and her parents' souls. She continued her fervent soul-stirring prayer about one quarter of an hour, and then she burst forth in an exuberant praise and hearty thanksgiving for remission of her sins, and a praise of God's clemency and love to sinners. Just as she finished, another arose in the same powerful manner; and so a third, till the sound of broken voices, lamentation, and sobs was interrupted by singing the 24th song of "Pilgrim's Songs." Afterwards some serious awakening words were addressed to the yet unconverted, and words of consolation to the afflicted; during which we felt a spirit and air in the hall, as if the glory of God had been revealed among us, and the gracious God moved our hearts. Now followed the thanksgiving that "The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness." Then it was to administer balm from the garden of Gethsemane to weeping sinners by conversations.

In the evening of the 16th it happened that an old hypocrite, who had a long time halted between God and the world, stood up and sank down on his knees in the crowd, cried for grace and confessed his sins, and begged the prayers of all for himself, his wife, and parents. After reading the parable of the Prodigal Son, he finished with praise and thankgivings for grace through the blood of the Cross; and since that day gave proofs of a true conversion.

The 17th passed, that a woman began to pray, and after her several persons, yes, even children offering up prayers for themselves and their unconverted relations. So we dare to entertain the glad expectation, that there are not a few who seek the Lord, and are sought of him, who, a fortnight ago, lived without God in trespasses and sins, but now show signs of new creation in Christ Jesus, and are a living testimony that "The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness."

FROM THE PROVINCE OF NERIKE.

The same as last year, a banquet for the poor was arranged in the parish of M——. We experienced this time the same mercy as then, when the Lord so richly crowned our surprise. The feast day was the 11th January last. The prospects seemed rather dark in consequence of the severe cold, and deep snow, which nearly blocked up the roads. But, notwithstanding all these outward impediments, the number of the guests amounted to 800 persons, who were all liberally entertained. As the last year, so even now, the poor were provided with spiritual food. And wonderful to say, three brethren, one after the other, were allowed to step forward and distribute the gifts received. The youngest presented tracts to each of the guests, before they rose from the table. A little while after the repast, the eldest of the three brethren, an old witness in this quarter, mounted the chair, and, after praying and singing, read the 108th Psalm. The moment was felt particularly touching and blessed. Lastly appeared the second of the three brothers, and held a speech which deeply affected not only the poor, but also the multitude of uninvited guests who were present. The speaker had lately recovered from a severe illness, which was very near ending his pilgrimage. And the voice of one who had been so near to eternity made his words much the more powerful. With peculiar clearness he was able, through God's grace, to show the necessity of repentance and living faith for poor sinners, whilst it is called to-day; and I believe it was a sowing time to bring forth fruit for eternity. The speech being ended and prayer offered up, he sang a home-land's song lately received from England, which was listened to with joy and many tears. At last sounded our well-known angel-song, "Gloria in excelsis Deo!"

I am convinced, says the writer, that this day has been a blessed day for many, and a day which they will not easily forget.

THE PROVINCE OF SMALAND, AND PARISH OF B——.

During the past prayer-week, we have experienced the presence of God. Although no visible awakenings have appeared, the people had united every evening in prayer and praise at least at three or four places within this little parish. There is a general desire and wish to hear the pure Word of God. Those who speak at our meetings are nothing else but unlearned men, who trust in God's promise that "they all should be taught of God." Many, many, are singing "Hosanna, glory to God on high!" for the great mercy vouchsafed to them during the past year, which they say they never can forget. Yes, praise and honour to the name of the Lord! The Word of God has been plentifully sowed out, in speech and in tracts, and the Lord has richly blessed it with success. Glory to His name! May we, with united hearts, pray for new strength, increased faith, love, and prayer during the ensuing year, that the prayer, "Thy kingdom come," may be fully accomplished.

THE PROVINCE OF SKANE (SOUTH-EAST PARISHES.)

I entered the mission-hall among a crowd

congregation; and, after song and prayer, impressed on their minds the necessity of not rejecting the grace of God. In the midst of the meditation a scream was heard, and, soon after, another, so I was obliged to stay for awhile. We could not afterwards express our joy over the work of the Spirit; and we hope that this year Skane may be especially visited by the Holy Ghost.

On the 8th of January I held a prayer-meeting some distance from the mission-house. Some partial-minded Christians stood outside and listened; but when I discoursed of the love which necessarily ought to exist between God and the people of God, and their mutual love, and also the evil and pernicious effects arising from persons of different opinions in secondary scriptural matters accusing each other of being heretics, they came in, and listened attentively to the end of the meditation, and also prayed. Since that day we have been together, and it is pleasant to perceive the good accord which begins to prevail in this quarter between Christians of different Evangelical Churches.

THE NORTHERN PART OF THE PROVINCE OF SMALAND.

An extraordinary spiritual movement took place in the parish of W—— and the village of W—— in the end of last summer, through the instrumentality of a poor private school-master and a rector, living at some miles' distance from the village. According to what a pious elderly lady told me (during my stay there in October last), there is not a single house in the large village of W—— where the Lord has not caught one or several by His mighty arm. Although fatigued by the journey, and exposed to stormy and rainy weather sitting in an open carriage, I was obliged to hold a meeting on the day of my arrival thither, the rooms being speedily filled with people, who most seriously listened to the words of grace. The clergy oppose strongly, and in a church council they issued an interdiction against the evening meetings, nominating them "nocturnal excursions," "which," they say, "more and more augment the dubiousity, and prove that it is the spirit of darkness, and not that of light, which inspires us to seek the night." In case of disobedience, the transgressors were menaced with the application of the royal ordinance of the 26th October, 1858, which condemns to fines of from fifty to three hundred rix dollars, those who disobey the interdiction of the church council. But the powerful spiritual stream cannot be stopped by this human barrier, so they continue in their missionary efforts, and the Word of God works powerfully among the people.

STOCKHOLM.

The proposed subjects of the Evangelical Alliance in London were spoken of and prayed over every evening during the week, from the 6th to the 13th January, in the Church of Bethlehem and in the Baptist Hall. As it was not allowed for others than Lutherans to appear on the platform of the Church of Bethlehem, the Evangelical Alliance arranged a special united prayer-meeting in the Moravian hall, on the 8th, at 10 A.M., where Christians of different denominations united to implore the Lord "that the children of God may attain a higher degree of holiness." The meeting lasted two hours, with short speech, prayer, and song, and breathed a spirit of love and peace. It may be remarked that not one Lutheran clergyman was present. At all the meetings many people were gathered together, especially in the Church of Bethlehem.

The momentous subject of brotherly love was but slightly touched upon; and from the following occurrence, it was evident that this important part of the Word of God ought to have been more meditated and prayed over. On the 10th, in the evening, a layman, after having given an account concerning the Lutheran activity in the capital, with regard to the printing and circulation of religious tracts, wished that the Word of God may attain such a "free course" in Sweden as in England, which he called "the pattern country," and where preaching in markets and streets is freely allowed, and thus the Word was not confined to the pulpits. He finished with an earnest and animating prayer. The calm attention which prevailed in the assembly was now interrupted, when a Lutheran clergyman stepped forward, and in opposition to the preceding speaker, expressed his great fear for a similar state of things in Sweden as in England, a "pattern country" for many sects, where any one could preach which he called "disorder." It may be remarked that since the 9th of January several awakenings have occurred.

The necessity of salvation makes itself felt with an increasing power among the people, as to be evident to the persons who visit this quarter at different times. At some places the awakening has such a power that the adversaries are rendered inactive. In a village the son and daughter in a family had first been brought to spiritual concern, and this in a way which bore the character of the Irish revival. During three days the girl was in a state of the deepest anguish, but afterwards found great peace and joy in her Redeemer. The Word of God extended in the same village, so that for the present, according to human appearance, and possibly with the exception of one individual, they are all anxiously inquiring after salvation.

In Norrköping, a large manufacturing town in the province of Ostergöthland, about three years ago a considerable awakening took place, especially among the working classes, partly through the instrumentality of a pious clergyman in the town, and partly through travelling colporteurs. A Baptist Church was established; but the greater part of the Christians remained in the Lutheran Church. This rupture caused severe contentions. About a year ago all the members of the Baptist Church adopted the pernicious views that believers are sinless. During last summer the above-mentioned clergyman began to read some portions of the book entitled "The Power of Prayer" in the church, when he held some Bible lectures in the afternoon. And this was the beginning of the extraordinary movement which still continues among the population of this town, especially among the young women, who most boldly confess their faith. Several hundred copies of this remarkable book have circulated to the blessing of many.

THE PROGRESS OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

A subdivision of the Swedish branch of the Evangelical Alliance is formed in the parish of Karstad, in the archdiocese. The number at the formation amounted to sixty, of different Christian communions: "May this little mustard-seed," says our correspondent, "become a large tree to the glory of God; may the good and highly-praised Saviour, who Himself is the peacemaker between God and sinners, pour out the spirit of love and peace on all lost children who have been found, and all contentions may vanish away, and each of us see in his Christian brother, only Jesus."

GOTHENBURG.

Out of a letter from Mr. Moritz, the missionary to the Jews in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, dated the 29th December, 1860, is the following to be noted: "Some priests have joined with me to hold united prayer-meetings on the proposed subjects, at the time fixed in the Berlin Address; and we hope our Lord will not disregard our small number, but that He will, according to His promise, be in the midst of us." (Here follows the signatures.) "The aim and the activity of the Evangelical Alliance I consider of very great importance, to unite the children of God in one; and I pray daily that such a union may be accomplished, in order that all divisions and contentions may come to an end between believers; and thus the name of our Lord be glorified on earth, and we thus strengthened to get power to stand against the coming of Antichrist. As long as the Schartuanism so powerfully prevails here, there is but little hope that the beautiful enterprise of the Evangelical Alliance should have much success. But the Lord who governs and rules can soon change all this, because he has promised that 'if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven.' So we will in faith expect, that He graciously would fulfil in us His promise, and make our united prayer a blessing to many."

UNITED ACTIVITY OF CHRISTIANS BELONGING TO DIFFERENT EVANGELICAL CHURCHES.

The Mission Union in Oster-Wahla held its annual meeting on the 27th December last, when the following subjects were discussed:—

1. Is it in agreement with the Word of God, and in harmony with the statutes of this mission union, that believers, with different secondary views of the Word of God, work together for the extension of the Kingdom of Christ on earth?

2. Is it with confidence that the children of God could hope that the prayer of Jesus Christ, according to the 17th to 21st chapters of St. John, shall soon attain its fulfilment?

3. What does the Scripture mean by proselytism?

"These questions," says the writer, "were, through God's grace, in a most gratifying way answered, and we had much comfort together. We hope that the partiality has been a good deal diminished where it previously prevailed. Glory to the Lord!"

WESTERWICK.*

In the beginning of last year a Baptist Church was formed there, which at first caused some conflict with the Lutheran Christians; but lately we have received the glad intelligence that the Christians of both Churches felt the necessity of leaving off their controvaries, and instead joined hands to united activity for Christ's sake.

Very dear brethren! From what has now been related, although a very little part of the glorious work of the Spirit which is going on in our country, we may rejoice and be "steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, inasmuch as we know that our labour is not in vain in the Lord" (2 Cor. xv. 58), and that "the right hand of the Lord is exalted, the right hand of the Lord doeth valiantly."

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with us now and evermore.

In the bonds of Christian love, I remain, very dear brethren, your faithful and obliged,

ITALY.

ITS RELIGIOUS POSITION.

We introduce the following paper, which will repay a thoughtful perusal, with a single sentence. Let the reader imagine himself the silent companion of two persons, one of them an Italian M.P., and the other an Englishman, earnestly discussing, as they walk through the streets of an Italian city, the events which have recently taken place in that country, and the development consequently given to religious sentiment and activity, and he will have put himself exactly into the position best fitted for following and appreciating the train of remark. For, in truth, it embodies the substance of a conversation which actually took place under the circumstances indicated, and the M.P. in question may be taken as a fair exponent of the present state of religious feeling among educated liberal Italians!

Our Italian friends have generally a great aversion to the word Protestants; very few of them seem to know why, or to be able to give a very clear definition of the meaning and history of the word, as universally applied in contradistinction to Cattolico, but they nevertheless shrug the shoulder and say, "We won't be Protestant." Very well, say we, we won't quarrel with you about the word Protestant, if you continue to do the work of Protestants, as for the past year you certainly have been doing, whether you acknowledge it or not. Ah no! che! che! that's not Protestantism we have been doing, but liberating our country: expelling tyrants from our shores, who, with their ancestors, have ground us and our ancestors down to the dust, and made us slaves—surely that is not Protestantism! And amongst all those crowned tyrants against whom you inveigh so furiously, we ask, who do you think has been the greatest? I do not mean who has done the cruellest deeds and most of them—whether the petty dukes of Parma, Modena, and Tuscany, or the ex-Royal Chief of the two Sicilies—but from what centre do you believe that spirit of oppressive evil has emanated?

Oh! Roma, Roma! no question of that—that has been the fountain from which all our misery has ever flowed. The union of the two powers, spiritual and temporal, has been the bane of Italy; but we have done away with that now, or next door to it, and henceforth the two will be separate and distinct. The Romish Church will become our nursing mother—we will honour, love, and obey her as our spiritual head; but with politics she will henceforth have nothing to do. We will reform her too. The reason why we Italians appear so very irreligious to you English is, that we detest our present Church system, but we do not detest religion. Ah no! we revere and love religion, and when we have pruned our Church of some of her deformities, we will glory in her—that is what we intend to.

But do you think the Papacy will continue to exist under your pruning? Do you believe that you can separate the two Powers, and yet both live? My impression is, that the union of the two is similar to that existing between the Siamese twins. The highest medical authorities say that the severance of them would prove death to one or the other, and I think you will admit that Garibaldi's operations during the past year have had a most debilitating effect upon the spiritual, as it has all but annihilated the temporal, power of the Pope; and before the sword is finally sheathed, and the operation over, depend upon it the spiritual patient will stand greatly in need of all the cordials which all the faithful in every land can concoct and administer. I know perfectly well what you think, and I believe you are a very fair exponent of the great majority of the thinking Italians of the present crisis, from Count Cavour downwards. You believe you can deal with the Papacy as you have done with the Marobes and the two Sicilies; that by means of that most subtle, but powerful elixir, diplomacy, backed by the patriot's sword, you can make it what you will—shape it according to your fancy. There never was a greater mistake. The Papacy, as it has existed for centuries back, has been quite as much political as spiritual, and when the temporal goes, the spiritual supremacy will soon follow. Popery in Italy will then cease to be Popery in the sense it has been and is now, and all of you must become, whether you will or not, Protestants, simply because you will have done just what our Protestant forefathers did—namely, protested against the system as tyrannical and diabolical; and from a like cause a like effect will follow.

Our friend protested loudly against my assertion, that Italy would ever be Protestant, indignantly denied that the recent and present doings of the Italians are practically Protestant, and that either Count Cavour or Garibaldi have the slightest tincture of such a vulgar element as Protestantism in their composition. He did not deny that I was right in saying that the leading Italian minds believe they can adjust the Church as they have other matters connected with the grand Italian unity admirable, and precisely with the same weapons, if necessary, but, he added, with triumphant air, Milord Palmstone, of England, did the same thing; he makes the English people pray as he likes, and when he likes; and why may not the Italian Prime Minister do the same with the Roman Catholics of Italy? The people in England are a very great people—not in machinery, cutlery, and Manchester goods—the first in the world; but the Italians were formerly great, and will show the world that they are still great, and that they can make the Catholic Church what they please. The English people do not quite understand us. They think, because we do not like our present Church, we wish to become Protestant. No, it is Church reform we desiderate, and not new Church. We do not want to—nay, we do not—identify ourselves with the licentious heretic, Luther, the founder of your Church. We have in little more than a year gathered together and united in one nearly all the broken remnants of our glorious country, and surely we need not now dread the minor, seeing we are overcome the major difficulty.

But at this point our passage through the narrow street was blocked up and our conversation broken off by a crowd of people of all grades pressing towards a printseller's window, looking intently upon something "new." In answer to our question, "What is the object of interest?" we were told that it was a print of a Frate burning the Pope's Allocution (we thought the recent one, of course), and a grin of pleasure passed over the faces of the people. We pressed forward, and soon saw the print which excited such interest. Underneath it was written in French, "Martin Luther brûlant les Bulles du Pape;" and sure enough, there stood the noble Augustin monk in his long frock, in the midst of the teachers and pupils of the seminary of Wittenberg, holding in his hand a bundle of waste papers, among which is the Papal Bull. It required but little stretch of imagination to hear the hero saying, as he threw it into the flames, "Since thou hast grieved the Lord's Anointed, let the eternal fire grieve and consume thee!"

After getting out of the crowd it was my turn to speak. The figure of that identical so-called licentious heretic of whom I had just been hearing in such unfriendly terms now stood before the Italian people, the admired of all admirers. Fond as these people proverbially are of art, it was not the artistic skill displayed in the print that now called forth their sympathies, for there were unquestionably other prints around of more merit. It was the subject—it was the lesson they read in that print, of an obscure monk setting at defiance the predecessor of Pio Nono, whom they have been taught to fear, and who now dares the Powers of Europe to touch him, under pain of all the curses his prolific vocabulary can produce; it was that which enlisted their sympathies. True, King Victor Emmanuel, as head of the Italian movement, has dared all that the Pope can do; but then he is a king, defended by a devoted army, and supported by an attached people; but this man, Luther, was a poor monk, without worldly influence—with nothing but a conscience void of offence, and a deep abiding sense of the righteousness of his cause, to support him against this monstrous Papal power, which not only excommunicated, but dethroned monarchs at its pleasure. They had been taught that this monk was actuated by licentious motives; that he only wanted to marry a nun, to whom he was devotedly attached; but the more intelligent of these people knew well that there was something deeper at the bottom than that, for what peasant even is not aware of the profligacy of the priesthood?

In an early part of the conversation my friend told me that he was speaking francamente, as he believed I liked to know the real sentiments of the heart, rather than the more polite but less honest mode of the Italians, of speaking on these subjects in a way to please the English. I would now speak frankly too, and tell him that while we Protestants did not for one moment hold up Luther to be perfect, yet we believed him to be sincere, and under God to have done a great and noble work, and that the allegations of the Church of Rome against him were as illiberal as they were unjust, and that I believed the time would yet come, and it might not be very far distant, when another great Reformer would arise out of the Romish Church, who would clear away all the filth with which the Papacy for ages has tried to besmear that noble pillar of the Reformation, which she has delighted to call defamation. One satisfactory proof to my mind of the honesty of Luther's purpose throughout was the constant attachment of Melancthon and others to him, but chiefly Melancthon; for it is well known that even the Papists of that time could find no just cause of offence against his life and character, any more than the Papacy of the present can find anything to blemish the character of Garibaldi, however much they detest him; and we, at this distance of time, must be guided in some measure in our opinion by the opinions of men of undoubted standing, who lived and associated with them. Depend upon it, you Italians cannot cut and prune the Papacy so easily as you think. You must lay the axe at the root of the tree, as did Luther and his associates before you. You may begin among the branches, but the system must be extirpated root and branch before the tree of liberty can take root and grow in Italy. And let me tell you that you are doing that now, that for the past two years you have been doing so, though you will not admit it. Your puerile horror of the word Protestant prevents you from seeing it. Take for illustration and proof of my assertion what, along with the multitude, we have just been looking at in the printseller's window. Let me ask you if such a print as Luther burning the Pope's Bull would have been allowed ten years ago to be hung up to public sale, as you see it to-day? No, not seven years ago, and that not from any want of liberty in the Constitution granted by Charles Albert in 1847, for such an act would have been legal then as now, but because the liberty then granted required time to penetrate the people's hearts and minds; the letter of that law of liberty for a time had the effect of killing the energies of the masses. Under the teaching of the priests they were afraid of it; now, and for a while back, the spirit of that law has possessed their minds, and step by step it is growing into a living, acting principle. Nor is this a solitary illustration of our assertion, that we see Protestant work advancing every day in Italy by Italians themselves. Hundreds of others could easily be given. You have been in London, and are inclined, good-naturedly, to smile at the sanguine expectations you have heard from the platform by several speakers regarding the present and probable future Protestantism of Italy. I do not wonder very much at this. They view it from a very different standpoint from what you do, and it may be too, that some give the work a couleur du rose—not intentionally, but from a wrong impression of its nature, and the mode of its present development. I agree with you, that the number even of nominal Protestants is very small in Italy compared to the twenty-two millions of Italians now free to embrace what form of religion they think right. But I maintain that the progress of Protestantism is not to be judged of exclusively by the numbers who have really come out of the Church of Rome and joined the Italian Evangelical Churches, but to them must be added a great part of the Italian nation, who are, by their acts, protesting against the Papacy. You hold up to ridicule what in England is known by the name of the Protestant Evangelical Alliance, headed by Lord S—. What is that Alliance but a society of men protesting against the encroaching nature of that very Papal system threatening again to overspread England which has kept Italy for centuries in bondage? Have you nothing of a similar nature in Italy? What was that alliance last summer, headed by the noble Garibaldi, which deprived Francis II. of the two Sicilies? You say, Catholic Alliance—very well, granted—but it was certainly not a Roman Catholic Alliance, for the Pope of Rome took greater pains to curse it than ever he did to anathematise the Protestant Evangelical Alliance. The Pope and all his Cardinals felt, and still feel, that Garibaldian alliances are the worst of all Protestant unions, inasmuch as they do for the present more real effective harm to the Papal system. And what is the Italian Parliament now assembled in Turin but a grand Protestant alliance upon a gigantic scale, debating with an effrontery which we English could hardly equal, certainly not surpass, upon the best ways and means of taking possession on the earliest possible day of the Roman city, which is the acknowledged seat of the system; literally planning how best they can take the old man's house over his head? You say no! You want to retain the Pope as spiritual head of your religious system, and you will give him more money to keep up his establishment than he ever had before, but you cannot any longer allow him to have anything to do in government as a temporal sovereign; and this you are determined to carry out, and yet you would make me and others believe that you are not Protestant, and never will be.

Pio Nono thinks very differently. He argues with us, that you are the most violent, because most practical, of all Protestants he has to contend against. He knows that if you succeed in carrying out your resolutions, the system of which he is head must go down; that his so-called spiritual power cannot exist without the temporal. He knows the Papacy better than you do, and says frankly that it cannot reform; that your hypothesis is impracticable; and he clinches his argument by a quotation from St. Paul: "What communion hath light with darkness? and what concord hath Christ with Belial?" Of course his interpretation is that Victor Emmanuel is Belial, and that he, as chief of the Church, is Christ; that the Papacy is the light, and the new-fangled liberty of Italy the darkness. Your interpretation is the reverse, and I agree with you, though I must say your theory and espouse the Holy Father's, that you two cannot go together, because you are not agreed, and never can agree.

But here we are close to the Waldensian Church and schools and religious book-depôt, which are all under one roof. Will you come for a few minutes to the school, and hear how the children get on with their lessons? Do not expect a large gathering of pupils, such as you are in your Romish schools, or you will be disappointed. You must remember that we Protestants are in the enemy's country. By-the-by, the Waldenses are not Protestants in the sense you Italians view Protestantism, though they are Italians, but of this I will speak after. The schoolroom contains for the day from thirty to forty children, and little Trucco, a girl about twelve years of age, is being examined in geography. The first question we hear put is, "What is the Government of England?" "Monarchia costituzionale." The boundaries of the country she gives very well, as also the principal rivers and chief towns. To our English ears it was something novel to hear the little thing running over the cities of Londra, Liverpool, Manchester, Breestole, Edinburgo, &c. Next door is the book depôt, and there, to our friend's utter amazement, are many excellent English books, translated into good Italian, for the Italians. There is M'Crie's "History of the Reformation in Italy," translated and sold at the low price of tenpence. Reformation in Italy! What does the book mean? The book is new to you, I see. Will you kindly accept a copy, from which you will learn, that Italy has had her Luther, as well as Protestant Germany. And here is a very wonderful book—next to the Bible the most marvellous—written by a poor prisoner in the days when England had her Madiai, as well as the late Grand Duke of Tuscany! It is the Pellegrinaggio del Cristiano (the "Pilgrim's Progress"). Perhaps you would read it. And here are some first-rate books, written by one of your doctors of divinity, who had his eyes opened to the errors of the Papacy; Dr. De Sanctis is his name; perhaps you have heard of him? Oh, yes, that I have. But are all these I see Protestant books? Yes, every one of them, and those with gilt edges are Bibles and New Testaments. There were 24,000 Bibles circulated in Italy during the past year.

But tell me about Dr. De Sanctis. He is not one of your people. He has left you, has he not? That is what comes of Protestantism, division and subdivision, and I know not what. Our Church is one and indivisible, our beautiful country will soon be the same. That is what you think. Your Church tries to put on the semblance of unity, but it is no more one than our Protestant Church; and Dr. De Sanctis has not left us, as you suppose, but is one of us, as I shall be able to show you, if you allow me, on another day.

EVANGELICAL SCHOOLS IN TUSCANY.

BY THE REV. JOHN R. M'DOUGALL, OF FLORENCE.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Florence, 12th April, 1861.

Sirs,—Two years ago, the Grand Duke of Tuscany left his dominions, never again, we trust, to return, and the new regime of religious toleration was established. Bibles were poured into the country, and Gospel preachers found large audiences. The establishment of schools formed a leading feature in the programme of the friends of Italy. Happily, men of different opinions on other subjects are at one with regard to the value of a sound Christian education.

It is strongly affirmed by many, that little good can be expected from the present generation of Italians, and that, until the young and rising generation be laid hold of, the Church here will neither make progress nor possess stability. There is truth in the observation. Only those whose lot is cast in Roman Catholic countries can tell the injurious effects which training on Papal principles has, not only on the intelligence, but on the conscience and heart—how it well nigh saps the morale of a man, and incapacitates him from judging clearly between what is right and wrong. The small per-centage of priests leaving the Church of Rome, who can be made satisfactorily available in any position—whether as hewers of wood or drawers of water—in the Church of Christ, and the moral unsteadiness of many Italians who seem to know the grace of God, tells a fearful tale against the Church of Rome.

But whether this hopelessness with regard to the present generation is a correct feeling, or only another of those many prejudices with regard to Italians, which are being so happily dissipated by their present noble conduct in civil and religious affairs, there can be no doubt as to the soundness of the principle of our own Reformers, that where there is an Evangelical Church, there should be alongside of it, and in connexion with it, a first-class Evangelical academy.

Often, in days of persecution in Tuscany, the desirableness of schools for the children of the converts was spoken of, but both schools and churches were then impossible. At the earliest moment of liberty, however, this valuable agency in a country's regeneration was set on foot in Florence. The boys' school began in October, 1859, the girls' school in March, 1860. Both of these continue till this present. Another has been opened at Pisa, but for the present it is closed on account of persecution. The school has been attacked so often by an infuriate mob, that the parents fear to send their children. We had hoped that in Leghorn and other places, ere this time, similar establishments would have existed. But the practical difficulties have been very many. We have found it one thing to have liberty guaranteed in the constitution, and quite another thing to have it practicalized in every-day operation. The management of these two schools during the last eighteen months has required, I assure you, a great deal of money and anxious thought. Their very existence at this hour is of itself a great success, considering the many obstacles in the way. The strong support and unanimous sympathy of friends at home and in Italy, has been a great encouragement, while their influence on the future Protestant Church of Italy has outweighed all consideration of toil.

1st.—The converts needed to be convinced in many instances of the value of a Christian education for their children, and of the duty of supporting, at every risk, an Evangelical school, founded on the most undenominational basis, supplied with the best teachers, and charged for at the cheapest rate. Idle fears that the teaching would be sectarian had to be removed by the most painstaking assurances.

2nd.—The opposition of the priests had to be encountered. The Pope, in his allocution of July 13, 1860, took notice of the schools in angry and undignified terms. "In various portions," says he, "of the regions of Italy, unjustly subjected to the Subalpine Government, public schools have been instituted, in which, to the great detriment of souls, all kinds of erroneous, false, and depraved doctrines, quite contrary to the Catholic Church, are publicly taught." With words like these from head-quarters, we could expect nothing but hatred from the rank-and-file of the clergy. The priests, who still continue to resist the great evangelistic enterprise, and have no idea of seeing liberty of worship practically established without a desperate struggle, have yielded the most resolute and prolonged opposition to the schools. They clearly discerned that in this particular, we were beginning at the beginning, and that these boys and girls, trained in the Protestant faith, would rise up to be staunch supporters of the future Evangelical Church of Italy.

The work of the colporteur might be neutralized by the vigilance of the bishops and clergy in buying up and destroying the Bibles scattered over the land, and the efforts of the preacher might be counteracted by a thousand and one petty acts of persecution on his hearers in their trades or families; but the teacher's silent and sure moulding of the youthful mind could not be undone.

3rd.—The Government, with employes of the old regime in its offices, and pseudo-liberal priests in the confidence of the education department, was far from according graciously those permissions and privileges which were egally claimed. Shortly after the boys' school had been opened, the parents of the pupils were hastily summoned one morning to the office of the Delegate in whose district the school is situated, and informed that their children were being taught heresy, and so forth. To the credit of these humble Christians be it said, that each and all of them, without having met and come to a common understanding, assured the Delegate that they knew the character of the teaching at the school, and desired that their children should be educated in the same faith as they themselves professed. Whereupon the Delegate, seeing the firmness of their bearing, wisely and kindly assured the parents that they might act according to their conscientious convictions, and rely on the full protection of the law.

When the female school had been furnished, and a suitable teacher found, the formal application was lodged for permission to open. Such an application, in the case of a Roman Catholic school, begun by a person of the humblest or highest capacity, is favourably replied to in a few days, being a matter of routine. You will be surprised to know that Miss Brachem, notwithstanding every certificate and guarantee had been lodged, and every form complied with, was kept for more than two months going backwards and forwards to the Palazzo Nechir, and sent, without any reason being assigned, from one office and authority to another. When it was seen that the supporters of the school would be tired out, the permission was at last given; but it contained the offensive proviso, that if ever it was reported to the authorities that the school was being turned into a propagandist establishment, the doors would be closed at once and for ever.

4th.—Suitable teachers are among the desiderata of Italy. It is at present very difficult to find these three essential qualifications in the same individual: Italian birth (or, at least, the fluency and correctness of speech of a native Italian), capacity for teaching, and Evangelical character. Before the present excellent male teacher was found, friends in all quarters were advertised for some months in vain. But for this, the female school would have been opened much sooner than it was. As a result that these schools, while Evangelical, are non-denominational, it may be mentioned that the various applicants, in turn, for the post of teacher in the female school, belonged to all the various Protestant Churches in Florence, both native and foreign. The selection of Miss Brachem, who is a member of the Episcopal Church, was made with reference to qualifications alone.

The teacher of the boys' school came to his work with the highest certificates from abroad, and the goodwill of the brethren here. Had he devoted his talents to the enlargement of the school, and the preparation of a band of Christian young men, he would have occupied a position inferior to none—not even that of a popular preacher—in honour and usefulness. I regret to say that he was not only drawn aside into other labours, to the detriment of the school, but that, when removed from his post as teacher, he thwarted the ongoing of the school, so as to create a kind of vacancy for two or three months. The school has been resumed, however, and is again prospering, under the auspices of Signor Piccinnini, the new teacher, who has established an excellent character, and proved his efficiency in a similar occupation in Northern Italy. We are most anxious about the future supply of male and female teachers for Italy. It is gratifying to know that about a dozen well-trained youths are about to leave the Waldensian normal schools of La Tour; but these are insufficient to meet the demand, so that we hope to see a normal school for Central Italy begun, among other efforts, in the magnificent Palazzo Salviati, lately purchased and presented to the Waldenses for their college and other missionary operations.

The Deaconess Institution in Florence (which, since its establishment last year, has enrolled about forty pupils, principally the daughters of English and American parents) has already one or two Italian girls in preparation as teachers. You are aware that this school is a branch of Dr. Flicdner's large establishment at Kaiserwerth, on the Rhine, and that the four excellent young ladies who have come here are Protestant deaconesses, who devote themselves, with equal readiness, ability, and Christian devotedness, to the work of teaching the young or visiting the sick.

The Swiss school in this town—the only one to which English-speaking boys can be sent—is under the direction of a young Swiss clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Chanpenenthal, of experienced educational ability. He has deeply at heart the wants of Italy, and will shortly co-operate in personal effort, as well as by advice, in advancing the interests of the Evangelical Italian schools.

5th.—The want of good school-books has been a great drawback. Many of those in use are so intensely papistical as to be very objectionable for Evangelical schools. The great majority, too, are dry and theoretical, unworthy of the progress made in other countries in educational affairs. Our attention has been for some time turned to the preparation of a complete series of school-books. A pictorial primer, used in American schools, will shortly be put to press. I earnestly wish that the Dublin Society and Christian Knowledge Society, which have done such good service in this department, could do something for Italy in this hour of her need. New schools for boys and infant schools have lately been inaugurated at Naples, by the King in person, as the only means of dispelling the superstition and ignorance of Southern Italy. The priests have still an influence over these schools, though the basis on which they have been established is a most liberal one, and should form a barrier, in all time coming, to priestly encroachment.

You will be glad to know that in Florence and Pisa a great impulse has lately been given to the Government schools, the inspectors of which propose many improvements, in order to bring Tuscany abreast of the age, and enable her to retain her ancient prestige as the most cultivated portion of the peninsula. Doubtless we shall soon have better school-books, provided under Government auspices; but, in the meantime, the teachers have to do the best they can, and supply the lack of simple and practical treatises by oral instructions.

6th.—The continual changing of schoolrooms not only forms a great personal annoyance, but has been a permanent injury to the schools. Nearly every six months a change is forced upon us by the bigotry of the proprietors, acting under priestly influence. The boys' school was driven from its first location by the widow of Corsini Laiatico, one of the most liberal men of Italy, who died in London a year ago, while acting as the representative of Tuscany at the Court of St. James's. Such an unpardonable sin was it, on the part of the poor but respectable tenant, to have harboured a Protestant school under her roof, that she received notice to quit; and it was only after explanations and assurances made to the agent, that the poor tenant had nothing to do with this humble school, that she was allowed to remain in the premises in which she gains a decent livelihood.

The female school must remove next month. The proprietor would have given anything to be able to eject the school during the term, and has been most careful in serving the "notice to quit" on the proper party. In the house of a relative of his, the Scotch Presbyterian Church has met for the last two years, and afforded shelter to the Waldensian brethren during the same period. About a month ago, the Scotch minister was compelled to give a written promise, that after May next, no Italian Propagand would be convened in the building, otherwise both Scotch and Waldensian service, as well as the tenant who sublets the rooms for these purposes, would have been extruded. In fact, the whole question of religious toleration in Tuscany lately assumed the form of the possibility of getting places in which to hold Evangelical meetings, schools, &c. In Florence, Leghorn, and Pisa, the greatest pressure was brought to bear quite lately, and it was only after weeks of search and difficulty that locales could be found. I trust that the large palace now belonging to the Vaudois will set our Christian brethren here free of priestly persecution, and form a rallying centre for the various works of faith and labours of love being carried on so successfully.

Pardon me if I have been tedious in these details, but dear friends at home, who could have established a dozen first-class schools in the time and with the means which have been expended on these two, ought to know the circumstances, so as not only to continue their kind help, but extend to us their warmest sympathy. These schools have all along been maintained by the contributions of the English residents and travellers in Italy, together with donations from France and Great Britain, as well as the school fees paid by the children. Home experience has proved that the payment even of the smallest sum by the poorest parent forms the best guarantee for regular attendance and well-studied lessons. Even in Dr. Guthrie's ragged schools it was found of the first consequence to charge the poor cinder-wives for the education of their children, in order to secure a proper appreciation of the benefits of punctuality and obedience; though these poor women had to work a few hours extra every week in order to raise the 2d. or 3d. required. The monthly fee in the Tuscan schools is 2s. 3d., which is much less than the quality of the teaching would ordinarily command. But so many of the converts are among the poor of this world, that even this sum has in some cases to be partially or wholly paid by some generous Christian friend of the family.

After this recital of difficulties, you will be prepared to learn that some months elapsed before the schools reached an attendance of twelve to twenty. The girls' school has slowly but surely progressed to this highest point. The fortune of the boys' school is different. After it had succeeded, the attendance stood for a long time at thirty to thirty-five, without counting some half-a-dozen who attended in the evening. Through want of attention, and other circumstances in connexion with the late teacher, the attendance gradually waned, so that the new teacher begins with a dozen pupils. Should he turn out, as we earnestly hope and pray, the right man in the right place, there is no let or hindrance to the prosperity of the school, and the enrolment of fifty or sixty pupils.

The schools have been, since the beginning of the winter, placed under the management of a large committee of ladies and gentlemen, well known in Florence, who form a guarantee both for Catholicity and soundness of doctrine. Lately an evening adult school has been opened, in which, during three evenings of the week, instruction is given for an hour in reading, writing, and arithmetic. I hope to see this school well supported, and to hear of many such schools being begun shortly.*

PROGRESS OF THE GOSPEL, AND MOB OUTRAGE AT PISA.

Pisa, April 16, 1861.

I promised when I left England to give you occasionally some account of the progress of evangelization in Italy, and I am happy now to be able to send you most encouraging accounts of the gradual extension of the Gospel at Pisa, and the increasing desire to listen to its announcement. The little congregation is more than doubled since last year, and those interested in this great work find their trust in the Divine blessing much confirmed, when they observe that the most painful, and apparently discouraging, circumstances, instead of crushing, have fostered the good seed. The little assembly at Pisa was, as I believe you know, originally commenced by Italians, who had long been reading the Word of God in secret, and who took the first opportunity which the liberation of their country offered to profess publicly their separation from the Church of Rome, and their desire to follow the precepts of Christ, as laid down in the Gospel. They met in an upper chamber, and read the Scriptures in alternate verses together, the most intelligent making occasional remarks. The small room was soon too limited in space for the increasing members, and a legacy having unexpectedly been left to the wife of one of them, a house was bought, two rooms thrown into one, and adapted for public worship. It was opened with prayer, and the present custode, in conjunction with a blind man, named Rovillo, gave a discourse on the Church of Thessalonica, and the mystery of iniquity which, as he explained it, worked in the Church of Rome. Some time after one of the Waldensian ministers visited the assembly, read, expounded, and prayed. Another was for some time resident at Pisa, and divided his services between Leghorn and Pisa, till he was succeeded by another missionary. All these ministers were listened to with great attention, notwithstanding that some were not quite masters of the Italian language, and that these new converts were rather jealous of any kind of ecclesiastical authority. Having shaken off the heavy yoke of the Church of Rome, they are extremely sensitive under any constraining influence, and at length the master of the house gave the Waldensian minister notice to quit. Various reasons were reported for this unexpected step, but the most credible is, that they believed from good authority that the Waldensian Church was looking out for another place of worship, the abundant funds put at its disposal by English generosity making it easy for them to do so. Strenuous efforts were made to prevent a separation by persons at Pisa—by persons interested in the spread of the Gospel—but unhappily without avail.

The Catholic population took advantage of this division, and the publicity of the new place of worship, to break the windows and show other signs of outrage. The Government left this disorder unpunished. Emboldened by this inertness, the mob proceeded to break the windows of the new room, and then of the Italian Free Church. The authors of this attack not being discovered, a conspiracy was formed by the priests against these dissidents from the Roman Catholic Church, whom they hoped to disperse and crush altogether. With the Waldensian Church, being few in number, they partially succeeded, the little school was closed, and the master, who had been educated in the Protestant valleys, went to be a soldier.

But the Italian Church increased in numbers; the elder who had been chosen as a ministrator by this little congregation sent to Florence, to invite the lay preachers to come on Sunday to perform the service. As they had passed under the name of Plymouth Brethren, there was some anxiety in the minds of experienced persons lest any peculiar opinions should be introduced. But all alarm was dissipated when it was found that the choice had fallen on Cesane Magrini, a man who had learned his experience under persecution. He was imprisoned and exiled during the reign of the late Grand Duke, for reading the Scriptures, and had been ten years absent from his country on account of religion. Thoroughly Italian both in heart and tongue, his preaching found a ready echo in the hearts of his hearers, and many were daily added to the Church. Gualtieri, a ci-devant Roman Catholic priest, shares the duties of the ministry of the Word with Magrini, and comes every alternate Sunday from Florence, returning the same day. They have both of them a full knowledge of Scripture, and they freely set forth the most important doctrines of the Gospel, preaching Christ as the only Saviour and way of acceptance.

Matters had gone on thus for several weeks since the separation, when a new calamity, of a sudden and violent nature, threatened to overwhelm the little flock. A peasant and his wife, firm in the faith of the Gospel, wished to baptize their newborn child at the Free Italian Church, but the bigotry of the multitude, and the intolerance of the priests, rose up in opposition. The parents lived outside the gates; the infant was brought by the father into the town; the carriage which contained the christening party, as soon as it reached the turn near the Italian Church, was forcibly turned out of its road by the mob, and conducted to the Cathedral, where, in defiance of the wishes of the parents, it was baptized in the baptistery by a Roman Catholic priest, who gave it the name of Ranini, the patron saint of Pisa.* The unconscious little babe was then taken to the Foundling Hospital, and afterwards removed to the hospital of the town. Meanwhile the poor mother was trembling in her bed, under the reports which reached her of the violence used towards her child, and the alarm about her husband, and not without reason, for a frightful scene was taking place at Pisa. The mob, after the priests had baptized the child, after the true Mortara pattern, rushed to sate their vengeance on the house in which the Gospellers were assembled. Paid by the priests, and by some of the reactionary gentry, an immense multitude rushed to the place of assembly, armed with large stones and formidable sticks, determined to wreak their vengeance on the peaceable little flock. Some strange, wild faces, made their appearance at the close of the service, but with their hats off, and seemingly impressed with the order and simplicity of the meeting. But no sooner was the service over, than a shower of stones broke every pane of glass in the four windows looking towards the street.

I was present on the occasion, and also two English ladies; and one gentleman, Count Guicciardini, happened to have come in for the first time; and there was one German lady: all the rest, amounting, perhaps, to eighty people or more, were Italians living in Pisa or the neighbourhood. A good many went out when the service terminated, but the threatening aspect of the crowd deterred others, and the frightful noise of the large stones breaking the windows against the shutters was really something terrific. One man came in when the others went out, armed with a ball of India-rubber attached to a string. He struck Gualtieri twice with it, and then jumped from the back window to the garden wall and made his escape. After the demolition of every inch of glass, some wild spirits got on the roof and began to take off the tiles, but they did not succeed in making an opening. Nearly two hours passed under this bombardment, which the Italians said was like Gaeta; and by this time the churches had contributed their quota to swell the numbers, so that it was said there were 4,000 or 5,000 persons present. Many, no doubt, were only spectators, but it was not to the credit of the Government that it was not able to provide immediately for the defence of an unprotected few. The gendarmes, when they did come, were not strong enough to act repressively; and when we wished to go out they begged us to remain a little while longer, as it was dangerous to meet an excited mob.

Poggi, the father of the child, had gone to the Prefecture to inform the Government of our danger, for an order was issued to call out the National Guard. The drums beat to assemble them, and within an hour the whole National Guard was drawn up in files across the street. The multitude, among whom there were no doubt many well-disposed persons, saluted the National Guard with respect. Their officers, not knowing the temper of the people, immediately gave the word of command, "Charge!" This had the desired effect; all fled instantly like a flight of swallows, and the way was cleared for the prisoners to go out. The English gentleman had his carriage waiting, and another was drawn up for us four ladies. We got in between a file of the National Guard, an officer on the box, and were driven to our several habitations in safety. Though the Tuscans are not ferocious people, yet had the mob obtained admission into the house, it is impossible to say what mischief an excited multitude might commit. Nothing could exceed the excellent temper and conduct of the little assembly; not a cry or even an exclamation was heard, and they waited with patience the issue of this painful scene.

The superior authorities have taken up the affair; the elder of the little church has come manfully forward and reproached the authorities of Pisa for not having prevented such a scene of riot. The effect upon all classes of people has been a more earnest desire for religious liberty, and among the lower orders a determination to have the Gospel at any cost. The Sunday following it was said there were 400 persons present above and below stairs. Many of the better class came to support their fellow-citizens. The two following Sundays the room was overflowing, so that there was scarcely standing room. Last Sunday there were 250 present, and if the numbers continue at this rate, the present place of meeting will soon be too small for the congregation, and we shall be obliged to build a larger room. The expense of repairing the windows has been considerable. Had not iron stanchions been put on the windows on the ground floor, there is no saying what might have happened. An individual who is very constant at the Sunday service tells me the whole of the population outside the gate where Poggi lives have become readers of the Scriptures; that at the cafe nothing is heard but conversation about the Bible; and that numbers in consequence have ceased to swear.

EVANGELICAL EFFORTS IN NAPLES AND FLORENCE.

Florence, April 8, 1861.

I was remarkably struck with the distance of Naples from Florence, not only geographically, but ecclesiastically. In the South they knew little of our religious movement, while here we form a very imperfect conception of the noble field now open to missionary effort in Naples and its neighbourhood. We trust soon to be in closer communication. A member of the Italian Parliament did the other day in this place, that in eight months Turin would be connected with Naples by railway. I fear he is too sanguine, and that we must wait two, if not three, years before this desirable state of things is established. At present one feels the distance and regrets it; one observes the vast difference between the peoples of Tuscany and Naples, and thanks God for that discovery of the present hour—the one bond of free union under constitutional rule—which will speedily draw them closer, and harmonise many seemingly discordant elements. Naples is somewhat larger than Glasgow, so far as population is concerned, while the mainland Neapolitan kingdom contains about two millions of inhabitants. Sicily is said to equal Scotland in population, but oh! what different parts they have played in the world's history. Every intruder has held sway in fertile Sicily, not excepting the Normans; while poor Scotland has held her independence intact, and scattered, through her sons, a love of freedom over the world.

We found the mass of the people at Naples quietly acquiescing in the new regime, though every now and again they are disturbed by demagogues and paid agents of the late King. Still the occasional disturbances are greatly exaggerated. To-day a shout of "Viva Francesco II.!" is raised in the Toledo—to-morrow some few reactionists try to raise a disturbance on the Chiaja; but the town is perfectly tranquil as a whole, so far as appearances and the orderly ongoing of business is concerned. Still the people in Southern Italy are so ignorant and superstitious, that a species of Northern occupation will be necessary for some time. As Colonel Peard, the "Englishman" of Garibaldi, ably put it, "Naples must be treated as a conquered province for a generation before things can be set in order." A Scotch lady, while abhorring the shedding of blood, expressed to me her regret—so highly did she appreciate constitutional liberty in Italy—that the Neapolitans had so easily gained their liberty, as they did not sufficiently value the great boon of annexation.

I trust that the schools and infant asylums lately established by the King, under the guidance of wise counsellors, will do much for Naples. These new schools cannot be said to be free schools, uninfluenced by priestly dictation; but they are established on a very different basis indeed from the scholastic establishments of the past, which were priest-ridden to a degree. Our greatest hope for the South, as for the North of poor distracted Italy, lies in the wide circulation of the Bible. It was immensely gratifying to me, on walking down the Toledo (the main thoroughfare of Naples) to see more than half-a-dozen stalls of Bibles, Testaments, and Evangelical books, belonging to colporteurs who had been sent from Florence and Northern Italy. They stated that their sales had been very large, as you have seen reported in the journals. All of them, as well as their fellow-labourers in the provinces, are under the superintendence of Mr. C——, to whom, for the time, the representatives of both the London and the Scotch Bible Societies had confided their employés.

Mr. C——'s Sabbath and weekday meeting is small, but he is surrounded by a few worthy and trustworthy people, upon whom he has evidently spent much pains and been rewarded for his labours. Each visit I paid to him I found him busy supplying the colporteurs with books, and keeping exact account of his large sales. He is very much respected by all parties in Naples—the English, French, and Swiss—who were, at the time of my visit, establishing a committee, principally with the idea of aiding Gavazzi, but also for the general support of preachers, translations of useful works, circulation of Bibles, founding of schools, and other branches of the great Evangelic enterprise. Mr. C—— was well known, and highly spoken of by all of these friends, who consult him with confidence, and associate with him in every work he undertakes. He spoke to me of extensive correspondence with the provinces, and hoped soon to report a few meetings for Christian worship under the care of godly men throughout the neighbourhood of Naples. In the South, as in the North, there is a movement for a reform in the Church. The brother of Mr. C—— heads the Neapolitan party. C—— himself has no confidence in such a movement, and looks forward rather to the time when Cavour will alter his present disinclination to touch the revenues of the Church, and when each parish priest will be allowed to preach according to his own convictions and the wishes of his parishioners, still enjoying his parish emoluments, whether these preachings be accordant with Papist or Protestant principles. In short, as far as I could grasp C——'s idea, he expects the reform to begin in the individual parish, and its minister at liberty to choose his faith and thus to spread it over the land. It is hard to prejudge a question, whose solution depends so much on the turn which political affairs may take. The circulation of Evangelical books had made a great impression in Naples, so that many little pamphlets (copies of which I obtained) had been published against individual books sold by our colporteurs, or the work in general.

M. Gavazzi, whom I saw repeatedly, and heard once, preaches the Evangelical faith. He did so last winter in Florence. With my own ears I heard him do so again, to the great gratification of my inmost soul, to a crowd of respectable young men in Naples. The hall was crowded a quarter of an hour before the service began, and the greatest attention was given while, for more than an hour, Gavazzi eloquently preached on the merits of Christ's precious sacrifice, and the utter worthlessness of the intercession of saints and the mediation of the Madonna. The fate of a country is said to depend at any given moment on the condition of its young men from eighteen to twenty-seven years of age. How I wished that all the youth of Italy were listening on that Sabbath evening to such teaching! What an omen it would be of a reviving land! Somewhat of the excellent impression made by the sermon was removed by a few political allusions made, after the pronouncing of the benediction, in reference to the feast of San Guiseppe, on the following Tuesday, which all the people of Italy held in honour of Guiseppe Garibaldi. With other friends I made a point of hearing a few of the boldest and ablest priests, some of whom were protégés of Gavazzi, and said to have attacked the Pope, expounded (Diodati in hand) the Evangelic faith, and to be nearing the Protestant standpoint. I confess to the very greatest disappointment with these men, who had been so favourably spoken of. They were the furthest remove, so far as my experience went, from entertaining Evangelical sentiments. The discontent among the priests is undoubtedly on the increase. They wrote to Drs. —, —, and other friends for advice, and what to do with them we know not. They are wholly unfit for present labour among us, and yet wish to leave their present spheres and be instructed. The amount of their sincerity and capacity and good motive it is manifestly very difficult for us to determine. Previous experience has led us to be very cautious in awakening hope on their part of support, when they leave their place and worldly all. M. Gavazzi was going home to tell our English friends his own story, and was very sanguine that he would speedily be preaching in the city of Rome. He is evidently doing a special work, and merits confidence. But he seems to me equally unfitted for co-operation with any band of brothers, or any existent Church, or for leading any party in the future of Italy's religious crisis. The Lord works by him as by C—. They are most dissimilar, yet each is felt in Naples to be useful. They are on the most friendly, brotherly terms. I feel sure that in the end the work of C— will survive the political commotion of the hour, though it promises least at present.

The Tuscan work is immensely interesting and laborious. . . . Dr. Revel is at Turin, trying to get the Leghorn Church opened. The palace purchased here for the Waldenses is most suitable. . . .

TURKEY.

MISSION FIELD OF TURKEY.

SIVAS.

(From Dr. West, M.D.)

The past year has been one of incessant and laborious work. I have had some thousands of professional calls, and for a few months kept a record of my daily prescriptions, noting the various diseases for which they had been made. The largest number I have made in one day is one hundred. This is too much, but it was pressed upon me.

I have had within the year at least a hundred surgical operations, major and minor; of the former twenty, of which fifteen were lithotomy. One of the patients, whose life I saved by an operation for strangulated hernia, was an Armenian priest. He, like multitudes of his people, prays for me, according to his own account. I take occasion to tell them, at times, what kind of prayers avail with God. In the same way also have I the prayers of many Mussulmans. I performed the operation of lithotomy on one of their Imauns. He, with many others of that sacred character, for whom I have prescribed, I am assured are praying for me; and I am also assured that their prayers are of the utmost service. Devout and prayerful language is characteristic of the Orientals, but they little know the meaning of the prayer. Such expressions, however, show their goodwill. I feel a friendship for them in return, and as I continually meet with friendly greetings and kind receptions, I have reason to feel thankful to God for opening for me such a wide door of usefulness among them. As they gather round me at the shop, or assemble to see me at the surrounding villages to which I am called, or in their homes in the city, I take great pleasure in speaking to them concerning God's Word, and always secure respectful attention. I thus gain the ear of many who do not attend our services.

Of minor surgical operations many have been for ophthalmic affections, which are common in this country. Sivas is central, and many patients come to me from surrounding places of a hundred and more miles' distance. I sometimes have opportunities of selling copies of the Scriptures to those thus coming from abroad; and as many of the diseases of the people result from their sins, or their religious errors, fasting, &c., I can daily preach to them practical sermons.

Sivas being the seat of the Pashalic, I frequently have patients among the Turks in authority, and have been able to turn their friendship to account in protecting some of the Protestants from persecution.

During a great part of the year, I have given an hour, daily, to the instruction of a class of young Armenian physicians in medical science, both didactic and clinical. Of these, two are Protestants, the others Armenians. They have all made good progress, and their position gives them great influence among the people. Two are sons of the leading Armenian physician of the city. Coming for instruction to me, they hear much scriptural as well as scientific truth. One has been a constant, and another a frequent attendant at my Bible-class. The first is ready to encounter opposition and persecution for the sake of the Gospel, and already his father-in-law, an Armenian priest, gives him trouble.

My Bible-class is in Armeno-Turkish, as Turkish is my language, and I frequently have strangers attending it, and sometimes Turks. I can see that the Gospel light is continually spreading. The Sivas people are more worldly and harder to reach than the more simple inhabitants of some of our mission stations. There is a very extensive awakening as to the errors of the Armenian Church; but as yet very little spiritual awakening and earnest desire to find the true salvation. This is what we long to see, and for which we labour and pray.

PALESTINE.

Bhamdun, Mount Lebanon, Jan., 1861.

Messrs. Editors,—Our most cordial thanks are due for Evangelical Christendom another year. In humble acknowledgment for this inestimable favour at this time, permit me to place at your service the substance of the seventh annual report of the Bhamdun station. And as no report was published for 1859, this will include a brief narrative of our missionary operations, and the principal events in this district of the mountain, from Jan. 1, 1859, to Dec. 31, 1860.

I. THE PREACHING SERVICE.

During the period now reported, the preaching service has been regularly maintained from Sabbath to Sabbath, with one exception, at this station, and attended usually by fifty persons; and about thirty women have attended the Bible-class taught by Mrs. Benton. Seven new candidates have been received into the fellowship of the Church, and we have abundantly rejoiced in all the indications of the presence and power of the Holy Spirit in our Sabbath congregations. Preaching services have also been introduced for the first time, in connexion with Sabbath-schools, into several neighbouring villages of the heathen Druses, where our primary schools have already been established; and from fifteen to forty adults, beside the children, have availed themselves of these golden opportunities on the Lord's-day for religious instruction, and saving knowledge of Divine truth.

II. EDUCATION.

At the commencement of this period, a dozen schools were in operation at ten other villages and at Bhamdun, under the care of this station; and we were invited also to take the pastoral supervision of fifteen other schools in this upper district of Lebanon, under the care of the Beyrout committee and superintendent, supported by funds contributed in Scotland. A brief account of these schools was published in Evangelical Christendom (Vol. XIV., July, No. 7, page 387). In all these schools, sustained by the Free Church of Scotland and by the Syria Mission (American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions), upwards of 1,000 pupils, Druses, Christians, and Jews, of both sexes, were gathered under the same approved system of Christian instruction; and abundant opportunities and means of grace were afforded for the intellectual and moral improvement of the rising generation, the inculcation of Scriptural truth, and the introduction of the book and day and sanctuary of the Lord among these unevangelised communities of the mountain. More than a score of villages were open to these choice instrumentalities for the salvation of their immortal souls, and our hope was in the continuation of these means in a time of peace, and the blessing of God to witness, in the course of years, the promised renovation of Mount Lebanon. But, alas! the late civil insurrection in Syria arising in this neighbourhood—a little cloud no larger than a man's hand—suddenly overwhelmed all the prospects of our mission, suspended all our schools, with one exception, destroyed all our plans and all our hopes for several months, under the visitation and displeasure of God, and invoked the Great Powers of Europe to intervene and save the remnant of the Christian sects from utter destruction. While so many other stations and missions in these overturnings were overturned, we have seen and felt the faithfulness and loving-kindness of the Lord, in the remarkable preservation of the Bhamdun station and several thousands of the Christian population in our immediate neighbourhood. And since the outbreak is overpast, we find that the demand and necessity for our primary schools in Lebanon have already become greater and more hopeful than they were before the occurrence of the late war. I therefore, the proper men, and other men needful for this important department of the service, are duly provided, I dare say all these schools and many more may be resumed within a few years, under more favourable conditions for Christian education and evangelization than our mission has ever witnessed during its forty years' history to Syria.

III. ITINERANCY.

During this period several tours have been made to the different parts of this district, of which the first and most important was to Zableh, in May, 1859. This capital of the mountain is situated in a beautiful valley, six hours from Bhamdun, near the Bukaa. It contained 10,000 inhabitants, chiefly of the Papal sects, of whom the baser sort, at the instigation of their bishop and priests, on the third day after our arrival, came and most outrageously expelled us from the town. A brief account of this expulsion was published in the Missionary Herald for August, 1859; but from the official visit of our noble Ambassador, Gen. James Williams, from Constantinople to Syria, in November following, under special instructions from Washington, it was our happiness to obtain a more satisfactory reference for that painful outrage than we dared to anticipate, and to rejoice in the good determination of the United States' Government everywhere, and in all circumstances, to protect the humblest of its recognized citizens in foreign lands. That ministerial act of our Ambassador to his fellow-countrymen in Syria was, and was intended to be, one of the best methods for the inauguration of a decided American policy throughout all provinces of the Turkish Empire.

We have made several other tours in this extensive district of the mountain, and found the people, with the exception mentioned above, always ready and happy to see and welcome us.

Our report is therefore that this is a goodly domain, and the fields are already white for harvest. But the labourers are few. Pray therefore the Lord of the harvest to send more labourers into this harvest field, and many to righteousness. For in this department of labour and influence, preaching the Word from house to house, from village to village, and from province to province, a wide intellectual door is opened to the mission in Syria, and since the overthrow of Ishmael, no adversaries are likely to appear and to oppose this "work of faith, and work of love, and patience of hope."

IV. THE MEDICAL PRACTICE.

Next to preaching and education, the practice of medicine is regarded as the most direct intellectual means of doing good at this station in the mountains. Our patients come from a number of villages, and from the distance of twenty miles, to obtain the proper remedies for their physical maladies. Not unfrequently a dozen or twenty cases occur in a day, and not less than a thousand cases in a year. A small charge is usually made, to secure a faithful use of the medicines, for a valuable supply of which we are much indebted to some kind friends in Hartford, Conn., and in Scotland. Our box from Scotland was worth thirty dollars. It is our humble conviction that this medical practice, conducted principally by Mrs. Benton, doubles the value, importance, and usefulness of this advanced outpost of Christian Missions to Mount Lebanon.

V. THE NEW CARRIAGE ROAD.

This greatest enterprise of modern times for the civilisation of Syria passes near Bhamdun, and is expected to be complete in October next from Beyrout to Damascus. It is estimated to cost 3,000,000*fr.*, divided into 6,000 shares, a third of which are taken respectively in Paris, Constantinople, and Syria. This great work, however, still in process of construction, was suspended for a season, in consequence of the civil war.

VI. THE LATE INSURRECTION.

In a missionary point of view, the late insurrection in Syria was a terrible calamity and judgment of God, to teach nations righteousness. It has already cost Syria at least 20,000 human lives, and not less than 15,000,000 dols. in material losses, which it may require a period of several generations to recover. But the painful interruption and immense moral losses of social friendship and mutual confidence between the various communities, no duration of time and no power of human legislation can restore.

Notwithstanding all the painful records of 1860, Syria, however, is still the home of the Bible, the centre of all the prophecies and promises of God, and the birthplace of the Christian Church and ministry of reconciliation. Upon its maternal bosom, distant nations are near neighbours, and the extraordinary commissioners of Turkey and Europe are already convened for a satisfactory solution of the Syrian question. In their high and benevolent commission we see the wonder-working providence and faithfulness of Him who declared in the second Psalm: "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." And in their united and harmonious action, as in a mirror, we seem to see the first glimpses of that prophetic image, when "the seventh angel sounded, and there were voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." Behold I come quickly Amen. Even so come, Lord Jesus.

Yours, in Christian love,
WILLIAM A. BENTON.

RUPERT'S LAND.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER AT RED RIVER—DETAILS OF THE SEVERAL SERVICES—THE BENEFICIAL INFLUENCE SUBSEQUENT—FORTNIGHTLY UNITED DEVOTIONAL MEETINGS—PRAYER REQUESTED FOR A BLESSING UPON MISSIONARY EFFORT.

St. Andrew's Parsonage, Red River,
Rupert's Land, N.W. America, March 1.

As an account of the united prayer-meetings which have been held in this remote and isolated quarter of the globe may prove interesting to the readers of your valuable and truly catholic journal, I do myself the pleasure of forwarding to you a statement of the efforts which are being made for the revival and promotion of vital Christianity in our midst.

In compliance with the invitation which you issued, a series of prayer-meetings was held during the week, commencing with the 6th January last, throughout the settlement. It was indeed a week of weeks; a blessed and hallowed season; a week of Lord's-days, for the whole week was devoted to prayer, praise, and the preaching of the Word. From one end of the settlement to the other—from Headingley, on the Assiniboine, to the Indian settlement—all the different congregations assembled from day to day for united prayer; earnestly imploring Him who heareth and answereth prayer to open the windows of heaven and pour out of His Holy Spirit in our midst. Our souls are thirsty, as in a dry and barren land where no water is. We hear of refreshing and invigorating showers descending on other lands, and we anxiously desire to participate in the blessing.

On Tuesday morning, January 8, I attended the united prayer-meeting held in St. John's Schoolroom, at which our beloved Bishop presided. His lordship requested me to take the opening prayer, and to deliver an address on the occasion. The meeting was well attended, and, after three hours' continuance, it was brought to a close, although several of the brethren present had not addressed the meeting. In the evening of the same day I presided over a similar meeting at St. James's, at the request of the Bishop. The Revds. A. Cowley, J. Black (Presbyterian), and H. Cochrane were present. The meeting was kept up for three hours, with prayers, singing, and addresses.

On Wednesday evening I attended the meeting at the Presbyterian Church; the Rev. J. Black, the earnest and able minister of this church, presided. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Black, Rev. H. Cochrane, and myself, to a very large and respectable congregation.

On Thursday, at the request of the Rev. J. Chapman, who has just lost his little daughter, I presided over the meeting held in his church, St. Paul's, or the Middle Church. Here again the Revds. J. Black, H. Cochrane, and myself were the three ministers present.

On Friday a similar meeting was held in my own church, St. Andrew's, or the Grand Rapids, at which Messrs. Cowley, Black, and Cochrane were present.

On Saturday I went down to the Indian settlement, to attend a meeting there in the evening. The addresses and prayers were both in Saulteaux and Cree, and I was happy to have the opportunity of saying a few words to the Indians in their own tongue, Cree, of the "wonderful works of God." This concluded the series of meetings, all of which, from the Bishop's downwards, through the settlement, I was thankful to have enjoyed the privilege of attending, and taking part in the proceedings. It was a blessed season for gaining good and, I trust, for doing good a golden opportunity, a Pentecostal week, a happy foretaste of the blessed employment of Heaven. I felt unwilling to return to other duties and cares, and could heartily join in the words of the Christian poet—

"My willing soul would stay,
In such a frame as this;
And sit and sing herself away,
To everlasting bliss."

On the whole the meetings were well attended, the spirit which pervaded them was most harmonious, prayerful, and earnest, and our expectation is that a large blessing will be the happy result. For this we are praying and waiting. I am most anxious that the young men of my congregation should give themselves to God, that we might raise up a band of native catechists and missionaries to carry the blessed Gospel to the scattered Indians of this vast territory. Such was the result in the case of one young man of my congregation last year, who is now walking in the comfort and joy of the Holy Ghost. May this only prove a drop of the coming shower! and may the early and latter rain descend in rich abundance upon all our souls, reviving the hearts of God's people, and quickening the souls of many now asleep and dead in sin!

On Lord's-day, January 13th, I closed the services of the week by inviting my people to come to the Saviour, that they might "find rest unto their souls" (Matt. xi. 29), rest from their sins, from the alarms of conscience, from the terrors of the law, and from the fear of eternal death—an abiding rest, a spiritual rest, an eternal rest—the rest so graciously provided for the soul. In the afternoon I preached from Gen. iii. 15—"I will put enmity," &c.—dwelling upon the great conflict between the kingdom of Christ and the powers of darkness, and the glorious victory when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ.

We are now holding similar meetings every fortnight in three of the churches in the settlement—viz., the Middle Church, or St. Paul's; the Presbyterian Church, called Kildonan; and St. Andrew's, my own church. The people take a lively interest in these meetings, and flock to them in great numbers; they never seem wearied or fatigued, but keep up an unflagging attention for three hours, and often express astonishment that the time has passed away so quickly. At the meetings held at St. Paul's and Kildonan, Messrs. Chapman, Black, and myself attended, and we all felt that it was good to be there, not only as affording an opportunity for proclaiming the blessed and saving truths of the Gospel, but also as a season of spiritual refreshment and mutual edification to our own souls. I am only just returned from attending a similar meeting at Headingley, where Messrs. Corbett, Cowley, Chapman, Smith, and myself took part in the proceedings; and next Wednesday (p.v.) there will be another meeting for united prayer held in my own church; and so we shall go on till the breaking up of the winter will render the roads impassable for a season.

The above will no doubt prove interesting to your numerous readers throughout the Christian world, and will lead many to think of us when kneeling at the throne of Divine grace, and to pray for a blessing upon our missionary labours in this distant and isolated portion of the Lord's vineyard, where it has been my privilege to labour during the last seventeen years.

A copy of your Evangelical Christendom—for which we all have to thank you—often comes to hand, to cheer and encourage our hearts in our solitude, by seeing how the work of the Lord is progressing in other lands. But I must not trespass further upon your valuable time, and will conclude with again asking the prayers of all those who love the Lord Jesus Christ, for ourselves and our work.—I remain, Sirs, yours very obliged,

JAMES HUNTER,
Archdeacon of Cumberland, Rupert's Land.

Literature.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.*

THE Foreign Theological Library of the Messrs. Clark holds on its way with unabated vigour. Since its commencement it has placed within the reach of English readers many works more or less remarkable. The very term of "Library" suggests the comprehensive character and range of the plan, and we need not say how well it has been borne in mind. Works on the history of doctrines and of the Church, on the theory and on the practice of biblical criticism, on profound questions in theology, and on a multitude of other matters, have made their appearance. And, notwithstanding the practical difficulties connected with such an enterprise, its conductors have, on the whole, successfully carried it on. We say on the whole, for while we think it has been altogether successful as a matter of business, there have been occasional shortcomings. Perhaps a few works have not been well selected. More frequently the paper or printing have been defective. Quite as often the translators have been so trammelled by German idioms, that their versions have been in places awkward, if not unintelligible. These things appear to be inevitable, and we do not, therefore, judge them so severely as we might have done. It is a marvel how such volumes are produced for the price, and only a very large circulation can defray the cost of them. As to the volume before us, it is happily selected, inasmuch as Dr. Tholuck stands very high among the critics of the present day. He is intimately acquainted with many languages, and is familiar with an extensive range of literature. His natural advantages are, moreover, very considerable, and have been well disciplined. He knows how to look at a subject from many points of view, and hence he exhibits great versatility and freshness in the treatment of texts. At the same time, we do not see our way to all his conclusions, and find in him a truly German tendency to speculation, which to us seems often eccentric and wayward. No one can question his sincerity and honesty, any more than his piety and reverence for truth; but there is a freedom and a boldness in his criticism which will not fail to strike the attention of English readers. With these observations we proceed to consider the book now in our hands.

The translator seems to have added nothing but a note, mentioned below, and the intimation that the version of pages 207 to 251, and 346 to 362, has been made by a friend. In general the work appears to be well and carefully executed, but we still find far too many traces of its German origin, especially in the use of some auxiliary verbs, and in expressions indicative of time and sequence. There is one thing which should have been prevented, and the prevention of which would have made it a far more readable book. We refer to the Latin and other quotations of the original. It happens not seldom that a page consists of one-third, or one-half Latin, printed in the same type as the text, and untranslated, and not marked as quotation. This medley has a motley appearance, and to some it will read like jargon. Few of these citations need have been preserved in their original, and all of them ought to have been translated. When necessary to be retained, they might have been accompanied by a translation; and when unnecessary, the translation only would have sufficed. Many examples present themselves, but let the following on Matt. v. 18 suffice:—

The explanation of γινίσθαι had already to be touched upon in explaining πληρῶσαι. Many of the ancients fail to give here a clear and definite statement. In Jerome, still more in Hilary. Euthymius, the typical fulfilment is most prominently brought forward. The first says: Ex figura litteræ ostenditur, quod etiam, quæ minima putantur in lege, sacramentis spiritualibus plena sint et omnia recapitulentur in eo: in support whereof he afterwards refers to the sacrifices, presupposing, therefore, the fulfilment of the ceremonial law. In Augustine—who, however, includes also the prophetical fulfilment—the fulfilment of the moral law in believers by love is chiefly dwelt on (vide supra, p. 125). A few, such as Bede, Rupertus, Druthmar, regard the iōra as denoting the number ten; and accordingly find here a special reference to the Decalogue. According to the Glossa ordinarius, the expression refers alike to command and promise: donec spiritualiter impleantur vel imperfecta perficiantur et significantia, i.e. impletio consummentur. Similarly Este, Menoch., Tirin. The older Lutheran exegesis restricts the lex to the Decalogue alone, and finds here only the concio legalis hypothetica (vide supra, p. 39); so that the Mosaic utterance: maledictus qui non permanserit in omnibus, quæ scripta sunt in libro legis, is adduced as a parallel passage. See Chemnitz, Gerhard, loci V. T. 65. Hunnius, Sarcarius: exaggerat Christus difficultatem legis et eternam Dei voluntatem in servanda lege stabilit, ut sciamus legis impletionem non esse in nostris viribus. Bucer and Bullinger lay stress upon the view of St. Augustine: so likewise Bengel: facta sunt et fiunt, etiam in Christianis: non erant facta ante illum. On the other hand, the ethical and prophetic fulfilment is maintained by Calvin, Beza, Piscator. Aretius holds that the fulfilment is by Christ Himself. Socinus hit upon the idea already alluded to, that ἔως ἂν γίνῃται marks a period of time of which the fulfilment of the law by Christ Himself was the commencement, after which the abrogation of the ceremonial law took place: is autem sensus est, quod non prius futura esset abrogatio ulla præceptorum illorum, quam illis plenissima aliqua ratione obtemperatum fuisset, nempe ab aliquo homine præstitum perfecte vel minimum præceptorum istorum, id quod ab ipso Christo factum sine dubio est, dum hic in terris ageret, quo facto et ipso in cælos sublato, tum demum abrogatio facta est . . . ceremonialium omnium. Wettstein, J. Meyer, explain the saying of the fulfilment of the prophetic portion of the law. According to Clericus, who understands ἔως in the sense of sed, the proper translation is, not as Grotius asserts: donec omnia facta erunt, but (as γίνεται νόμος is equivalent to integer manet); sed omnia præcepta erunt. The idea would thus be, not that of being fulfilled, but that of continuing valid. This rendering is adopted by most of Clericus' successors: Elsner, Heum., Mich., Bahrdt, Rosenmueller, and many others. Meyer adds the connecting thought: that "this fulfilment of every part of the law would never take place;" but comes to the same conclusion: that the passage asserts that "the νόμος is continually binding." But, even to go no further than the prophetic anticipation of a Jeremiah (xxxi. 33), was not that anticipation to be realised in the Church of Christ? But Meyer, as well as Olsh. and De Wette, has essentially gone over to the ethical and typical interpretation of the passage. Only Ewald explains: "until the end of the world, before which a great deal of what was predicted in the Old Testament must take place."

* Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount. By Dr. A. THOLUCK. Translated from the Fourth Revised and Enlarged Edition, by the Rev. R. LUNDIN BROWN, M.A. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark.

How terrible a passage like this must be to mere English readers, will be seen at once; and those who can understand it, will readily perceive that such a mosaic is unnecessary, and looks pedantic.

There is, also, a matter affecting the author which requires a moment's notice; and to which we have, in fact, already alluded. We mean the freedom and liberty which the learned doctor has allowed himself in some of his expressions and opinions. This is what we have called wayward, and we have no other term to convey our idea. We do not, of course, wish to restrain a critic's freedom, but we are not, therefore, called upon to follow him wherever he may choose to lead us; nor do we profess to sympathise with him in all his preferences. At the very outset of the preface we have an example in point: "Although," says Dr. Tholuck, "I have no doubts as to the genuineness of the Gospel of John, I must confess that the spirit of Christ finds me most directly in the first three Gospels; and their interpretation has had peculiar attractions for me, because in them the Son of God, at once Divine and human, and the climax of a redemptive process of two thousand years, is presented in a tangible, physical shape." Of course, this is the fact in regard to Dr. T., but it will be found that his experience is not that of the majority, and for ourselves, we freely confess that we cannot enter into it. Instances of a different kind occur frequently, and especially in the introduction; but everywhere there is a peculiarly German freedom of criticism, which analyses and weighs and values the sacred text, more boldly than is common with us. We do not speak of the comparative accuracy, ability, inspiration, worth, and authority of the Evangelists. We do not bring discrepancies and differences prominently forward.

We labour to construct harmonies of the four Gospels, and we shall be forgiven if we still think this the more excellent way.

In an introduction of fifty pages, Dr. Tholuck discusses several questions of interest and importance, under the following heads: 1, Identity of the discourse in St. Matthew v.-vii., with that in St. Luke vi.; 2, Time of delivery of Sermon on Mount; 3, Occasion, object, and train of thought; 4, Authenticity and genuineness; 5, Relation to the Evangelical doctrine of salvation; and 6, Exegetical literature. This last section includes the titles of many ancient and modern works, and will, therefore, be very useful; it might have been made still more so to us by the addition of a larger number of English authors. The translator winds up the list, extending over nine pages, with this one addition of his own: "Above all, 'Sermons on the Lord's Prayer,' by the Rev. F. D. Maurice, London." To us this seems a little absurd, because we think there have been many before the gentleman in question who have expounded the Lord's Prayer, if not as popularly, yet as practically, spiritually, and critically. In any case we demur to such a glorification of the book alluded to. Dr. Tholuck gives us the following as the plan of the Sermon on the Mount:—

Historical introduction, ch. v. 1, 2; blessedness of those who in the right way long for the Kingdom of God, and manifest the fruits of its righteousness, ch. v. 3—9; blessedness of those who submit to the reproach which in this world is associated with the righteousness of the Kingdom of God, ch. v. 10—12; having so high a vocation, the disciples of the Kingdom of God must in nowise disavow it, ch. v. 13—16; the righteousness required under the old dispensation to be perfected and fulfilled in the Kingdom of Christ, ch. v. 17—48; the true motive in works of righteousness, the eye fixed on Him who sees in secret, ch. vi. 1; warning against a hypocritical exercise of charity, for the sake of the praise of men, ch. vi. 2—4; warning against hypocritical and unworthy praying, ch. vi. 5—8; the Lord's Prayer, ch. vi. 9—15; warning against a hypocritical use of fasting, ch. vi. 16—18; God, the supreme object of human desire and endeavour, to which all else must be entirely subordinated, ch. vi. 19—34; sundry admonitions, ch. vii. 1—12; epilogue, ch. vii. 13—27.

The exposition of the text treats it section by section. Each section is analysed, and its clauses and words are separately discussed. There are long dissertations upon weighty questions of doctrine, and minute grammatical and critical examinations of words and phrases. As already intimated, there are a profusion of extracts, and these are far outnumbered by references to authors, so that in these respects it is a perfect storehouse. The whole concludes with three indexes of Greek words, Scripture texts, and principal matters, for which we are truly grateful, because they will help us to use the volume more freely as a book of reference, for which it is well adapted.

We had intended to give other extracts from the exposition, but those which commend themselves to us most strongly are so bristling with Greek and Latin, that they would not be appreciated by the general reader, who will have had enough of the quotation above. The conclusion we have arrived at is, that in its present form the volume will prove a boon to biblical students with an average knowledge of Greek and Latin; if to these they add an acquaintance with the Shemitic languages, it will be the better for them. Let our ministers, as far as possible, avail themselves of it. They will find it clear on many grounds, sound on all essentials, and full of most valuable suggestions and explanations.

MEETING OF DELEGATES AND OTHER MEMBERS WITH THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL.

WE again call attention to the proposed meetings at Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street, on Friday, the 10th of May. The morning meeting, for prayer, and for frank and free conversation on the state and prospects of the Evangelical Alliance, will commence at eleven o'clock. This meeting is open only to representatives of local committees, or to other members of the Alliance, by tickets, which may be obtained by application to the Secretaries, 7, Adam-street, Strand.

At four o'clock there will be a dinner,

And at six o'clock a meeting, open to the public, will be held for united prayer and brief addresses.

CORRESPONDENCE.—At the meeting of the Committee of Council, on April 18, a correspondence was read between one of the secretaries and the Rev. B. M. Cowie, Minor Canon of St. Paul's, on the subject of a reference to the Evangelical Alliance made by Mr. Cowie in an address delivered by him at Zion College on the 25th of March. In reporting that address, the daily papers state: "He referred to the illiberality of the Dissenting body called the Evangelical Alliance, in the matter of Baron Bunsen professing himself a true Catholic, one who revered all who loved the Lord Jesus Christ, and, while differing in opinion from many, he could yet think kindly of those in whom he saw error." Mr. Cowie was informed by the Secretary—1. That the Evangelical Alliance is not a "Dissenting body," but that it comprehends persons of all religious bodies, who are willing to join it on the basis of the nine doctrinal articles contained in the "Manual" (a copy of which was sent), and that it includes many of the clergy and laity of the Church of England; 2, that the adoption of the last resolution with reference to Baron Bunsen took place at the instance mainly of Church of England members of the Alliance; and 3, that the principle of the Evangelical Alliance is very much in accordance with the latter part of the above extract of the report of Mr. Cowie's address, the object of the Alliance being to aid in manifesting the Catholicity of the true Church of Christ in promoting mutual acquaintance among Christians of different countries, and seeking to induce the followers of a common Divine Master, while they differ on some minor points—to quote the late Bishop of Calcutta's words—"to work together so far as they are agreed." To this communication the following reply was received:—

62, Queen's-Gardens, Hyde-park,
March 30, 1861.

Dear Sir,—The report in the papers was not quite accurate. I am obliged to you for your communication, which I will notice as a foot-note in the published address which is now being printed. All I knew about the matter was from what I read in the Record and other newspapers.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) B. M. COWIE.

SOUTH AFRICA.—Printed reports of an interesting series of meetings convened by the Committee of the South African Branch of the Evangelical Alliance have just reached the Committee of Council. The meetings were held in the Dutch Reformed Church, Adderley-street, Cape Town, on the 16th and 17th of January last. The proceedings of the first day were conducted in the Dutch language, and on the second in English.

There were two sessions on each of those days: at the first of which, on the former day, the Rev. A. Faure, B.D., President of the Branch, having introduced the business by reading the programme issued by the Committee,

The Rev. George Morgan took the chair.

After prayer and the reading of communications from other branches of the Alliance, the Rev. A. Faure read a paper, which he had been requested to prepare, on "Domestic Religion." An interesting discussion followed on the subject of this paper, in which the Rev. Messrs. A. Murray, jun., Cachet, Esselen, Gorrie, Neethling, Bisser and Professors J. Murray and Dr. Hofm took part.

The meeting was closed with prayer by the Rev. Professor Hofmeyr.

The evening meeting was presided over by W. de Smidt, Esq., Under Colonial Secretary.

After the singing of a hymn, and prayer by the Rev. Dr. H. E. Faure, papers were read by the Rev. Professor Hofmeyr, on "Christian Co-operation for the more General Diffusion of Religion among all Classes of Society," and on "The Scriptural Character of a Religious Revival." Several brief addresses were delivered, and the proceedings of the day were closed by singing a hymn, and by the Rev. H. E. Faure offering prayer, and pronouncing the benediction.

At the morning meeting, on January 17th, the business was introduced by the Rev. Mr. Cameron stating the motives which had induced the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance in Cape Town to propose the series of meetings now held.

The chair was then taken by J. Abercrombie, Esq., M.D., and prayer was offered by the Rev. Andrew Murray, jun.

Communications were read from the Port Elizabeth and Uitenhaze and Natal Branches of the Alliance. Among others, the Rev. Mr. Dyke, of Bassutoland, the representative of the former of those branches, addressed the meeting. A paper was read on "Christian Union," by the Rev. Mr. Tindall, of Robertson.

At the closing meeting the chair was taken by Professor Murray. Ephesians, chap. iv., was read, and prayer offered, by the Rev. Mr. Morgan.

A letter was read from the Rev. Mr. Govan, of Kaffraria, expressing sympathy with the Conference. The Rev. Mr. Long read an essay on the subject of one of the papers read in Dutch on the previous day—viz., "Domestic Religion;" and afterwards the Rev. Mr. Thompson, of Cape Town, read a paper on "Christian Missions, especially in reference to the duty of Colonial Churches." [These and others of the papers have been published, and copies sent to the Committee of Council.]

After the reading of the essays, several addresses were delivered. The Rev. Mr. Dyke referred specially, in the first place, to the subject of the essays, and then gave some information of the state and prospects of the Paris Missions in Bassutoland.

The Rev. Mr. Morgan directed attention to a suggestion made in the latter essay as to the publication in Cape Town of a Christian periodical to diffuse intelligence of missionary operations in South Africa, to excite a missionary spirit, and in general to advocate Evangelical truth, according to the requirements of Colonial society.

The sense of the meeting being found favourable to this suggestion, a committee was appointed to take steps to carry out the suggestion. Two other subjects were then discussed. The first was that of "The Sanctification of the Sabbath." An address was presented to the meeting from 140 Sunday-school teachers in connexion with the Cape Town Sunday Teachers' Union, pointing out the increase of Sabbath desecration, and requesting the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance to devise measures, in which all Christians might concur, to promote the better observance of the Lord's-day. To this request the Committee undertook to give their best attention.

The other subject referred to was "Religious Revivals." After a conversation upon that subject, the papers read before the Conference were handed to the Alliance Committee, and a vote of thanks having been agreed upon to the Consistory of the Dutch Reformed Church, for the use of the church in which the meetings had been held, the series of meetings was brought to a close by the pronouncing of the benediction by the Chairman.

BULGARIA.—Since the information was published last month relative to the movement in Bulgaria to throw off the yoke of the Greek Hierarchy, to have religious services in the churches in the vernacular tongue, and to circulate the Word of God, the following letter has been received by the Committee of Council :—

Bebek, March 26, 1861.

In my letter of the 12th inst. I mentioned that the Bulgarians were to hold, on Thursday of that week, a public meeting to proclaim the National Bulgarian Church. The meeting was deferred from Thursday till Sunday, on account of a severe storm. On Sunday some 3,000 persons assembled at the Bulgarian Church in the city. The Bulgarian bishops had at first been inclined to hurl back upon the Greek Patriarch his anathemas, but finally concluded to set that dignity a Christian example—to bless, and curse not. One of the bishops addressed the people, but the meeting was broken up by order of the Turkish Government, at the instigation of the Patriarch, who represented that the Bulgarians were bent on commotion and riot. The Government, however, has given its consent to the calling of a convention from different parts of Bulgaria, in order to test the sentiments of the nation at large on the points at issue. We are now looking forward with much interest to the meeting of this convention. Meanwhile the Patriarch is furious at the check he has received, and is exerting himself still to the utmost to get the bishops into his hands, that he may crush them and the liberties of their Church together; and there is reason to fear, that with such influence as he can bring to bear upon the Government, he may accomplish his purposes. He did succeed in obtaining an order by which the Bulgarian bishops were forbidden to perform religious services at the Bulgarian Church last Sabbath. So ready does the Patriarch appear for even the most despotic measures, that one of the bishops, the more particular object of his wrath, has felt constrained to keep himself secluded from notice for some little time past, lest, in an unguarded moment, he should be seized, and sent into exile, from which a return might be long delayed.

At the Committee meeting on the 18th April, the following resolution with reference to this subject was adopted: Resolved—That the subject of the Bulgarian Church be commended to the prayers of our Christian friends, and that a short statement of the bearings of the question be appended to this minute, making it apparent that our interest is not in any political question that may be involved, but in the progress of the cause of Divine truth.

SPAIN.—It was reported at the meeting of the Committee of Council, on the 18th of April, that the accounts respecting the persecution of the Protestants in Spain were still unfavourable. Matamoros and Alhama, instead of having been brought to trial, as was hoped, were still confined and treated with increased rigour. Their Bibles, &c., had been taken from them; they had been separated, and not allowed to be visited by their friends, nor to be spoken to even by the other prisoners, although murderers and other felons are not denied these privileges. Other arrests also had been made. At Granada, in the dead of night, the house of one of the Protestants, a faithful Christian, was entered by the police, and the father, mother, and son dragged off to a dungeon, five little children being left wholly unprovided for. On the same night five others were arrested, and three or four others have fled to Gibraltar. At Seville also more arrests had been made: amongst them the head of one of the public schools, who, when the last accounts were received, was still in a dungeon. A letter from Spain, dated 20th March, says: "Persecution has again burst forth with new force at Seville, and should things continue as they are here, merely to name the Bible will be a crime in the eyes of the reactionaries. On Tuesday last, at twelve o'clock at night, six of our friends were brought to this prison (Seville) and lodged in separate dungeons without any communication. All of them are most respectable and industrious people, and all of them were taken out of their beds and brought to this abode of crime and misery, their arms tied behind like robbers or assassins. Four or five Bibles and some controversial tracts were found in their possession, and that seems to be their only crime. They were examined and cross-examined yesterday and the day before by the judge of the 3rd district, and accused of belonging to a secret society, the object of which was to overthrow the Church. The charge being unfounded and indefensible, the poor fellows were yesterday allowed to have communication with each other. We have returned to the times of Ferdinand VII." Since the Committee meeting, the subject was again brought before the House of Commons by Sir Robert Peel (on the 19th of April), who asked a question of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to the nature of the communications which have passed between Sir A. Buchanan and the Spanish Government with reference to the present persecutions in Spain. Sir Robert stated that he had letters in his possession with respect to the treatment of the prisoners which would bring tears into the eyes of any one who read them—the prisoners were dying in a cold, damp prison; that these men were being persecuted solely on the ground of their religious faith, and were in no way connected with any political movement; and that he hoped Her Majesty's Government would act in the matter in the same way in which they acted in 1852 and 1853, and would represent to the Spanish Government that these persecutions were quite incompatible with the spirit and feeling, not only of this country, but of their own constitution.

PRESENTATION OF A BIBLE TO GENERAL GARIBALDI.—The President having written to General Garibaldi, to apprise him of the pleasure with which Christians in England had read his noble and striking words, "The Bible is the cannon which will liberate Italy," and of their desire to present to him, through the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, a handsome copy of the Word of God, in various languages, the General returned the following reply, which, though it has found its way into some of the public prints, some of our friends may like to see published here:—

LETTER FROM GENERAL GARIBALDI TO SIR CULLING E. HARDLEY, BART.
(Translation.)

Caprera, Feb. 17, 1861.

Sir,—I am very grateful for all that the Christians of England have done for the welfare of The Evangelical Alliance, over which you preside, is a good work. I shall receive with pleasure, by post, the offer which you have made me of a Bible in many tongues, but I do not consent that a deputation of members of your Society should put themselves to inconvenience for the purpose. The great majority of the people among us, if not Protestant in name, are very Protestant in fact, as is proved by the indifference—nay, even the contempt—with which they receive the anathemas of the Papacy, and by the public ridicule which the miracles excite.

Be persuaded, Sir, that the Italian people is much less popish than has been said. As for me, be good enough to believe me the irreconcilable enemy of hypocrisy, and of all despotism; and at the same time, your affectionate

G. GARIBALDI.

The Bible has been placed in the hands of General Garibaldi, together with an address, signed on behalf of the contributors by Sir C. E. Eardley, Bart., the Hon. W. Ashley, Colonel Walker, and Rev. Hermann Schmettau. We hope to give further particulars next month. Contributions are still sequestered to the fund for providing copies of the New Testament for the Italian Army.

PERSECUTION IN RUSSIA.—An application has been made by the Baptist Union to the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, to interest themselves in the liberation of a Baptist now in prison in Russia, for baptizing persons in that country. The subject is receiving the best attention of the Committee.

NEW MEMBERS.—The following persons have been unanimously admitted to membership—viz., at the Committee of Council meeting, on April 18: Rev. Richard Allen and Mr. Charles Friendship, Bideford; C. B. Mander, Esq., Rev. W. McOwan, and Mr. Fleeming, Wolverhampton; Mr. E. Bowen, Dudley; Dr. Forbes Winslow, Cavendish-square; Johnson Brown, Esq., George Bacon, Esq., Rev. John Averill, and Mrs. Major Selby, Clevedon, near Bristol; Major Selby, Burmah; Captain Orr, R.A., Woolwich; Mr. John Cartwright, and Mr. C. E. Pratt, Stoke-on-Trent.

EXCLUSIVENESS.

THE spirit of exclusiveness has been the bane of the Church of God in every age. It is so still, and God, in His Word, most clearly reveals to us His repugnance to it. Our Redeemer's whole life and work were a protest against it. He had to bear with it, and of course, in so doing, to resist it, in the hearts of His disciples. "Master," said they, "we saw one casting out devils in Thy name, and he followeth not us; and we forbid him, because he followeth not us." But Jesus said, "Forbid him not, for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name that can lightly speak evil of me." In their mistaken zeal for the dignity of His person, they took upon themselves to rebuke those who brought their young children to Him, beseeching Him to touch them. But how decidedly—and yet, at the same time, lovingly—were they themselves rebuked, as He replied, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." Still more did His worldwide love bring Him under the censure of those who despised and rejected Him. "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them," nullified at once, in their estimation, His claim to be their Messiah. They hated Him, because He had no sympathy with a clique. Each party in Church and State found itself baffled in turn, as it sought in Him the support of a partisan. The Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Herodians endeavoured, one after the other, by flattery or by guile, to secure His suffrage for their tenets, but in vain. Thus also the rulers took counsel to put Him to death, because they thought Him the champion of the people; whilst the people soon renounced their zeal for Him, when they found that it was useless to try and take Him by force and make Him their king. Blessed be God! He "is the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world," for He is God, and "God is not the God of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles." "He is no respecter of persons."

After our Lord's ascension, and from that day to the present, exclusiveness became the dominant evil with which His Spirit has had to contend, not merely in the world, where its home is, but also in the Church, where, happily, it is only an invader, though too frequently treated as a welcome guest. The record of the Acts of the Apostles shows us that, but for the special teaching which the early Church received, this evil would soon have gained the supremacy, and so have destroyed its infant life. Take the case of the Apostle Peter, who, perhaps, was as free naturally as most men from the bitterness of bigotry; generous warmheartedness, indeed, is a very prominent trait in his disposition. Yet, notwithstanding all that he had seen and heard when Jesus was on earth—notwithstanding the possession of the promised Spirit—a twofold extraneous interposition appears to have been requisite to convince him that the Messiah belonged as much to the race of man as to his own nation. It was only by the coincident vision of Cornelius with his own, that he could be persuaded to feel it right for a man that was a Jew to keep company or come unto one of another nation." The heavenly instruction which Peter on that occasion received, we may be sure, was not designed simply to point out the course of conduct which God intended him to pursue toward a single individual, but to liberalise the Church in all ages; and that by drawing its members into greater harmony of thought and feeling with God Himself, the universal Father; since it is only as the Church has sympathy with the heart of God, that it can fulfil its service of blessing to the world. The tendency to "limit the Holy One of Israel," in the accomplishment of His purposes and the bestowment

His grace, which we see to some extent exemplified in Peter, is the common tendency of our nature. It has its roots in the ungodliness of our disposition. It derives its nourishment from our corrupt and selfish passions, and its fruit is, cold and callous indifference to all who are separated by any "middle wall of partition" from ourselves. Hence the warfare of the Christian life mainly consists in doing battle with this evil spirit within us. It is the spirit of "the world." It is not "of the Father;" and it is only as the Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is of course the type of the perfect Christian life, takes possession of our hearts, that we too, without respect of persons, can love as He loved.

It must, however, be admitted that this conflict with self is difficult—very difficult; and, but for the living power that flows forth to us from Him who resisted unto death, and so triumphed, too difficult for our achievement. There are those in the world, and even in the Church, who may be as much "Gentiles" to us, as Cornelius was to Peter, and who, in consequence, are complacently set aside as "common and unclean." When we see or read of those whose physical or moral condition is as degraded as it well can be, secret self-approbation will not unfrequently suggest to our hearts the Pharisee's estimate of the Publican: "God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men." It needs much devout thoughtfulness, much fellowship with the sufferings of our Lord, much communion with the mind of the Holy Ghost, much filial appreciation of the Divine Fatherhood, to discipline ourselves into the conviction that such are "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh," children of the same Parent, and that He has really put no essential difference between us and them; that their condition is not, after all, utterly hopeless, but reachable and recoverable by Divine methods of compassionate salvation. It is much easier to say, as the disciples did respecting the Syrophenician woman, "Send her away, for she crieth after us," than patiently to wait and wait, as Jesus did, for the right moment, when the help of His living sympathy would be most serviceable, and then to give it. Much easier also is it to seek, with James and John, to be permitted to call down fire from heaven and consume the bigoted and inhospitable Samaritans, than, with Jesus, to bide our time for a more favourable opportunity of doing them good. Any man can curse his fellows, but only the Christlike in temper and conduct can bless them. "You know not," says the Saviour still, and that sometimes to His most intimate followers, "what manner of spirit ye are of."

This tendency to exclusiveness is not infrequently much strengthened by an apparently conscientious regard for the supposed claims of religion. In the illustration already adduced, we may see that this was Peter's plea. It is not asserting too much to say that his religiousness made him narrowminded and exclusive. The command "Rise Peter, kill and eat," was not so repulsive to his natural taste, as it was at variance with his most sacred convictions. Like all his countrymen, he had grown up in the belief that the rites of Judaism were eternal; he could not separate those rites from the purpose for which they were instituted. A higher development of religious life, a development more Christlike, would have told him that "to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of lambs." Into this higher life he was being led, but he had not then attained it, so that he felt it to be no violation of conscience, no dereliction of duty, to assert his own supremacy in opposition to the Divine command. "Not so Lord," he replied, "for I have never eaten anything common or unclean." He might, we know, easily have advanced many most plausible arguments for his self-assumed position, and even for his own conception of the paramount claim of Judaism. The letter of Scripture would give some pretext for it; or, again, the sacredness that belongs to the religious associations of childhood and youth. So also the very words of the Lord, which he had once heard Him utter, if isolated from their purpose, would have served for his justification: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." "Salvation is of the Jews." And no doubt, under cover of religion, he did thus argue with himself on this occasion ; just as he did, subsequently, when he dissembled with other Jews about the same question, and had to be "withstood to the face" by the Apostle Paul.

And when have not the claims of religion been advanced as a plea for exclusiveness ? Far greater conscientiousness has often been shown in maintaining the laws and customs of "our Church" or "our body," than in exemplifying the Spirit of Him who is "Head over all things to the Church," which is "His body." Middle walls of partition have been most zealously raised by means of favourite texts, and most pugnaciously defended by quotations from traditional authorities, the breaking down of which has seemed, and does still, as much an act of sacrilege, as our Lord's command to Peter did to him. No doctrine has possibly been more abused, for this mischievous purpose, than the doctrine of election. By making a species of arbitrary favouritism the basis of the Divine choice, the inference has again and again been drawn, that its existence, as a revealed fact, necessarily involves the hopeless exclusion of the great bulk of mankind, from ever attaining to the blessedness of moral conformity to His will, whose "offspring" they are. Just as the Jewish nation, though chosen of God to be the people in whose seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed, converted their election into a pretext for regarding all other nations as outside the enclosure of the Divine sympathy and mercy, and in their exclusive arrogance dared to despise them, as though they were an inferior order of creation ; so, at times, has the professed Church of Christ, luxuriating in its own exalted privilege, heartlessly written off the non-elect from all share in the fatherly compassion of Him, who "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth," and who still "maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." Surely, such a spirit cannot accord with the mind of our Redeemer—"the Lord of all men"—who gave, as His parting legacy to the Church, the command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature !" And His disciples dishonour His Spirit when they limit the range of His grace within the narrow boundaries of their own experience. The moment the Church begins to do this, it enters upon a course of division and subdivision that is hopelessly interminable. Its harmony is at an end, for self takes the place of Christ, and human sentiment that of Divine ; and every one saith, "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ"—each zealous partisan justifying his narrowness on the seemingly religious plea of conscientious attachment to his creed. Ecclesiastical organizations, again, have done much to foster the same exclusive spirit on a religious pretext. At times the aim of the Church almost seems to have been to exclude, by its constitution, the greatest number, rather than include them ; and by claiming the sanction of God's Word for all its enactments, it has covered its iron barriers with the gildings of religion. One Church will assert, because "our" order of bishops, priests, and deacons is Divine, you cannot have fellowship with us unless you accept the same ; and another, because "our" mode of observing the ordinance of baptism is Divine, you cannot have fellowship with us, unless you submit to the rite as we do. Such assertions have all the appearance of religious conscientiousness, and in some cases are not its appearance merely, but its actual expression. And any higher teaching on such matters would be as religiously opposed as the teaching which Peter received at Joppa. Thus it will be until the sympathies of the Church are brought into full accordance with the highest of all teaching, which declares, "There is one body and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling : one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all."

The plea of separation from the world is, perhaps, another illustration of a seemingly religious defence of exclusiveness. Nothing can be plainer than the command, "Wherefore come ye out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing." But if the "world" be made to consist, not of those whose spirit is the spirit of self-supremacy, manifested in disposition and conduct, but of those whose opinions are at variance with our own, then this command is easily pressed into a service the very opposite of that for which it was intended. Bigotry is as much "an unclean thing" in the sight of God, as any other form of selfishness. "Ye know not what ye ask," said our Lord to James and John, as they sought to introduce this worldly self-supremacy into the Church, and, as a natural consequence, filled the ten with indignation, thereby sowing the seeds of strife and division, which in due time would have deepened into destructive roots of bitterness, had not the Redeemer at once, with His words of wisdom, and His own bright example of self-subjection, interposed. That servant of Christ, therefore, who would "keep himself unspotted from the world," must certainly keep himself, not isolated from his fellow-men in some monastic Shibboleth of his own party, but unspotted from the world's proud spirit of exclusiveness.

But, however subtle the workings of this spirit, it cannot escape the detection of the Lord's retributive judgments. Through its unfriendliness, it renders those who cherish it eventually friendless. Seeking to be alone, they are left alone. "There is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." "There is that maketh himself rich, and yet hath nothing." The history of nations, as of individuals, is evidence of this. The exclusiveness of the Jewish people contributed, in conjunction with their unbelief, of which it was the natural fruit, to their ruin. "None of us liveth to himself," and if we think and act otherwise, the result is, we die. Whilst we write, the American Republic is exemplifying, in the horrors of civil war, the consequences of excluding four millions of its population from the rights and liberties, not merely of citizens, but of men. And just so, the moment any section of the Church closes its doors against its brethren, it closes them upon its own tomb. Exclusiveness is the graveyard of spiritual life. In shutting out those for whom Christ died, it shuts out Christ. The fresh and genial atmosphere of His presence can no longer gain admission, and in the stifled atmosphere of its own self-imprisonment, the Church sinks into the torpor of death. We cannot then, surely, too earnestly guard against the encroachments of this evil! No alliance or confederacy will stand that indulges in it. The corrective may be found in the words with which Peter was addressed when the voice from heaven declared, "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." Peter himself tells us that then he was taught not to "call any man common or unclean." Through faith in God he acquired faith in man. He saw at once an old text in a new light. He had often read, in Deuteronomy and elsewhere, that God is no respecter of persons, but now he says, "I perceive it of a truth." This recognition of the Divine supremacy in the organization of the Church gave to his soul an expansiveness never before experienced. He no longer felt himself warranted in putting his own limits to the fold of Christ. Rather, on its portal he inscribed, on that memorable occasion, for the guidance of the flock in all ages, the brief, but comprehensive and significant truth, "He (Christ Jesus) is Lord of all men."

"Our little systems have their day,
They have their day and cease to be;
They are but broken lights of Thee,
And Thou, O Lord, art more than they."

THE PENTATEUCH: ITS ASSAILANTS AND DEFENDERS.*

THE Pentateuch stands to the Old Testament in the same relation as the Gospels to the New. The writings of the Prophets, the Psalms of David, and the other Hebrew poets, the historical books of the Kings, Chronicles, &c., would be unintelligible in many parts, had the books of Moses been consigned to oblivion. In the same way, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of Paul and his fellow-labourers, would be dark and mystical indeed, were it not for the light shed on them by Gospel history. They supplement the Gospels as the post-Mosaic writings do the Pentateuch.

The battle of New Testament criticism rages fiercest round the Gospels, as that of the Old Testament does round the books of Moses. The Gospels have been again and again asserted to be a patchwork of fragmentary lives of Christ and accounts of His miracles; and the books of Moses have been similarly handled in the various theories propounded concerning their composition, such as the document-hypothesis, the fragment-hypothesis, and the complement-hypothesis.

It is well known that the attacks made by the German scholar, Wolf, on the antiquity and genuineness of the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" of Homer, were the precursors of those on the Mosaic writings. One of Wolf's great arguments was derived from the nonexistence of the art of writing at so early an era as that of Homer; but recent discoveries have shown that he was incorrect in this idea, and that the knowledge of the art of writing prevailed widely in very remote and distant ages. The scholars of Germany belonging to the progress party, at the close of the last, and even at the commencement of the present century, were for assigning the composition of the Pentateuch to a period not much earlier, if not later, than the Captivity, but gradually the date has been placed farther back, even to the time of Solomon or David, and still more recently, to that of the Judges, or probably of Joshua.

The supporters of the document-hypothesis considered that, whoever was the editor, or "redacteur," as he was termed, of the Pentateuch, and especially of the Book of Genesis, in the form in which it is found at present, or to whatever date he might be supposed to belong, it was at least clear that he made use of ancient documents, and that, at one time by omitting, and at another by adding, he wove a connected narrative out of diverse materials. They supposed that these various portions could be discovered, and separated one from the other, by observing attentively the names of God used in the various portions of the book; and forasmuch as Elohim occurred peculiarly in some parts, and Jehovah in others, they considered this proof that there were at least two writers, whom they termed respectively the Jehovist and the Elohist.

Had the advocates of this theory stopped at this point, much notice need not have been taken of their works, for it is plainly consistent, even with extreme views of inspiration, to hold that the Pentateuch was a compilation from various sources, provided it be also held that the compiler was divinely directed or guided in his choice, and that there are no contradictions or errors in the book so composed.

But they did not stop there: on the contrary, their critical researches were guided by principles which necessitated the supposition of portions of the Pentateuch being assigned to a later date, and which made them utterly indifferent to any attempts to reconcile apparent contradictions. One principle that we have observed to pervade the works of writers of the school alluded to, is the absolute denial of the miraculous. A scholar who has come to the a priori conclusion that there is no such thing as a miracle, must, when he comes across an account which touches on the marvellous, deny that such was written at a date when it could be contravened. Thus, for example, he must deny that the account of the passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites could have been written by Moses, who would not have ventured to put forth a statement of miracles, the refutation of which was easy to every one. Another position taken up by these writers is, that the ordinary notions of prophecy are incorrect, and that all prophecies are really but "vaticinia post eventum." Thus, on this principle, the 49th of Genesis (the blessing of Jacob) must have been composed after the entrance of the Israelites into the promised land, on account of the information concerning the twelve tribes which it contains; and it is for this very reason that the term Shiloh has been considered as being an internal proof of a post-Mosaic date, at which the town of that name had become famous, or must be referred to Solomon, for in his reign peace prevailed throughout Israel.

Mr. Macdonald says well (vol. i. p. 49): "Let it be at the outset distinctly understood that the Pentateuch, or any other portion of Scripture, as an historical production, claims no exemption whatever from the canons, critical and historical, to which all other literary and historical works are amenable, and by which their genuineness is to be tested. But then it presents itself with a claim to be regarded as having a higher than human origin; and it submits, at the same time, evidence in attestation of that claim. Now it must appear exceedingly unreasonable that, without inquiry, and on the bare assumption that there never have been direct communications from God to man, or that such are impossible, the evidences furnished by the Pentateuch in favour of its Divine origin should be adduced as a proof that it could not have been written by Moses, or any other of that age, and that it should be summarily condemned on this and other points, as if professedly of human origin."

Inasmuch as the document-hypothesis, and the hypotheses that succeeded in rapid succession, were based upon the use of the names Jehovah and Elohim, especially in the Book of Genesis, the defenders of the Mosaic authorship took upon themselves to show cause why the one name, and not the other, was used in each case. Hengstenberg's great work on the authenticity and genuineness of the Pentateuch is disfigured by such an attempt, which can only be carried out on arbitrary principles, and must, therefore, be unsatisfactory. Mr. Macdonald gives a view of the relation of Jehovah and Elohim which is novel to us. He supposes that the former name is equivalent to the ὁ ἔρχομενος of the New Testament, and means, "He that shall be" or "shall come;" and, viewing the translation of ch. iv. 1, "I have gotten a man—Jehovah," as the correct one, he considers that only by a reference to the redemption to be made by Christ is the name at all explicable—Elohim being God in His character of Creator, and Jehovah designating God the Redeemer. This explanation, however, does not strike us as correct, and the translation of the passage on which it is based is exceedingly questionable—namely, chap. iv. 1, which Mr. Macdonald renders "I have gotten a man—he that should be." He remarks: "It is easy to see how this general designation should, in time, become a proper name. The egregious mistake in the application of the promise, and consequently of the designation, committed by the first mother, furnishes no valid objection to this view; while it affords a sufficient reason why—as appears from the whole tenor of the history—the name was for the most part forgotten, and gradually came into disuse until revived at the time of the Exodus."

We conceive that the Hebrew will not bear this translation. The use of the particle אֶת before יְהוָה is quite sufficient to prove it is not to be taken as the future of הוּדָה, but as a proper name. Besides, the word אִשָּׁה would naturally have had the article in this case—an objection which also holds good in the event of the passage being translated, with some, "I have gotten the man, Jehovah." None of the ancient authorities, with the exception of the Targum of the Pseudo-Jonathan—a not very weighty authority—adopt this view of the passage; and it is worthy of note that it renders both parts of the sentence definitely, "I have gotten the man, the angel of the Lord." The correct translation is, "I have gotten a male child by the help of Jehovah"—a very appropriate exclamation by Eve on the birth of her firstborn.

But, quite independently of Hebrew criticism, there are reasons to be assigned against Mr. Macdonald's view of the name Jehovah. If it be a name originally given in mistake by Eve herself to her firstborn, because she considered him as the promised seed who should bruise the serpent's head, why should the name be used as the most general designation for God in the Hebrew Scriptures? Not as limited to the second person of the Trinity, but as equally applicable to all three, is it used in the second chapter of Genesis and throughout the Bible. We consider the defenders of the Pentateuch have made a great mistake in endeavouring to extract some mystical meaning from the name. True it is, Mr. Macdonald does not fall into the same mistake that Haugstenberg does, of attempting to discover, in every case, why the name Jehovah is used, and not Elohim, or vice versa; on the contrary, he considers that the names are used very often promiscuously, after they have both been shown to be appellations of the same Great Being, God the Creator as well as God the Redeemer. But still we think we perceive, through his entire work, too manifest a disposition to err on the opposite side to the Rationalists, and too great a tendency, while avoiding Scylla, to fall into Charybdis. We believe, with Dr. Angus, in his excellent "Bible Handbook," that too much discredit has been thrown on the idea that Genesis is a compilation, by reason of the extravagance of the theories concerning it. That Moses used other documents is, we think, very plain; that there was a literature, small though it may be, even before his day, modern researches have tended to render at least highly probable; and though the Jehovistic and Elohist theory has been ridden to death in Germany, it has, we believe, at least some germs of truth. We view the name Jehovah as that whereby God was peculiarly known to Israel, and, through Israel, now to the utmost ends of the earth; while Elohim is the name of God in general, as manifested, though darkly, by the works of creation to the world at large—Jehovah being the only Elohim, though the blinded nations imagined that there were other gods than He.

Mr. Macdonald's book is, notwithstanding the defects to which we have alluded, far in advance of any English work hitherto published on the entire Pentateuch. He is familiar with the subject in all its bearings, and seems to have a perfect acquaintance with the most recent works brought out in Germany. On the theology of the Pentateuch—on the intimations given there of the plan of redemption,—his dissertations are especially able. There are, however, several subjects omitted, or passed over with a slight notice, which we expected to find fully treated of in this work: for instance, the great questions connected with the table of nations in Gen. x., and the historical credibility of the narratives of the Patriarchs, on which Hävernicks is so able.

There are many contradictions alleged to be found in the Pentateuch which Mr. Macdonald does not discuss. He only reviews the more important of them. We may fairly argue with Mr. Macdonald, that "if contradictions do actually exist of the gross character alleged, they furnish arguments in favour only of the 'Fragment-Hypothesis' of Vater, now acknowledged on all hands to be untenable, and are in direct opposition to—nay, more, destructive of—the 'Complement-Hypothesis' of Tuch; for it is incredible that such contradictions, if they have any existence, should have escaped the notice of the reviser, seeing they are so palpable to modern critics."

Some of those which Mr. Macdonald selects for examination, he treats in a satisfactory manner, but others, we think, not so. Nowhere have we perceived in his work any admission that the text of the Pentateuch is anywhere corrupt, or that interpolations may have, even undesignedly, crept in. There are two extreme positions which may be taken with respect to interpolations. Some are too much inclined to explain every diffi-passage as an interpolation; others refuse to admit such a notion. We think Mr. Macdonald belongs to this latter class. In his attempt to explain away the difficulties connected with the wives of Esau, he follows Hengstenberg in considering that Anah is correctly designated as a Hivite, a Hittite, and a Horite. We admit that the term "Horite" is explicable as "a dweller in a cave," but it is too forced to explain the appellation "Hittite," on the ground that it was often applied to the Canaanites in general; for why should Elon be called a "Hittite" in both passages (Gen. xxvi. 34 and xxxvi. 2), while Anah (admitting him to be same as Beeri, which we do) is designated as a "Hittite" in the one place, and a "Hivite" in the other? We can only explain it on the idea of an early mistake of the copyist. Compare the fact that in ch. xxvi. 34, the Sam. the LXX. (cod. Alex.) and the Syriac read by mistake, "Elon the Hivite," instead of "Elon the Hittite;" whilst five Hebrew MSS. actually do read "the Hittite," instead of "the Hivite," in the passage under consideration, which solves the difficulty.

Several serious difficulties are passed over, in Mr. Macdonald's introduction, without notice. While, for instance, Mr. Macdonald is treating of the points connected with the genealogy of Jacob's sons, the catalogue of the sons of Benjamin is not mentioned; and in adopting the notion, that of the clean animals, seven individuals, and not seven pairs, came into the ark—the odd one in each case being intended for sacrifice, an idea we thought antiquated—he forgets that a contradiction is introduced into the narrative, for it is distinctly said (Gen. vii. 9) that "two and two," i.e. in pairs, there went in into the ark of all animals, &c.

We bring our remarks here to a close, thanking Mr. Macdonald for this timely contribution to Biblical science; but we trust that, in a second edition, he may modify his views on some points, and while maintaining, with ourselves, the Mosaic authorship and inspiration of the Pentateuch, he may grapple more fully with its facts than he has done in this edition.

THE HISTORY AND DESTINY OF THE WORLD AND OF THE CHURCH.*

THERE are differences among the interpreters of prophecy—differences which arise far less from the difficulty of determining what portions of Scripture are prophetic, than from the difficulty of deciding upon their application. Nothing is more natural than that it should be so. The language of prophecy is a fixed and unchangeable quantity; it is necessarily, to a considerable extent, figurative, or symbolical and enigmatical. It does not mention Rome and Russia, France and Britain, by name, any more than Constantine and Gregory, Antiochus and Napoleon. Its chronology is, with one or two exceptions, vague and undetermined; indeed, the time of any event does not appear to be marked, except the advent of the Messiah, as we find it in the Book of Daniel. And even that date is so mysteriously worded, that it does not appear to have been understood by the Jews before Christ, and was certainly not universally accepted by them. There are other periods; but they, also, are so indistinct, as to their commencement at least, that it has been utterly impossible to secure anything like harmony among interpreters in regard to them. We may be very confident about the meaning of "a time, and times, and the half of a time," about "the thousand-two-hundred-and-threescore days," and about the "thousand years." But what is the date of their commencement? Of course, a multitude are ready with an answer to this inquiry; and we might accept their response, if their answers were unequivocal and unanimous. This, however, is unfortunately far from being the case, and we find so much diversity among the respondents, that we are perplexed, if not in despair. We cannot safely follow a majority in such a case; because a theory may be popular, and yet unfounded; just as it may be correct, and yet imperfectly applied. Prophetic chronology is beset with difficulties, and anyone at all acquainted with the history of prophetic interpretation, from Hippolytus to Dr. Keith, will readily admit such to be the case. In the calculations which have been made, it is quite certain there have been many mistakes, and the experience of the world leads us to expect that such will continue to be the case, until the mystery is finished, and the prophecies are fulfilled. Apart, however, from the question of prophetic chronology, there are difficulties which must not be overlooked. As already remarked, prophetic language is a fixed quantity; but human affairs are constantly changing. The consequence is, that there are many men and events to which the language of prophecy seems applicable at different periods. Hence it is that there has been a constant succession of systems of prophetic interpretation, according as the expositors have lived in different ages. These expositors have always shown a decided disposition to apply the language of prophecy to men and occurrences of their own generation. So they have superseded one another, and we inherit the lessons which their failures have taught.

Theological opinions, also, have had their share in the matter, and it would hardly be possible to construct a system which would be accepted by the Jew, the Roman Catholic, and the Protestant. Perhaps two of these could be reconciled on some branches of prophetic inquiry, but the consent of all is to be looked for only in very rare cases, and such as relate to some of the lesser predictions. The Protestants themselves do not agree, not merely or chiefly for dogmatic reasons, perhaps, but especially in consequence of their critical principles. One holds it to be undoubted that no unfulfilled prophecy can be so understood, that we may read future history in it. To such, it is a dim and shadowy outline, in which the shapes of events to come flit ghostlike before the eyes, without precision and without substance. Another maintains that prophecies yet unfulfilled are so intelligible that by their aid we may anticipate the exact course and end of wellknown States and systems. To such, prophecy is a bright light from heaven upon the future, or even a drama, in which actors yet unborn have their exits and entrances, and play their parts. One is convinced, that some of the prophecies have a manifold, or at least a double sense, and can therefore receive more fulfilments than one—some near and others remote; another is of opinion that this view is quite untenable, and that each prediction finds its complete realisation in some one definite event or chain of events. One believes that the proper interpretation of prophecy is the literal one; another, that it is commonly a highly figurative sense, which must be adopted. Many think that numerous prophecies are designed to set forth actual and positive events, while some imagine that they rather exhibit the kind of events which will occur in certain circumstances. These facts will suffice to illustrate our opening statement, if they do not teach modesty and reserve to those who seek to understand the prophecies. It might seem needless and undesirable to bring them together, and to suggest, as we do, that their number might be increased. Our conviction, however, is, that it is well from time to time to refresh our memories, and especially when we are called upon to examine a new book in this department—a book, too, of no mean character and ordinary pretensions. We do not feel called upon to say what theory we have embraced, because our remarks upon Dr. Keith's elaborate work will be less directed to his system, than to the facts and statements which he adduces.

This volume is called "Part first," and the author informs us that it is preliminary to others, which he hopes, with Divine permission, hereafter to produce. Still it may be regarded as complete in itself, and it embodies important results, especially derived from many authorities, consulted during three successive years in the Bodleian Library.

The introduction, which is of some length, consists of an enumeration of the leading political events of this century, viewed in the light of prophecy and Providence. Having thus in a manner prepared us for the principles upon which the work is constructed, we are presented in the first chapter with an account of the symbolical prophecies of the Book of Daniel, relating to the four human monarchies and the Kingdom of God. The first of these prophecies is that of the great image seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, which image was smitten down, and destroyed by the stone cut from the mountain without hands. The second is the vision of the four beasts revealed to Daniel, and recorded in the seventh chapter of his book. After this we have an historical sketch of the four monarchies, of which the first, or Babylonian, was overthrown in the time of Daniel himself. The second, or Medo-Persian, was set up in his lifetime. The third, or Macedonian, was established by the conquests of Alexander about two hundred years later. The fourth, or Roman, succeeded to this, and may be said still to survive in its descendants. Of the details furnished by Daniel, copious illustrations are found in the records of secular history, as well as in the monuments which have been discovered in the East. Dr. Keith shows himself well acquainted with the literature of his subject, and has wisely availed himself of the results arrived at by modern explorers like Sir Henry Rawlinson. The facts thus accumulated, present us with a wonderful confirmation of the inspired authority and character of Daniel. We are quite aware that the marvellous coincidences which appear between the Book of Daniel and the events in which they find their consummation, have led some to affirm that the book was written after those events. It appears that the infidel Porphyry, in the third century, was the first to allege this; but the assertion is so ridiculous that we may well wonder to hear it repeated in our own day, and by clergymen of the Church of England. Thus Dr. Rowland Williams, in his Essay on the Biblical researches of Bunsen, following his master, unblushingly says: "Two results are clear beyond fair doubt—that the period of weeks ended in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, and that those portions of the book supposed to be specially predictive, are a history of past occurrences up to that reign." Not content with this extraordinary statement, he says: "In distinguishing the man Daniel from our Book of Daniel, and in bringing the latter as low as the reign of Epiphanes, our author only follows the admitted necessities of the case." He fortifies his position by the monstrous assertion of the German Auberlen, who says: "The spuriousness of Daniel is become an axiom in modern theology," words which he prudently quotes in the original language. Our English Porphyry goes on to justify all this mad criticism by observing: "Not only Macedonian words, such as symphonia and psanterion, but the texture of the Chaldaic, with such late forms as כִּיּוֹן and מִלֵּן , the pronominal אֲנִי and אֲנִי , having passed into אֲנִי ; and not only minute description of Antiochus's reign, but the stoppage of such description at the precise date 169 B.C., remove all philological and critical doubt as to the age of the book." We can readily understand what a bone this prophet is in the throats of our modern Rationalists, and why Dr. Williams slurs over a previous work of our author's, by intimating that it "need not be discussed." Will he say as much of the volume before us? But one word about the extract just given. Symphonia and psanterion are, no doubt, Greek words (συμφωνία and ψαλτηριον), but what right has Dr. Williams to call them Macedonian? His object is, of course, to insinuate that they came in during the continuance of the Macedonian Empire. How does he know that? The word symphonia is certainly older, because it is used by Plato as a recognised term; and it is easy to understand how foreign words might pass with the things themselves into a country like Assyria. With reference to the Chaldaic forms to which exception is taken, we may ask what Dr. Williams knows of the history of that language. The oldest written documents in the world in it, are those very documents which the Bible contains, and it is sheer presumption to say that they exhibit modern forms. To say that the pronominal \square (m) and π (h) have passed into γ (n), convicts this arrogant pretender of ignorance, for m and h are not the terminations of separate pronouns at all in the Chaldaic, and there is no proof that they ever were! How then can they have passed into n ? The truth is that n and a in the Chaldaic, correspond to m and h in the Hebrew; and it will suffice to mention this to show the capacity of our critic to conduct a philological argument. This impertinent assertion of his is well followed by the cool intimation that "the book (of Daniel) contains no predictions (!!) except by analogy and type." There is one other objection to Daniel, to which we must refer—namely, that he is not mentioned by the Son of Sirach, whom De Wette assigns to the second century B.C. A sufficient reply to this may be found in the fact, that Daniel is named at least three times by Ezekiel, and that our Lord Himself quotes one of his then unfulfilled predictions as that of "Daniel the Prophet." We conclude, therefore, by saying with Ezekiel to the Lampeter Vice-Principal, "Behold, thou art wiser than Daniel; there is no secret that they can hide from thee." (Ezek. xxviii. 3.) Wise, however, as these new critics are, they might learn something from Dr. Keith.

Our readers must pardon this discussion, which we regret we cannot venture to prolong; but the subject is of extreme importance, for if the authority of Daniel is once undermined, the evil will not stop there; we shall have to give up dearly-cherished principles, we shall have to reject portions of Ezekiel, and we shall be required to admit that our Lord has Himself been party to a literary fraud, or at least its victim.

In his sixth chapter, Dr. Keith identifies the great red dragon of the Twelfth of the Revelation with the fourth kingdom of Daniel. The process is accomplished with considerable ingenuity and a rare command of Scripture analogies, which we remark, in passing, is one of the characteristics of the book. Indeed, we are sometimes afraid that our excellent and pious author is so accustomed to the employment of scriptural formulas and phrases, that he does not always pause to ask if his application of them will stand the test of criticism. For we also are desirous of not making the sacred volume an enigma, whose ambiguous words may be pressed into any service, by making their "sound an echo to the sense." Not that in the volume before us this is often the case, nor that it is ever the case, in actual argument and reasoning. It is a danger, however, with which we are frequently brought into undesirable proximity. And here, too, we venture to make another suggestion, to the effect that a less lavish introduction of Scripture phraseology would be not seldom conducive to clearness, and still oftener would prove of immense advantage on the side of brevity. There is a necessary, an appropriate, and a comely use of texts, but it is possible to be too liberal in their citation. We fear the work before us will be considered heavy by some, very much in consequence of this profuse quotation—not for illustration, not for proof, but for convenience. There is no need for it, and as Dr. Keith writes for more classes than one, he would not do amiss to restrain his recollections of the Book he loves, or at least not to devote so large a space to extracts from it in his subsequent volumes.

In his seventh chapter, Dr. Keith proceeds with still further identifications, and shows that the same things are predicted in the following passages: Dan. vii. 8; Rev. xiii. 11; Rev. xvii.; Dan. xi. 36; 2 Thess. ii.; 1 Tim. iv. 1. Besides giving a careful outline of these prophetic intimations, he places them before us in a table which exhibits their harmony, and indicates a few points to show how they find their embodiment and realisation in the Papal system. Having arrived at this stage, he goes at once into what may be called his subject, and illustrates from Romish authorities the soundness of his principles. So grave an accusation as has been already more than implied, demands no mistakeable evidence. Obscure and farfetched analogies alone will not prove the Romish Church to be described and condemned by express words of Scripture dictated by the prophetic spirit. Resemblances are not identity. We ask for such clear and pointed correspondences as will leave us without any moral doubt about the matter. We do not want the materials of history new-modelled and fashioned to meet the exigencies of the prophetic school, who say that Rome is what God has so warned the world of. It has often been said, by those skilful moulders and fashioners of old facts for modern purposes—the Popish advocates—that Protestants have miswritten and distorted history, and that to apply these prophecies to them is a libel and foul calumny. This being the case, we like the plan of our author, in going to Romish sources for his information, and giving chapter and verse throughout for all he says. But we hope all his references have been verified, for if any of them are erroneous, he may rely upon it the Jesuit agents will come down upon him, “like a wolf on the fold.” Precautions of this kind are all the more necessary, that editions of the same book differ from each other. Perhaps an author has written something which the eagle eye of the inquisitors has detected and adjudged “offensive,” and it has been found necessary to alter it. Owing to this cause, some books have been almost entirely rewritten, and others have had a leaf cancelled here and there, so that they come to us in an altered form, except on rare occasions. The extent to which this purgation has been carried, may be inferred from editions of the “Index Expurgatorius,” in which the very words condemned are sometimes given and always minutely described. One of our old writers, Dr. James, has written a book to show to what extent the Papists have corrupted and altered ancient writers, and even the Bible itself. Let them alter. Enough will remain to show the fearful abominations, the awful impieties, the gross cruelty, the profane arrogance, by which this HOLY Church has been distinguished. From the stores at his command, our author has quoted largely; giving the original words, and translating them when in Latin, except they can be abridged. It is curious what leviathan efforts were made, in the sixteenth century, to suppress the Bible, especially in living languages. Several specimens of the documents issued with this intention are given, in one of which we notice, among prohibited books, “all Bibles and all New Testaments, in whatever vulgar tongue” they may be. Dr. Keith may well say, after his abundant extracts, that “any declamation or special pleading would be a tax on patience, and wholly out of place.”

The Eleventh of Daniel is similarly dealt with, as well as other portions of inspired prophecy, including important parts of the Apocalypse; but we cannot go into the particulars. Suffice it to say that we never saw such an abundance of research brought to bear upon these inquiries, and that this volume will appropriately take its place as a perfect storehouse of valuable and authentic materials—all the more valuable that they are derived from Romish authorities, in the shape of books, coins, medals, and other unquestionable authorities. Intelligent and unbiassed readers will be greatly profited by the perusal of this work, even if they have no definite prophetic system like that of the author. The whole Church owes him a debt of gratitude for the zeal and learning with which he has accomplished his weighty undertaking, so far; and there are many who will join with us in devout and sincere aspirations for the prolongation of his useful life. It is possible that some will even yet not be fully satisfied that the prophecies, here illustrated, find their sole and complete accomplishment in the systems and institutions alleged. But even they must admit that such systems and things are what these predictions alike foretell and condemn; that, therefore, Popery is anticipated by the Scriptures of truth, and is opposed to them.

We cannot conclude without expressing our obligations to the venerable author, for the patience and pains which he has displayed in the compilation of this deeply interesting volume; our earnest hope that it may prove of permanent service to the cause of truth; and our desire that as many of our readers as possible will examine and study it for themselves.

Foreign Intelligence.

Two eminent persons—one a Roman Catholic, the other a Protestant—figure in our French correspondence, but neither of them to his advantage: we refer to Count de Montalembert and M. Guizot. The fierce attack of the former on Count Cavour is unworthy of his high reputation, and is a melancholy proof of the extent to which, under the influence of religious rancour, a man's passions can blind his understanding. Equally unworthy of the latter is the false liberality by which he seeks to uphold, or, at least, laments the approaching downfall of, that priestly domination, which has been the greatest political curse that ever oppressed a civilized nation. While some of the Popish priests are insulting the Emperor and his Government by their violent politics, others are creating a great public scandal, and giving employment to the criminal courts by their gross immoralities. The letter closes with a general résumé of the anniversaries of the different Protestant societies in Paris. Our second French article contains the document of which we spoke last month, exhibiting the basis of the Alliance recently formed among the Free Churches of French-speaking countries.

It will be noticed with pleasure that systematic efforts are now commenced for promoting the work of evangelization in Naples. We shall, no doubt, receive still further information as it proceeds; in the meantime, we commend this hopeful beginning to the prayers and assistance of our readers.

Both our letters from Germany will be read with interest. In each of them further particulars will be found relating to the religious state of the Elberfeld Orphan School, and the injudicious interference, as we cannot but deem it, of the municipal authorities. The latter half of the second gives the German view of the Holstein and Schleswig question under its religious aspect. As we last month presented the Danish view, given by a respected correspondent of that country, impartiality induces us to insert the present. Our readers will form their own opinion.

In our Asiatic intelligence a curious and interesting paper will be found on the Mohammedan law, which is designed to regulate the manner in which Moslems are to treat unbelievers. It will be seen from it how immense the difficulties are which stand in the way of the late Hatti-Humayoun of the present Sultan. We direct attention also to a remarkable letter from Marash, a city at the southern foot of the Taurus, describing the delightful progress of the missionary work among its population. And an article on the past and present of Christianity in the Empire of Japan, compiled from the recent valuable work of the Bishop of Victoria, will repay perusal.

From other parts of the world interesting letters will be found in the following pages, some of them still dwelling on the work of prayer and its blessed results.

We have also given a page or two, designed to show the state of feeling among the religious portion of the community in the Northern part of the United States, under the existing disastrous circumstances of that country. It would be altogether beyond our province to indulge in any criticisms or speculations on the political causes of the war, or its political aspects, and probable political consequences. And we fear, in the present position of parties, and the intense excitement universally prevalent among all classes, there is little chance that the "still small voice" of Christian remonstrance would obtain a hearing, should it attempt to speak. The true Christian Church, on both sides of the blue waters, can only betake itself to prayer; but this, we trust, it will do. Why should not the Evangelical Alliance call upon all its members at least—and through them it may influence a very large proportion of the devout people of this country—to offer at such a time special, united, public prayer for their American brethren, and that it would please God to turn away the hearts of that great community from this unnatural and fratricidal war? If friendly human Governments find no opportunity to interpose and say to the contending parties, "Let there be no strife, for ye are brethren," we know that God can say it to them, and say it in such a manner as should make the sword drop from their hands. Let Christians at this crisis again try the efficacy of prayer.

FRANCE.

Paris, May, 1861.

LETTER OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF TOURS TO THE MINISTER OF WORSHIP.

The circular of the Minister of Justice, mentioned in my previous letter (p. 225), has excited great discontent amongst the Romanist bishops of our country. These reverend personages claim the right of intermeddling in all the affairs of the State, but they do not allow the State to occupy itself with the discourses or the acts of their Church. More than this, they are accustomed to exercise an unlimited liberty. Their constant maxim is to impose upon their adversaries every species of restriction and hindrance, but not to tolerate the slightest restraint upon themselves. This is convenient; but is it just?

The Archbishop of Tours has judged it becoming to address to the Minister of Worship, a letter in opposition to the circular of the Minister of Justice; that is, he essays to place one member of the Cabinet in opposition to another, and to stir up a quarrel between these two colleagues. The procedure is stimulating, but it will not succeed. The two advisers of the Emperor will not give the clergy the satisfaction of disputing with each other before all France.

The prelate, in addressing the Minister of Worship, employs haughty, and even menacing language. He affirms, at the outset, that the authority of the priesthood is independent of the opinion of men, and that it will not be abased in the eyes of the people by the suspicions of the civil power. He then declares that the bishops have fulfilled the most sacred of duties in zealously defending the cause of the Pope. Be it so; but was it necessary, in order to maintain that cause, to hurl atrocious slanders at King Victor Emmanuel, Count Cavour, and the Emperor of the French himself, and to pronounce implacable anathemas against the Revolution of 1789—against the laws, the ideas, and the morals of the nineteenth century? The Archbishop of Tours recalls to memory the fall of Napoleon I., and he attributes this catastrophe to the groanings of millions of (Roman) Catholic hearts, who prayed in secret for the deliverance of Pius VII., then a captive at Fontainebleau. He adds that if the temporal authority of the Papacy were overthrown, France and its Government would be responsible for this prodigious misfortune. "All men," says he, "who, nearly or remotely, shall have contributed to that overthrow—princes, ministers, captains, diplomatists, writers—will be noted in history as having taken part in the most criminal and the most barbarous act of our times. Then will commence the judgments of God." This, in terms sufficiently clear, is a warning to Napoleon III. The Emperor is solemnly premonished that, should he withdraw his troops from Rome, he will have to undergo the infliction of a terrible sentence on the part of God, and will lose his throne like Napoleon I. The Bishops and the Jesuits are well-disposed, without doubt, to aid in the accomplishment of this Divine judgment by their conspiracies, their calumnies, and their appeals to the popular classes. But men of good sense do not believe that the Lord has revealed the secrets of His designs to the Archbishop of Tours, or to any other prelate, and Napoleon III. will take his precautions against the conspiracies of the clerical party.

DISPUTE BETWEEN THE ARCHBISHOP OF CAMBRAY AND THE "CONSTITUTIONNEL."

Your readers know that some religious houses in the north of France have recently been suppressed, and that several Belgian or German monks have received orders to quit the French territory (Evangelical Christendom, pp. 226, 227). This affair has excited a lively controversy between the Archbishop of Cambray and the Constitutionnel, the organ of the Government. Naturally, this high dignitary of the Roman Church attests that these monks (Redemptorists or Capuchins) were all exemplary men—minor saints—completely devoted to the interests of souls, consecrating their time and their strength, to the edification and to the consolation of the poor. The panegyric is admirable: these fathers, by their sobriety, their charity, their humility, and other Christian virtues, had merited universal respect! Why, then, have they been visited with penalties by the civil power?

To this apology the Constitutionnel replies by adducing positive and numerous facts. The editor-in-chief of this journal had in his possession authentic documents, judicial notes, records of legal proceedings, invested with an official character. He has clearly proved that several of these monks, so disinterested and respectable, according to the Archbishop of Cambray, had committed acts of cupidity, of fraud, and even of immorality; that they came from abroad without a single cent, and had acquired, in some years, property estimated at more than 500,000 francs; that they troubled families by seductions and abductions of every kind, and that some of them had been condemned by the tribunals for odious attempts upon chastity. These revelations have greatly irritated the Ultramontane journals, which accuse the Constitutionnel of having been irreverent and insolent towards the Church. But what is to be done in such circumstances? Was it not necessary to re-establish the truth, against the false assertions of the prelate? If the Roman Church be wounded by these details (so far from edifying), whose is the fault? It should select with more care its priests and its monks, or at least have the prudence to be silent when legal justice interposes. The Government will not accept the reproach of iniquity for acts rendered necessary by the interests of morality. Note one curious episode of this debate. The Constitutionnel had asserted that many respectable country curés approved the expulsion of these intriguing and avaricious monks, who usurped the exercise of the holy ministry. The Archbishop of Cambray replied that all the ecclesiastics of his diocese held the same sentiments as himself, and challenged the Constitutionnel to give names. This was a mere mockery. The Government journal had reasons only too substantial for not complying with the insidious demand of the prelate. Does not all the world know that the poor pariah priests are absolutely dependent on the good pleasure of their bishop, and that one record from Monsieur would suffice to throw them into the streets, homeless and starving? How then could the Constitutionnel have given names? Let the priests first have solid guarantees against episcopal despotism, and we shall then see if their sentiments are not often opposed to those of the chiefs of the Papal hierarchy.

PAMPHLET OF COUNT DE MONTALEMBERT.

Ecclesiastico-political pamphlets continue to multiply. All the Ultramontanes and high Catholics desire to show their zeal for the good cause, and with this praiseworthy design they accumulate attacks, invectives, and imprecations against the founders of Italian unity. It would be really difficult to give you an exact idea of these libels. Never has human passion—never has fanaticism had recourse to more violent outrages, or epithets more opprobrious. The palm belongs, I regret to say, to the Count de Montalembert. He has just published two letters to Count Cavour, which surpass all that it is possible to imagine in the excess both of thought and of expression. M. de Montalembert is a singular personage. He certainly has sincere convictions, a noble character, and good intentions. In certain conflicts he has advocated religious and civil liberty, and braved the rigours of imprisonment in order to defend what he considered just and good. But he is incapable of regarding a question under its different aspects, and of discussing it with calmness. His understanding wants comprehensiveness, and his pen reserve. As an orator or a writer, he goes constantly beyond the mark, confounding anger with logic, and thinking to be strong when he is passionate and extravagant.

His letters to Count Cavour seem to have been composed in an excess of fever heat, in the midst of the phantoms of a diseased imagination. For example, he accuses the first minister of Victor Emmanuel of having violated natural law, public law, and Christian law—of being a persecutor, a spoiler, a barbarian, a man stained by the most monstrous crimes, a being worse than a regioidé, &c. To what does all this amount? To the philippic of a madman—the diatribe of a fool? Cannot Count de Montalembert comprehend that by these unheard-of excesses of language he is completing the ruin of the cause which he professes to serve?

In the same pamphlet he predicts to the Italians that they will share the fate of the Jews—yes, of the Jews! As the children of Israel were decimated, dispersed, sold into slavery, oppressed over all the face of the earth, after they had immolated the God-man, so the Italians, because they crucify the vicar of Jesus Christ, will see their cities burnt, their families slaughtered; a cry of malediction will go up against them, from the shores of Ireland to those of Australia; the entire human family will arouse itself for their extermination, and the miserable remnant of the Italian nation will be wanderers and vagabonds upon the face of the globe—witnesses of the vengeance of the Lord! Alas! alas! for the noble Count de Montalembert, who has written and published such things under the dominion of an incredible mental aberration! At no period of his life has he fallen so low!

A SPEECH OF M. GUIZOT.

A man who greatly surpasses M. de Montalembert by his genius, his maturity, and the constant sobriety of his speech (M. Guizot), has, nevertheless, produced great discontent amongst his co-religionists by the speech which he pronounced, as President of the Protestant Society for Elementary Instruction. I will presently speak of our religious anniversaries, but I must place this fact by itself, and note it specially, inasmuch as it has produced a great sensation in political circles, as well as in the ranks of the Protestants.

The meeting took place at the Oratoire, the principal Protestant church of Paris. Many pastors and members of consistories were on the platform. The object of the sitting was to report the progress of Protestant schools, and the difficulties they had had to surmount. M. Guizot had been invited, as in previous years, to occupy the chair. This was an honour due to his illustrious name and his long services. What was the general astonishment when the celebrated orator testified his solicitude and even his sympathies for the temporal power of the Papacy! I will quote his own words: "A lamentable disturbance assails and afflicts a considerable portion of the great and general Christian Church. I say a lamentable disturbance, and this is my own opinion, which I have it on my heart to express. Whatever may be the differences or even the separations amongst us, we all are Christians, and brethren of all Christians. The security, the dignity, the liberty of all the Christian Churches is important to Christianity as a whole. Be assured, gentlemen, that Christianity in its entirety will suffer when great Christian Churches suffer; it is the entire Christian edifice which in our days is assailed by the blows that attack one or another of the great constructions which compose it. Under such circumstances, we owe to all the great Christian Churches our sympathy."

Certainly, M. Guizot is free to think that the interests of Protestantism are connected with those of the temporal dominion of the Pope—he may think, if he please, that Christianity, in its entirety, is involved in that question. But had he the right to express such an opinion whilst presiding over a Protestant society? Non erat hic locus. No logical tie connects the affairs of Rome with the elementary instruction of Protestants. This utterance was evidently, on the part of the great orator, a political, rather than a religious manifestation. The pastors, moreover, have unanimously protested against the words of M. Guizot; they have publicly declared that they do not, in any way, accept the responsibility of his sentiments; and some laymen (amongst others, M. Coulmann, Vice-President of the Society of Elementary Instruction) have employed the medium of the political press to make known their disapprobation.

In fact, if the Pope should lose his States and his civil government, what harm could ensue to those communions which originated with the Reformation of the sixteenth century? Would not Luther and Calvin have been greatly astonished had any one told them that their own faith was interested in the maintenance of the Roman Pontiff as an earthly king? "The Papal Church is a part of the great Christian Church." We may admit that in certain respects and with numerous reservations; but has the Papal Church itself any absolute need that its spiritual head should exercise a political and civil sovereignty? We will not go further into this debate. M. Guizot has committed a fault much to be regretted, and the conscience of French Protestantism has probably convinced even himself of this fact.

RELIGIOUS ANNIVERSARIES AT PARIS—BIBLE TRACT EVANGELIZATION AND MISSIONARY SOCIETIES, &C.

I now come to our annual religious assemblies. On this head I shall be very brief, because the details are almost always the same, and have but little interest for the readers of foreign countries. In general, there is progress—progress in the receipts of our Christian institutions; progress in the experience and the devotedness of the members of committees; progress in the blessing which accompanies their labours. There is an immense work to be done; we are yet hardly at the commencement of our great task; but, thanks to God, the way is open; the labourers are active and numerous; and, if we are faithful, we may hope for more remarkable success.

The French and Foreign Bible Society has distributed, during the last twelve months, 12,440 Bibles, and 79,377 New Testaments. Its receipts, from voluntary contributions, and from the sale of the sacred books, have amounted to 64,290*l*. During the same period, the Protestant Bible Society has put into circulation 4,971 Bibles, and 11,604 New Testaments. Within eighteen years, three millions of copies of the Word of God have been disseminated in France, principally with the aid of the British and Foreign Bible Society. These are delightful facts; but we must not forget that the spiritual wants of a nation of thirty-six millions of souls are far from being yet overtaken.

The Religious Tract Society pursues with ardour its useful mission. 1,103,000 copies of its little works have been issued from the depôts of the committee. Amongst the new publications which compose the Family Library we note a Life of Luther, and a Life of Admiral Coligny. The society has offered prizes for a Life of Calvin. The biographical works, written in a popular style, are eagerly received, and find numerous readers, because they show the power of the doctrines of the Gospel under a living form. The monthly magazine, published by the committee, under the name of The Friend of Youth, has nearly 10,000 subscribers. This is a large number for our Protestant population.

The Evangelical Society of France employs eleven ministers of the Gospel, forty-one male and female teachers, and other agents. It has received 157,441*fr.*, and expended 131,387*fr.*, so that a part of the old deficiency has been overtaken. The committee have sent into the different quarters of Paris, and into the adjacent cantons, itinerant evangelists, who go from house to house, from family to family, to read and to explain the Scriptures, giving also exhortations in a simple popular style. This method has produced excellent effects. The Evangelists are habitually well received. The society has still to lament some acts of intolerance. More than one Protestant chapel or school continues to be shut up without any valid reason. Nevertheless, the rights of religious liberty are beginning to be better understood, and more respected. In proportion as the Government meets with more decided hostility from the Romanist clergy, it evinces better dispositions towards the Protestants.

The Society for Evangelical Missions is in a prosperous condition. The receipts for the year have been 168,608*fr.*, and the expenses 167,186*fr.* Two French missionaries have left for China, where they will act as chaplains to the soldiers of our communion, and, at the same time, co-operate with the English and American missionaries in the evangelization of the native population. Two other young ministers are about to go to the island of Hayti, the ancient colony of St. Domingo, where they will find a people who speak the French language. The reports respecting the missionary stations established at the south of the Cape of Good Hope, are cheering. There are here 2,000 communicants, and new candidates every day for baptism.

The Central Protestant Society for Evangelization extends its action over thirty-five departments; in other words, over more than a third of the whole French territory. It has received 116,849*fr.*, and expended 142,220*fr.* The committee maintains a preparatory school of theology, which has already furnished faithful pastors to our Churches. The scattered Protestants are not forgotten. Some of the agents make regular circuits amongst them. The work, then, advances; but the voluntary contributions are far from being sufficient.

The Sunday-school Society assembled together more than 3,000 children in the Cirque Napoleon, and about 3,000 adults were also present. It was a touching spectacle, and the hymns sung by this numerous assembly produced an overwhelming impression. The Sunday-school committee labours to multiply these useful institutions upon French soil, and finds zealous auxiliaries amongst the pastors almost everywhere.

PASTORAL CONFERENCES.

I will add a few words on the special and general Conferences. In the former, at which are present only the members of the National State Church, the question of the re-establishment of synods was earnestly discussed, and the assembly was almost unanimous for demanding that the synodal system be restored. In the general Conferences, to which the members of independent communions are admitted, the assembly investigated the subject of the true authority in matters of faith. Serious and edifying words were pronounced on this occasion.

To sum up—French Protestantism is on the advance, and may expect much for the future, whilst preserving the vital doctrines of the faith.

UNION OF THE FREE PROTESTANT CHURCHES IN FRENCH-SPEAKING CHURCHES.

Reference was made in our last number to the important fact that the Free Churches of France, Switzerland, and Belgium had entered into a formal union with each other, and we promised further information on the subject. We have now the pleasure of laying before our readers the document which sets forth the basis and terms of their union; it is as follows:—

"In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, one God blessed for ever, Amen!

"Basis of Alliance between Free or Independent Evangelical Churches: unanimously adopted by the Conference at Geneva, 1860.

"1. The Churches which enter into this Alliance with each other, professing the same faith, and animated by the same spirit, manifest and draw more closely around them in brotherly love the bonds by which they are already united, each reserving its self-government and the fulness of its individual liberty.

"2. Without wishing to substitute a new Confession of Faith for the Confessions of the Churches of the Alliance, the faith which they hold in common is exhibited in the following epitome:—

"Man is born in sin, unable to act aright in the sight of God, a child of wrath, and under the curse.—Salvation flows from the eternal and gratuitous love of the Father; it is obtained for us by the expiatory sacrifice and intercession of the Son; and is communicated by the Holy Spirit, who regenerates the sinner in uniting him to Jesus Christ by faith, and who, dwelling in him, fills his heart with peace by the assurance of the entire remission of his sins, guides and comforts him by means of the Word which Himself has given, seals and preserves him unto the day of the glorious appearing of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ.—The sinner, redeemed at so great a price, ought to glorify God in his body and in his spirit, which are God's, by growing in that holiness without which no man can see His face; and he obtains strength to do this in communion with Him who has said, 'My grace is sufficient for thee.'—The faith of the Churches agrees in all essential points with the faith of the Churches of the Reformation. Like them, we neither have, nor desire to have, any other rule than the Divinely-inspired Scriptures of the Old and New Testament.

"Both those Churches, which accept the foregoing epitome, may be received into the Alliance, and those which offer themselves with their own proper Confession: only, in the latter case, the Conference shall judge of the sufficiency of their Confession.

"3. The Churches thus abide in the communion of the universal Church of Jesus Christ, and endeavour to re-establish primitive unity, which has been changed in the same degree as the world has invaded the Church, and which can and ought to be revived in the bosom of Churches composed of disciples who submit to the Word of God, and unite themselves afresh to one another in the same faith, the same hope, and the same love.

"4. In order to the attainment of this end, two things appear to them to be necessary:—

"(i.) Each Church should be placed in circumstances in which it may be able to conform itself to all the requirements of the Word of God. It ought, therefore, in spiritual matters, to admit of no other authority than that of the Lord. This entire spiritual liberty of a Church is incompatible with the administration of its affairs by the State. But if a Church ought to render to God alone the things which belong to God, it ought, in like manner, to render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.

"(ii.) The Churches ought not to be isolated from one another, in what concerns brotherly love and Christian activity; they ought to associate for mutual edification, and to glorify their Saviour and common Head.

"5. In this spirit, and with these views, a practical Alliance—but in which the self-government (l'autonomie) of each Church remains intact—is formed between the Churches which desire to enter into it, and which comply with the following conditions:—

"(i.) Agreement in the faith, as set forth in Article 2.

"(ii.) The maintenance of a discipline conformed to the Scriptures, whether in the reception of members, or in dealing with offenders.

"(iii.) Admitting fully the universal priesthood of believers, the acknowledgment of special ministers appointed by God in His Word.

"(iv.) Active efforts, according to their ability, for the propagation of the Gospel.

"6. In questions controverted among Christians, equally sincere and submissive to the Word of God, the Allied Churches bear with each other in their comparatively secondary differences; as, for example, on the mode of baptism, and the conditions under which it ought to be administered.

"7. In allying themselves upon the basis of these principles, the Churches aim at their propagation, and at the promotion of their own piety.

"8. For this purpose they put themselves in relation with each other, by means of regular brotherly Conferences, which shall be held in places as central as possible, and at which they shall be represented by delegates.

"9. If any work proposed at the Conference, does not obtain the concurrence of all the represented Churches, it may be undertaken by those which agree in it.

"10. The Conference appoints a President, Vice-President, and one or two Secretaries, for each of its meetings.

"It also appoints, before separating, a permanent Commission of three members, charged to occupy itself with whatever concerns the Conference in the interval between one meeting and another, and to convene the next Conference, according to the resolutions adopted.

"The first Conference shall consider the mode of voting, taking into account the importance of each Church, and of each group of Churches.

"11. On the demand of three Churches, the foregoing Articles shall at any time be subject to revision."

 The nucleus of this Alliance consists of the Free Evangelical Churches of the Canton of Neuchâtel, of Geneva, of the Canton of Vaud, of France, of Berne, and of Belgium.

The permanent Commission (Art. 10) is composed of Professor Laharpe and Pastors Guers and Derolet; with M. C. Cremieux, of Geneva, as Adjunct.

ITALY.

SOCIETY FOR AIDING NEAPOLITAN EVANGELIZATION.

This society—considering that the present moment is highly favourable for the diffusion of Evangelical truth, and for the prosecution of Christian effort in Naples—proposes to collect pecuniary subscriptions from Protestants of every communion, who are desirous of becoming associated with such operations. It is intended not so much to direct as to aid, by furnishing indispensable assistance, the Italian Evangelists who have already begun to labour by preaching, and by the sale and distribution of the Bible, and who are about to attempt establishing schools, infant classes, and other institutions, based upon Scripture teaching—to support two preachers, who, for some time past, have gathered eager audiences desirous of knowing the truth, and to train others for conducting services to be commenced hereafter—to hire halls for places of worship, and apartments for boarding, and, perhaps, elementary schools—to pay the masters engaged in teaching in these institutions, under the immediate inspection of some person possessing our confidence—to translate and print some good controversial and practical works. Such is the manifold object which the society proposes to itself, and which it will prosecute in proportion to the resources with which it may be entrusted. At the present moment, men are much less required than means. It is the evidence of existing wants, and of the necessity of giving a firm support to Christians—whom isolation has hitherto reduced to helplessness, notwithstanding their commendable wish to spread the knowledge of the Gospel—that has imposed upon us the duty of combining to undertake this difficult task. We cherish the confidence that God will help us. We hope that he will put into the hearts of our brethren in Christ a generous desire to promote, by contributions of all kinds, the religious instruction of a country hitherto closed to the Gospel.

Contributions will be received direct by the treasurers of the society, Messrs. Rogers and Co., bankers, Naples; or through the medium of Messrs. Williams, Deacon, and Co., London; or Messrs. Hottinguer and Co., Paris. If any persons desire to devote their offerings specially to the support of some one branch of our operations—preaching, schools, or Christian literature—we shall be happy to comply with their wishes.

R. STRANGE, Dr., President.
H. BOURAIGNON, Secretary.
R. ROGERS, Treasurer.
T. ROLLER, Pastor.
A. BULWER.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Sirs,—In sending you the above programme, I venture to appeal to your Christian zeal to make known our society to the readers of Evangelical Christendom, and especially to insert the subjoined statement:—

"There is at Naples, as in the rest of Italy, a great thirst for whatever is new, and a real, though undecided, movement towards a better state of religious feeling. Some to get rid of a clergy with whom they are at variance upon political questions, others because they have lost all belief in Roman Catholicism, and yet others, prompted by their zeal and felt religious wants, come to us to make inquiries, and listen to what we have to say, to purchase our Bibles and our controversial books, and to enter, more or less, into a reformation current. They have not yet arrived at the idea of organising themselves into a Church, but you may be sure that they speedily will do so. Some of these persons have assiduously attended the Gavazzi lectures; others, more serious, listen to the Marquis de Cressi, who preaches to them the Gospel in all its simplicity. A new champion is, without doubt, about to enter into the contest; this is the advocate Albarilla, a man distinguished as an orator, and who has already preached in Piedmont. Some priests have arrived, and are translating for us some religious tracts. We have recently printed two pamphlets—one upon Romish infallibility, and the other the 'Windmill without Sails,' of Puaux. We feel the necessity of increasing the number of religious tracts—both controversial and instructive. The tracts of Puaux, amongst others, have great prospect of being read with avidity, and they are well translated, with those alterations which differences of locality require, and which can be made only here, by persons well acquainted with Italian manners. We are about to open a school for poor children, on a thoroughly Evangelical basis. Already fifty little girls are enrolled. The institution bears the name of the Garibaldi Asylum. A similar step, if the funds be sufficient, will shortly be taken for boys. For the moment, indeed, what we most need is money. We are paralysed for want of sufficient resources. Naturally, we cannot expect much from the Neapolitans. The foreigners settled at Naples are generous, but few in number. It is thus needful that we should address ourselves to our brethren of England. We know that neither their Christian zeal, nor their liberality, will fail us. It would be cause for great regret were the first religious movement which has been originated in these countries for three centuries impeded by those material difficulties which money can so easily remove. May God, then, put into the hearts of our brethren a greater love for souls, and great zeal for the interests of the Evangelical faith!"

GERMANY.

THE PROTESTANTS OF AUSTRIA—THE REVIVAL AT THE ELBERFELD ORPHAN ASYLUM—MORAL CONDITION OF BERLIN.

When Austria and religious liberty are in question, I can well understand that one cannot avoid a sort of distrust. Your remark in the last number of Christendom seems to me, therefore, very natural: "We can scarcely believe that we are not suffering under some illusion when we read that, by a recent enactment, all the subjects of the Austrian Empire are equal in the eye of the law, all qualified for office in the State, all free in the exercise of their worship." For my own part, I remarked, in my last letter, upon the difference between a written law and the sincere exercise of that law in a country accustomed to spiritual and political despotism, and which remains under the influence of an intolerant clergy, who think they are justified in employing any means whatever to neutralise the operation of the law, and to profit by that country's fanaticism. But as to the law itself, as to the Imperial Patent, published on the 8th of April, it has indeed the import of the terms quoted above. It only remains for me to quote a few facts which have subsequently taken place, and which prove that everybody—the Government, the Protestants, and the Roman Catholics—thus understand it.

The Government: The Vienna Presse, under date of May 1, says: "M. von Schmerling has addressed to the prefecture of Brünn a circular, in which he expressly enjoins the Government representatives to execute and enforce the law relating to Protestants, in all special cases, in such a manner as shall be in harmony with the gracious intentions of the Legislature. He directs them to put in full and entire activity the principle of absolute religious equality in the eye of the law. Doubtless, for the moment, this refers only to existing denominations; but if the principle is admitted and practised, its necessary results will follow. How can equality before the laws be withheld from Protestants in a country where the Grand Chancellor for Hungary, Baron Vay, is a Protestant?"

The Protestants: They immediately set to work to reconstitute their Churches in harmony with the principles of the law, and upon the basis of the election of their functionaries. They also sent to M. Schmerling a deputation, charged to present to him a memorandum, in which they claim the express abolition of all the laws of the empire and all the clauses of the Concordat, which contain so many vexatious regulations against Protestant communions. This could not be refused without rendering the Imperial Patent illusory and ridiculous. Accordingly, the First Minister went so far as to say to the deputation that, "to the Protestants of Austria belongs the great and noble mission of reconciling Germany and Austria." These words clearly show that the Minister felt—what is quite true—that nothing has tended to lower and discredit Austria, in the eyes of Germany, more than the ratification of the Concordat, which, by crushing Protestantism and liberty, delivered all the moral and intellectual power of the empire over to the Jesuits.

The Roman Catholics: The Emperor's Patent carried trouble and anger into every camp of the Ultramontanes; it has therefore been understood and dreaded by them. In the Tyrol, especially, it has created unspeakable commotion. The provincial diet, prompted by the Bishop of Brixen and the priests, voted a resolution for maintaining throughout the province all the old intolerant laws which deprived Protestants of the right of becoming proprietors, exercising their worship, &c., &c. The priests published this news to the people with ringing of bells: from all the pulpits were heard fanatical discourses; there was universal rejoicing. The Archduke, the Governor of the province, thanked the Diet for its vote, and the Liberal party in the Tyrol were everywhere overridden by the bigots, thus intoxicated with success. But it was forgotten that the new constitutional régime, so pompously inaugurated the other day by the Emperor, in his opening speech to the Landtag or Parliament, was now in force. At the first sitting of the Chamber of Deputies, a member interrogated the Minister, asking him what measures he was about to take against the Diet of the Tyrol, and against the Archduke, who had approved of its proceedings. To stifle in its cradle the Constitution, in which he has beheld the sole means of saving the empire, would be to the Minister nothing less than political suicide.

In short, the state of Protestantism in Austria may be thought and spoken of thus: The religious liberty of the Protestants, and their civil equality before the law, is legally achieved and possessed. But the exercise of it will only be obtained upon two conditions: first, that the rights in question are energetically claimed, without shrinking from the struggles in which it is necessary to engage against the intolerance of the priests and the ill-will of the subordinate authorities; secondly, that the free and constitutional system, which has just been inaugurated, should be lasting and become developed; for if a political reaction should break forth, and remain victorious, it would destroy these commencements of religious liberty, with liberty of every kind. Then despotism would be the harsher, as it has seen itself forced to yield to necessity. It is therefore for the Parliament of Vienna that the Churches of Austria should offer their supplications. And the duration of this Parliament, again, depends upon the destinies of the Papacy and the liberty of Italy.

I mentioned at the time a remarkable revival at the Elberfeld Orphan Asylum, and the gross intolerance with which the municipal council laid hands upon the work, to crush it. The dismissal of the personal staff of the establishment, an official investigation, solemn interrogatories addressed to the children—nothing in the inquisitorial process was omitted. If a crime had been committed, they could not have acted differently. More than one of these poor children, under the apprehension of being interrogated, said, we are assured, that they had only shown signs of being affected by the revival, because they imitated others; but the greater number of those who had exhibited, first, sorrow for sin, and then peace from the Saviour, positively declared that nothing could make them abandon their convictions. As the first excitement fades into the distance, the more evident it becomes, to every enlightened Christian, that the work in question is of God's Spirit. This it is which has been lately recognised in a pamphlet by a learned theologian, who, in principle, is little favourable to revivals. This it is especially which has been just declared by the provincial synod of Elberfeld. That ecclesiastical body, composed of pastors and of laymen elected by the Churches, has adopted, by vote, the following resolution: "The synod expresses its profound sorrow that a religious movement among the children of the Orphan-house of this city, which must be considered essentially as a revival, has been treated by the municipal authorities in such a manner that its religious character has been disregarded, and the most important interests of the Evangelical Churches have been violated." The opinion thus courageously and faithfully expressed, by a synod which is very highly respected, has made a profound impression upon the public. This has been felt by the municipal council, for it has endeavoured to weaken that impression by a resolution in justification of its conduct, which justifies nothing. But God has more powerful means still than synodal resolutions, by which to render testimony to the work of His Spirit; He proves the reality of a revival by other greater revivals, not merely among children, but amid adults, who are raised from the depths of physical and moral misery, that they may glorify the grace of God.

How welcome would be such an evidence of the presence of God in the capital of Prussia, to assuage the chagrin and sorrow which it has called forth! For some time past, day after day, week after week, there has appeared in the journals the names of superior functionaries of the police, who have fallen into the hands of justice. I suppose that these lamentable facts are known to your readers through the public prints. They reveal, in certain circles of society at Berlin, a moral condition still more lamentable. That there should be found quite a set of gentlemen, occupying high places in the service of the State (the latest offender held the grade of colonel), who should lower themselves by doing that which the law designates as crimes—why? for money—is what could scarcely have been expected even from that Berlin, so well known for the impiety and immorality which there prevail in certain regions. Would that the catastrophes which thus appal and sadden society might have a powerful voice, preaching that Gospel which can alone render man the master of his lusts, and emancipate him from their slavery! “If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed.”

THE REVIVAL IN THE ELBERFELD ORPHANAGE—THE PRUSSIAN HOUSE OF DEPUTIES—THE LATE KING FREDERICK WILLIAM'S IDEAS OF CHURCH CONSTITUTION—STATE OF THE CHURCH IN SCHLESWIG.

Berlin, May 15, 1861.

The religious revival in the Municipal Orphanage at Elberfeld has not yet ceased to be a subject of public discussion. Your readers are aware (see Evangelical Christendom, for April, page 176) that the director of the institution, under whom these revivals took place, was dismissed from office by the municipal authority. The management of the institution has for a time been entrusted to a Mr. Bouterweck. This gentleman, assisted by some physicians, has instituted an inquiry among the awakened children, and sent in his report. He declares that thirteen boys and one girl have confessed that their convulsions had been a work of dissimulation, to avoid going to school, to be allowed to remain longer in bed, &c., &c. Six other boys and five girls have been accused by their companions of the same deceit. No inquiry into the state of the rest of the children was made, from fear of causing an injurious effect on the general morality. And it was stated, as the judgment of the whole provisional committee of management, that the majority of the children had dissimulated convulsions, and that another part had been affected with the same bodily prostration either from fear or contagion. You will easily imagine that this declaration has made a great sensation among faithful Christians.

The question was asked, with great indignation, how it could be justified to subject children to such an inquiry on the most sacred emotions of their hearts, when it was clear at the outset that such an ill-judged inquiry must have greatly demoralised the hearts of children, who had just been aroused by the deepest impressions! Who knows not, that it is an easy task to confound, especially children, by a severe cross-examination, and to make them say what one wishes? Above all, however, suppose that fourteen children should have dissimulated, there remain yet twenty-eight children who have not made this confession, seventeen of whom are not even accused by their companions. A yet greater number have been awakened without the accompanying convulsions; not a word is said of them in the report; nor can there be found any ground of suspicion against them? However, the possibility of the revival having been the result of hypocrisy, is removed by the unanimous opinion of seven pastors of Elberfeld, who have closely watched a great number of the awakened children during the time of instructing them preparatory to their confirmation. They have declared that there had taken place among them, especially among the most disorderly and disobedient, a salutary change in their whole life and conduct. It is much to be regretted that the whole movement, from the very beginning, was kept from the co-operation and supervision of the clergy, who, by their advice, might have warded off the unhealthy exuberances, and thus have prevented the unfortunate turn of the cause. The district synod of Elberfeld, in their meeting of April 30th, have adopted almost unanimously—with but one dissentient vote—the following resolution:—

“The district synod express their profound regret that the municipal authorities have proceeded against an extraordinary religious movement among the children of the Town Orphanage (which must be regarded as essentially an awakening), in such a manner as to ignore the religious character of the movement, and to wound the deepest religious interests of the Evangelical community." At the same time, seven pastors of Elberfeld have drawn up a statement, containing indisputable testimonies of the favourable change in the awakened children, which throws much light upon the matter.

The Rationalistic party in the Protestant Church—who, united with the liberal political party, succeeded in some States of Southern Germany (Baden and the Palatinate) in effecting the removal of several of the orthodox members from the ecclesiastical authorities, in order to prepare the way and to open a door by which Rationalism might enter into the Church—has recently made an effort to show its colours in the Prussian House of Deputies. However, its attempts were frustrated by an overwhelming majority, by whom it was affirmed that, according to the Prussian Constitution, the Church was independent, and that the civil authorities had no right whatever to interfere in her internal affairs. For this important result in the Chambers we are indebted to the decided course of Freiherr von Fische, who has a warm heart for the Evangelical Church, and who with great effect declared, that his Church stood too high and was too sacred to be allowed to be dragged into political debates; that it was a precious right of the Evangelical Church that its affairs could not be brought before the judgment (forum) of the House, where Romanists and Jews would have a right to decree and to sit in judgment on her.

A book, recently published by Dr. Richter, the celebrated Professor of Ecclesiastical-law, has been received with intense interest, as it contains several articles written by the late King Frederick William IV., on Evangelical Church Constitution. It is not unknown that the extensive theological studies of the late King referred especially to the department of Church history. These studies led him above all to the age of the apostles, when so rich and fresh a life animated the young Church. It was his ideal, that we should have again such apostolically-constituted churches, small church-districts, each one independent, under the government of elders, the oldest of whom, the bishop (primus inter pares), should associate with himself others, deacons, ordained by the bishop and the elders of the congregation, taking part in the Church-government. Each of these smaller ecclesiastical circles (this was the hope of the writer) should develop itself to perfect independence of Christian life; the bishops being only so far in communion with each other as the ordination of elders of other churches required their general consent. This is not the place for entering into arguments or criticisms of this view. It is merely intended to give to your readers a new proof of the zeal and interest with which the late King bore the cause of the Evangelical Church upon his heart. According to his own expression, it was his highest desire that God might permit him to transfer his authority of summus episcopus into "the right hands," and by these "right hands" he meant nothing else than such apostolic churches.

At this point of my letter I may mention that the address, presented to the Queen Dowager of Prussia by the Committee of the British branch of the Evangelical Alliance has, by its warmth and Christian sympathy, produced a most beneficial impression in every part of the country, and has been the means of awakening a new interest in the Evangelical Alliance.

THE CHURCH QUESTION IN SCHLESWIG.

The interest of German Christians in the condition of the German Church of the Duchy of Schleswig has been greatly increased by several important and valuable articles, which appeared in the organ of the German branch of the Evangelical Alliance. (See Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, Nos. 17-20). They are from the pen of a man who is an authority on this point. You, Messrs. Editors, have allowed, in the May number of Evangelical Christendom, some space to a correspondent from Denmark, who regards the matter from a very different point of view. Convinced of the impartiality with which, in your influential organ, you have so often granted to different views an equal right of discussion, I have no doubt that you will allow me some space for a few observations. I have no intention of putting the question on a political ground (the author also of the above-mentioned articles most distinctly guards himself against this view, as if he desired in any way a separation of Schleswig from Denmark). I will speak of exclusively religious interests, which, even for those who differ from us in politics, must be neutral ground, as long as they are one in love to our common Heavenly Master. It will be interesting, especially to your English readers—whose indefatigable activity and zeal in the cause of religious liberty throughout the world is not the least of their excellences among the nations of the earth—to know the view of German Christians in this matter. They will then be able to form an impartial judgment. I will not enter into general reasonings (raisonnements), but limit myself to the communication of some facts, extracted from the articles referred to, for the credibility and reliableness of which I can most conscientiously vouch.

The close fraternal intercourse which formerly existed among the clergy of Schleswig and Holstein has become almost an impossibility. Every pastor from Schleswig requires a special permit, if he wishes to cross the frontiers. This is strange, when one considers that for many centuries the closest political and ecclesiastical union has existed between Schleswig and Holstein. The clergy of Holstein are, however, not bound by this order. The united pastoral conferences of Schleswig-Holstein have been discontinued. In the same way all those societies are interdicted, not merely the political, but also the literary, scientific, industrial, and especially the religious, which were formerly carried on by Schleswig and Holstein in common; the Bible Society, the Missionary Society, and the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, are among this number. Even the independent associations in which is found the slightest moral connexion with Germany, are not tolerated in Schleswig, however free they may be of any political tendency in character. The candidates of theology of South Schleswig, though they dare no longer frequent the University of Kiel (which is the common university for Schleswig and Holstein)—though they undergo the half-Danish half-German examination at Flensburg (which was formerly entirely held in the German language for both Schleswig and Holstein candidates)—have no chance of obtaining a charge in their part of the country (South), unless they offer the Government some guarantee that they will assist in suppressing the German language and German customs. Those who have a spark of honourable feeling must naturally revolt at such regulations. They are placed therefore in Holstein, to the injury of Holstein candidates, who, of course, are not appointed to any charge in Schleswig. A good many obnoxious (i.e. German) pastors of Schleswig are appointed to charges in Holstein, and Danes are put into their places. With regard to the line of demarcation of languages, I may add, that Danish officials and Danish pastors have been sent in numbers to congregations, in which, up to the year 1850, the language spoken was exclusively or predominantly the German. It is easily understood how the people look down upon men who lend themselves to robbing the sanctuary of the old venerable language of devotion in church, school, and house; and to preaching and teaching in a language which is not understood by the people. The people of Schleswig were formerly known for their religiousness; it now frequently happens in the district of Angelis that the Sunday's services are either entirely suspended, or attended only by the clerk, the gensdarmes, and their wives, as nobody else understands the Danish sermon. Even the German services, which are held once every fortnight, are almost deserted, because the Danish pastors are not able to preach in German, or intentionally go through the German service in a most irreverent manner. The Danish pastors are despised and hated as "spies" and "black gensdarmes." In one congregation, a simple peasant, a father of a family, complains that at home he can no longer go with his children through the catechism, and help them in their religious instruction, as the school language is Danish, which he does not understand. The concessions recently made by the Danish Government, to the effect that in future, for those who wish it, the rite of confirmation should be held in the German language, and that parents are allowed to keep German tutors, are an evident proof of the fearful oppression and tyranny which has hitherto ruled in Denmark, so proud of her liberalism. I should like to know whether there is a country in the wide world—Spain and the Brazils not excepted—where parents, whose children do not understand the language in which instruction is given in the public schools, are prohibited from keeping, at their own expense, a tutor for their children, to teach them in the language of their fathers! Little, however, is gained by these concessions—for how few parents are able to take a tutor for their families?—the majority, from want of means, are obliged to send their children to the now Danish school, where they and their ancestors, from time immemorial, received instruction and education in the German tongue. And what remains of the advantage (!) of German confirmation, if the little German-speaking children are instructed in school in the Danish tongue, and are prepared for this solemn and important rite by Danish pastors in the Danish language? It is not difficult to foresee the religious and moral destitution of the next generation in church and school which must needs follow. The Danes will not succeed in rooting out the German language during the next fifty years, for the peasants of Schleswig are rather tough; but they will succeed in robbing them of their faith and their religious feelings and convictions, if the church and school is made to them a subject of strife and abhorrence. It is a heavy responsibility which rests upon the leaders of the present system in Denmark, who unscrupulously and systematically persevere in estranging a whole province of faithful and well-disposed inhabitants from the Church, in rooting out good and venerable customs, and implanting in their breasts hatred and anger, instead of Christian love and charity. Do not believe that the Schleswigers are not easily to be satisfied. There is no doubt that, if the decree of language of 1850 were revoked, and the old system reinstated, the now deserted churches would once more be thronged, and resound with the hymns of praise of the Christian people of Schleswig.

And what is the view of faithful Danish Christians in this respect? Has not Provost Otten, of the Isle of Fehmarn, who is a thoroughly loyal Dane, and who was for several years the President of the Schleswig-Holstein Diet—who by birth, education, and long services, is better able than any one else to have an authoritative judgment of the wants and condition of the Church of Schleswig—has he not, with tears in his eyes, adjured the Danish Government to desist from their soul-destroying system, which is pursued with regard to matters of religion in the mixed (German and Danish) districts? Has not the venerable, enthusiastic, almost fanatical Danish Pastor Grundvig, in a recent publication, repeatedly urged the Danish Government to renounce the (before God and men) unjustifiable encroachments against the liberty of worshipping God, of hearing His Word, of singing His praise in the language of maternal teaching, of the heart, and of the congregation? Is there a more impartial, a more weighty authority in this question, than that of Pastor Grundvig? It is said that Bishop Martineau, so well known in the theological world*, before accepting the See of Seland, refused the Bishopric of Schleswig, which was offered him, because he disapproved of the system pursued by the Government in religious matters, and because he was not able to effect an alteration.

Such is the view of German Christians with regard to the proceedings of the Danish Government, and it is confirmed, not only by numerous Schleswigers among us—who are expelled from their country for the love they have for its people and its liberties—but also by many Danish Christians, as has been shown. You, dear Sirs, will gain the gratitude of thousands of Christian men, if you will communicate these facts to the British public. The noble and right-minded people of England and Scotland, viewing the question in its religious aspect, will, I feel sure, not withhold their hearty sympathy from the German-speaking inhabitants of Schleswig, who are thus assailed in their most sacred natural rights. Oh! that every one who is doubtful of the truth of these statements would visit that unfortunate country, and see with his own eyes, and hear with his own ears! The whole of Evangelical Germany admires the noble son of the famous English statesman, who not long ago visited the Spanish martyrs in their dungeons. Oh! that an English gentleman, from love for the most precious of all liberties—for religious liberty—would go forth and look into the affliction of the oppressed Christians of Schleswig, and would then raise his impartial voice in England! The Danish Government would soon yield to the voice of British Christians!

RHENISH PRUSSIA.

PLEA FOR HELP OF THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH AT WALDBREITBACH.

Honoured Gentlemen and dear Brethren,—The undersigned Presbytery have the honour of giving you an account of the very poor Diaspora Church in this place, and then requesting your loving aid on its behalf.†

As far as the internal state of the Church is concerned, there is nothing to relate but what is encouraging. The church remains steadfast in its adherence to the Word of God. Divine service is diligently attended. Not unfrequently there are people in the Church on Sundays, who, in the early morning, have had a walk of two or two and a-half hours before they could reach it. The Bible is to be seen in their houses, and with this love to the Word of God is united prayer, as well as a diligent use of the Lord's Supper. In all these respects our Church has maintained a good report from the beginning. No perversions to the Romish faith have taken place; which, however, does not prove much, since the Evangelical faith is increasingly respected, even by its opposers; and in mixed marriages, also, it is much easier now to baptize the child in the Evangelical manner. All this is very encouraging, and a proof that the light of the Gospel is shining with power in the darkness, and will, we trust, eventually overpower it. Our schools make encouraging progress; the children are well instructed in the sacred Scriptures. Last autumn the public examination was very satisfactory. The candidate stationed at Asbach; an affiliated church, is working with much blessing. The kingdom of God is being built up amongst us in the church, the school, and the house.

* Notes of Translator. Author of a celebrated volume of Dogmatics.

† The members of this Church live in twenty-three different places, in the midst of a Roman Catholic population, within a circle of three to four square miles. Their number amounts to 132. They are principally day-labourers or miners, or employed as policemen.

While in our survey we have heartily to thank God for all He has thus done for the condition of the Church, there is much to try us in its outward circumstances. We possess no church edifice, and have still to hold Divine service in the kitchen of the Kommenden-house. This is far too small, especially on festival days; besides that, the fact of our holding Divine service in the room belonging to the burgomaster and tax-gatherer forms an unfavourable contrast in the eyes of the Roman Catholic multitude worshipping in their large church. But what will it be, what silent scorn and contempt will be thrown upon us, when the plan is carried into effect, as it soon will be, of building a far grander and larger Romish church than even the present! The dignity of our worship and of our faith demands that we should no longer delay the commencement of building a church for ourselves. The Romanists can begin at once, because it is the duty of the Prince of Wied to pay the costs, as being formerly rector (Zehuterr). Nothing, therefore, remains to us in our great poverty but to turn to the love of our dear brethren, and lay before them the pressing request of our hearts. Ah! help, help us to build a house for the Lord, that His name may be honoured amongst us—that it may be said here, as once at Jerusalem, by the word of the Lord, "Be built!" and to the Temple, "be founded!"

Before, however, this can be accomplished, it is necessary that our Church should be recognised by the State; but we have never been able to raise a sufficient fund for the pastor's salary. The donation of the late King of 1,000 thalers has, in the course of time, increased, by the gifts of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, to 3,800 thalers; but the extreme poverty of the congregation prevents our raising the rest.

The yearly expenses for the maintenance of the pastor amount to 310 thalers; for the schoolmaster, 140 thalers; for the candidate at Asbach, 80 thalers; for the hire of the schoolroom, 16 thalers, making together 546 thalers, besides what is necessary for the cleaning and warming of the schoolroom, prayer-meeting room, &c. As, therefore, we have always been obliged to employ what was kindly given us in defraying our current expenses, we have not been able, notwithstanding all our economy for sixteen years, to lay by a sufficient sum to obtain for our Church the recognition of the official authorities.

Although this state of things is much to be lamented, yet, during the last year, by the help of God, we have attained one long-desired object. We possess a pastor's house. We need no longer say, as in former reports, that the building is nearly finished—it is quite ready. Our pastor's house leaves nothing to desire, either in solidity or adaptation to its purpose. Schoolrooms, pastor's and teacher's dwelling, are all included. We are no longer unable to find a proper abode for our pastor and teacher. We take advantage of this opportunity to thank the Gustavus-Adolphus Society most heartily, through whose kind help the building has been finished.

May the Lord richly reward all our benefactors for the good they have done us! There is indeed a debt of 650 thalers upon the house, of which we have to pay the interest; but we put our trust in God, that He, in His own time, will deliver us from this burden, by means of the Gustavus Adolphus Society and other benefactors, and that the recognition of our Church by the State, and the erection of a place of worship, will at length be happily consummated. Thus, dear brethren, we have given you a true account of our state. It shows in what poverty we are, and how much of your Christian and brotherly love we must call forth before we are helped, and can write to you, our benefactors, that our Church no longer needs your aid.

In the meantime, we entreat you not to tire in your generosity towards us, and beg you to help us as much as is possible. To Him who is able to do exceedingly above all that we can ask or think, according to His power that worketh in us, be glory in the Church by Christ Jesus, for ever and ever, Amen. (Eph. iii. 20—31.)

The Presbytery: Stiefel, Pastor; Fr. Hörder, Elder; Schneider, Müller, Ecker.

The account here given of the circumstances of the Church at Waldbreitbach is hereby certified as correct, and any help afforded by brotherly love will be well employed.

MISSION FIELD OF TURKEY.

BULGARIA.

Mr. Merriam, of Philippopolis, writes: It remains now to speak of the present state of the Bulgarian revolution. You will have received most interesting and important accounts of the movements in Constantinople. The most intelligent of the Bulgarians there seem much nearer Protestantism than Popery. In this city there was wavering on the part of some when the hundred and seven Bulgarians went over to the Pope and were received by his emissaries with so much pomp and so many fine promises. But as time has passed on and the excitement of novelty has given place to calm reflection, the danger has been seen and the public sentiment has strengthened daily against the movement to Rome. Now not a Bulgarian will acknowledge the possibility of a general movement of that kind, and those who sought to accomplish that object by becoming Roman Catholics are spoken of as traitors to their country and their faith. The fair promises of the Pope are known to be but vain delusions, for the better-educated of the people are acquainted with the principal facts in the history of Popery. In conversation with all classes we hear such sentiments expressed as the following: "How can the Pope, who cannot sustain himself, help us? What folly for us to think of escaping from our present ills by binding on our necks the yoke of the worst religion and the vilest despotism the world has ever seen!" Such seems to be the public sentiment of the Bulgarians here, in spite of the most persevering efforts on the part of the papal agents. One is surprised at the firmness of the people, considering the means used to seduce them. Men of eloquence are preaching up the beauties of a union with Rome all over the land; the influence of Roman Catholic kingdoms is brought to bear on the people by means of consuls and vice-consuls; civil and religious protection and schools, newspapers, and printing presses, are promised them; but they will stand firm under all these temptations, unless the Turkish Government shall wholly refuse them their rights. Here is the danger. They cannot put their necks again under the rule of the Greeks, and if the Government will force them to do this, they may in a moment of panic and rage cast themselves at the feet of the Pope, with the idea that France will protect them. A new and strong delegation is now being sent from all the principal cities, towns, and villages, in Roumelia and Bulgaria, to Constantinople, with the two special objects of resisting the influence of the Pope and urging the Government to give to the Bulgarians their rights. The condition of the Paulicians (as they call themselves) in this city is a constant and powerful argument against the Papacy. Their ignorance, their poverty, and the state of abject slavery to which they have long been reduced by the agents of the Pope, prove now a valuable lesson to the other Bulgarians. May the Holy Spirit be given to this people in this critical time, and may great grace be given to those who labour for Christ amid those scenes. It is now time to retire from the field or to relax our efforts for the good of this people. We could wish that older and more experienced missionaries were in our places; but with such powers as we have we will gladly spend and be spent for this people.

PROGRESS OF THE GOSPEL AND SPIRIT OF PRAYER IN MARASH.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Marash, April, 1861.

Dear Sirs,—Knowing you to be deeply interested in the progress of Christ's kingdom throughout the world, it has occurred to me that a few facts in regard to the work in this place might prove not unacceptable.

Marash is a city of 30,000 inhabitants, 10,000 of whom are Armenian, the remainder Moslem. The city lies at the base of the southern slope of the Taurus, one hundred and twenty-five miles north of Aleppo, and eighty miles in a north-east course from the Mediterranean. The houses are mostly of sun-dried brick, dark, and damp; earth-walls, earth-roof, earth-floor; usually with no articles of furniture, save, perhaps, a mat, a few pieces of bedding, and a few copper dishes. The people are very poor and ignorant, and yet it is often to just such people as these that God displays His grace.

It was a long time before a foothold for the truth could be gained here. Ten helpers, one after the other, were either banished or imprisoned, and it is now but six years since the Church was organised; yet in these six years what hath God wrought!

Could you visit Marash to-day, you would find here a substantial stone church, in which every Sabbath 800 persons, in quiet and peace, listen to the preaching of God's Word; a Protestant civil community of 1,100 souls; an Evangelical Church of 225 members; a Sabbath-school of 800 members; six common schools, in which the only textbook for the 350 scholars is the Bible; and from this place as a centre, light and truth being irradiated through all the region round. Surely these are results that ought to cheer and encourage the heart of every disciple of Christ!

The Protestants, as a community, are much respected, and the Pasha has frequently declared, they are by far his best citizens. Indeed, the name Protestant is but a synonym for integrity, honesty, uprightness; and a man addicted to any vice cannot remain a member of the community. The examinations for admission to the Church, and Church discipline, are very rigid; and all the members, with scarcely one exception, manifest a love for Christ and for one another, a spirit of meekness and self-denial, which is often really affecting. Every member contributes monthly to some benevolent object. Even those who have to sit in the dark for want of a light, and who often go to bed hungry—even these give their mites for the spread of Christ's kingdom!

In education, much advance has been made. Before the Gospel came to Marash, not two Armenian women in the whole city could be found able to read. Now, 200 of our Protestant women have either already completed the Testament, or are engaged in learning to read; and although it once was considered a shame for a woman to be seen with a book in her hand, now the good influence has spread so much, that some fifty of the Armenian and Catholic women also are learning. The teachers are the children of the schools. They go to the houses, morning and evening, and give a short lesson, receiving a penny for every twenty lessons. It is wonderful what an influence this learning to read has on the female mind: it wakes them up, leads them to think, and makes them feel they also have souls to be lost or saved.

Three years ago there were not three persons in the city acquainted with arithmetic, geography, and grammar. Now, we have an excellent school in these branches. A short time since, when the two-million French loan was announced, none of the Pasha's bankers being able to count up how many piastres it would be, they sent it down to have it worked by our schoolboys.

You will be glad also to know that for the past three months, a blessed work of grace has been in progress here. In December, a spirit of prayer and supplication was poured out in the congregation, and spontaneously, in all parts of the city, little meetings for prayer were begun. The week of prayer also was observed with great interest, large congregations being present every night. Since then, there has been a deep religious interest, such, as it is said, the city has never witnessed before. Much inquiry was manifested among the Armenians and Catholics. Every night they would flock to the houses of the Protestants, and sometimes continued till near dawn, in searching the Scriptures and in prayer. Some hundred souls have been added to our community, and we have good reason to hope about fifty persons have been born again.

Will not the readers of Evangelical Christendom pray much for God's people in Marash?—pray that this blessed work may deepen and widen, until every heart in the city shall be brought to receive Christ as their only Lord and Saviour.

We would desire, before closing this letter.

to express the obligations we feel to T. B. Sandwith, Esq., Her Britannic Majesty's Vice-Consul for this place. By his repeated acts of kindness he has much assisted our work, and we much regret circumstances should have rendered his departure necessary.

Most truly yours,

GEORGE H. WHITE.

SYRIA.

THE MOHAMMEDAN LAW AS IT REGARDS THE RELATION OF MOSLEMS TO UNBELIEVERS.

—, Syria, April 27, 1861.

No one can well understand the present state of the Mohammedan empire, or can duly estimate the change in the administration of its laws to which it has been lately subjected, without first understanding the old Islamic law in all its original integrity and all its forbidding aspects. This alone can supply us with the proper data by which to judge of the immense amount of stern and radical opposition with which the late reforms, introduced by the present Sultan, must contend; and it serves also as a key to those recent Mohammedan outbreaks which have filled the Christian world with horror, and which, for aught we know, may be the prelude to other and more frightful scenes destined to fill some dark page in future history. With this object in view, we have compiled the following chapter from authorities of the most unquestionable character and legal standing, though we have not deemed it necessary to make any specific reference to these sources.

But let us observe at the outset, and let it be well remembered throughout, that the single aim of this article is to set forth the principles and teachings of the pure Mohammedan law; that we do not profess to write on the character and extent and prospects of the changes and innovations lately introduced, or the part which they have played in exciting the dormant passions and powers of the old Mohammedan spirit.

It is one of the first maxims of Islamism, that the mission of Mahomet was, by a direct order of God, to establish his religion by the sword; and it is a point of history which they easily concede, that the power of compulsion is the great secret of the success which has attended the triumphant advances of Mohammedanism. Proceeding, therefore, upon this principle of their religion and of their law, "fighting in the cause of God" they consider to be an unquestionable duty which binds every one of themselves who can wield a weapon, when an occasion calls them forth. This duty is so important, that one tradition has given it the second rank after prayer; while another, more generally followed, makes the order to stand thus: prayer, obligations to parents, fighting in the cause of God. The moral obligation of this duty is founded upon the explicit language of the Koran, in which the Mohammedan doctors find a gradual development of the command. First, the order was given to the prophet simply to offer to the idolators the religion of Islam; then to dispute peaceably with them; then to wage war against those who begin the contest; then to commence the war, except during the continuance of the sacred months; and, finally, the unconditional command, "Fight the idolators until they shall believe, or until they shall be forced to pay tribute." The learned, however, consider it preferable not to begin a war during the sacred months, unless they are pushed to this extremity by the movements of the enemy. And this duty of converting the world by the sword is, according to the Mohammedan law, equally binding upon all successive generations as it was in the times of Mahomet and his immediate successors.

The laws of this war require that it shall not be raised against a people who are ignorant of the religion of Islam. To such its acceptance shall first be peaceably offered; and, in the event of their rejecting this proposal, it becomes the duty of the Moslems to invade their country, making use of all the implements of warfare and destroying all property—even to fruitful trees—if there be no probable prospect of their falling into the hands of the believing army. When circumstances encourage this hope, all undue violence and unnecessary ravage and destruction become undesirable, though not criminal. When a city or a country which had refused to surrender, falls into the hands of the Moslems, it is not lawful for the army to kill women, impotent men, children, or priests—provided they had taken no part in the war. All wanton murder of persons of this class is regarded as a crime, for which repentance and pardon are required.

but it is not punishable by law, as it would be in times of peace. It is allowable to cut off and carry about the head of an infidel, and also to exhume the bodies of the dead, if any gain can be thereby secured.

Under certain circumstances, it is right for the Moslems to make peace with the infidels, taking tribute from them, and in cases of extreme necessity paying them the same. All treaties of war shall be sacredly observed, unless they became null and void by acts of treachery or violation of their terms on the part of the infidels. If the Moslems should wish to recommence the war, notice to that effect must first be given to the infidels. After peace is proclaimed, the rules of peace must in every case be closely respected.

The prisoners of war may, at the option of their masters, be killed, or retained as slaves, or they may be given their liberty upon the condition of their paying tribute, but not otherwise. In the case of women and children, they cannot be lawfully killed, but they may be made slaves. Of the booty, one fifth is taken for the common treasury, and the rest is equally divided among the warriors, every horseman receiving a share. Before the division is made, however, nothing is allowed to be used except such things as necessity calls for, as food, weapons, cattle, and medicine. No violation of women is allowed, but after the division of the booty is made, and they become private property, the state of concubinage is in perfect accordance with the law; and so is the sale of the female prisoners, whether for the purposes of service or of concubinage.*

When a helligerent nation or people become tributaries to the Moslems, either by compulsion or voluntarily, they are called in the technical language of the law covenantees; for a covenant or compact is always understood to be made with them, by virtue of which their life and property are respected and they are allowed to enjoy the private exercise of their religion without molestation. The Mohammedan lawyers strongly insist upon a sacred and strict observance of this covenant. All the crimes of the tributaries against the law are punishable by the law, and under its administration murder, blasphemy (insults to the prophets), and proselytising a Moslem, for instance, are capital crimes, and are capitalily punished; but they do not render the covenant null and void. Only four circumstances free the Moslems from the terms of this compact, and they are these: when the tributaries raise the standard of rebellion against the government, and institute a new civil order in some part of the empire; when they unite and co-operate with an enemy at war with the Moslems; when they act as spies for such an enemy; and when they disown the claims of their masters to the tribute. Under these circumstances alone, according to the best legal authorities, may the Moslems kill the covenantees, appropriate their property to themselves, and take their women and children captives.

The tribute is the tax imposed on all infidels who are subjugated by the Moslems, and who do not embrace the religion of Islam; and it is based upon the command of the Koran, "Fight the idolators until they shall believe, or until they shall be forced to give tribute in a state of humiliation." The word used in the Arabic to signify this tax (El-Jiziat) is explained in books of law to mean substitution for death, and this, in reference to both its etymology and its technical usage, and hence it is sometimes also called the price of one's head. Lawyers recognise two kinds of tribute—that stipulated by special treaty at the time of capitulation, and that forcibly imposed after the victory of war. In the former case the sum assigned by the treaty cannot be altered at any subsequent time; in the latter, a new impost is made every year, levying respectively the poor at twelve drachms of silver (about six shillings), the middling class at twenty-four drachms, and the rich at forty-eight. A man is considered by the law to be rich when he possesses ten thousand drachms of silver, to be in middling circumstances when he possesses two hundred and above, and poor when he has less than this sum, or absolutely nothing. Men of all religions and nationalities may become tributaries, except Arabians and apostates. These can have but one of two alternatives—Islam or death. Nor is this tax to be considered as a connivance of the believers at the infidelity of the tributaries, but rather as a punishment for their unbelief; peradventure this means of their humiliation and their intercourse with the Moslems may lead them to embrace the religion of the Koran.†

* This is the opinion of the older lawyers. In modern times, however, this law of division, for various reasons, has become obsolete; and hence the later lawyers do not strongly insist upon possession preceding the right of use. (Ibn-Abdin, vol. iii., p. 242.)

† It is, however, a notorious fact, which must strike intelligent Mohammedans with singular force, that notwithstanding all the measures of humiliation and annoyance to which the tributaries are subjected, and

In accordance with the spirit of the Koranic injunction just mentioned, it is not allowed that a man should send his tribute-money by the hand of another. Every person for himself must deliver it to the tax-gatherer, who shall receive it sitting, while the deliverer stands. Some doctors insist that the receiver, at the time of the transaction, shall give the deliverer a gentle slap on the back part of the neck, saying, "Enemy of God, give." But even by them no injury or insult is permitted to be otherwise offered. Others are satisfied if he shall take the tributary by the collar, and, giving him a gentle shake, say, "Give the tribute, O man of the covenant." Others still do not look upon such a rigorous proceeding as being well-authorized, and therefore omit it altogether.*

As the Mohammedan law regards all facilities given to infidels as a kind of participation in blasphemy, it has circumscribed the extension of churches, and other places of worship, within as narrow limits as possible. Accordingly, in Arabia Proper it forbids the existence of such places altogether; and this on the strength of the tradition, "Arabia cannot have more than one religion." In cities no new church or synagogue can, by the law, be built; and in repairing old ones, no change can be made in their site, dimensions, or materials. In villages it is a disputed point among the learned whether any new buildings of this kind may be permitted or not; the majority, however, contending for the negative side of the question. Some eminent lawyers have even decided that no church or synagogue, which has been demolished by official order, can be rebuilt, though that order may have been wholly unjust; and others prohibit the temporary use of a part of a private dwelling for the purposes of religious worship. In all lawful repairs or renovation it is considered wrong to aid them in any way, or allow believers to labour in the work of reconstruction.

With the view of carrying out the spirit of the text of the Koran, that those who give the tribute must live with the Moslems in a state of humiliation, all lawyers have agreed that persons of this class must be distinguished, not only by their dress, but also by other special signs indicative of their subjection. They have, accordingly, prescribed definitely the fashion of dress which the covenantees must adopt, and they have prohibited certain materials and colours whose use is regarded to be the exclusive privilege of the believers. In cities they may not ride horses at all; and some of the later lawyers have proscribed even mules and donkeys; but when, in cases of necessity, they are allowed the use of these animals, the saddles on which they ride must be of a peculiar shape. In their intercourse with the Moslems, they must put on the general appearance and mien of abject humiliation. For the same reason, it is unlawful for a Moslem to give them honour in any way; he may not rise for them when they come in, nor may he embrace them, or begin the common salutations, or prolong the conversation to an unnecessary length. To this a single exception is made in favour of those whom it is the self-interest of the Moslem to honour, or those whom he wishes to incline, by suavity of manner, to embrace the religion of Islam. In every other case the breach of this law is considered to be criminal, as it must be construed into a countenance of infidelity. The house of an infidel must have a sign at the door, to indicate the character of the occupants, for the very good reason that no Mohammedan beggar may stand before it and pray for the forgiveness of their sins, or use those expressions of deep humility with which people of this class excite the pity of others.† A Moslem may let, but not sell, his house to an infidel, according to some; and if the sale actually take place, he should be forced to re-sell it. Others insist upon this only in the case when the infidels become too numerous in a Moslem quarter. Nor may the infidel build his house higher than that of his Moslem neighbour. It is a disputed point whether the covenantees may reside among the Moslems, or whether they may occupy quarters exclusively their own—the majority of the learned taking the side of the question that a joint occupation ensures most that state of humiliation to the tributaries which the law requires. As a matter of fact, however, the Christian and Jewish houses, notwithstanding all the traps which are thrown in their way, it is not known that the Moslems have ever succeeded in gaining one sincere convert from even the nominal Christians of the East.

* El-Tahtawy, vol. ii., p. 470. Let it be remembered, however, that we are giving the spirit of the law, and what it teaches—not events actually occurring. These humiliating attendants of paying the tribute were probably never reduced to practice in every case; and certainly they were given up long before the tribute itself was abolished by the present Sultan.

† Much of all this has now become obsolete; but all elderly men now living well remember the time when these laws were rigidly carried out.

when they are their own, are almost always situated in separate quarters.

In closing this article, we find that our best efforts have turned out to be rather an indication of the spirit of the Islamic law than a full exposition of its leading principles and teachings on the subject which we have set before the reader; but they are sufficient to point out a practical influence of very considerable importance. So long as this law is believed to be of Divine origin, and, therefore, unalterable by any human power, however exalted—and it were infidelity to a Moslem mind to doubt either of these propositions—so long will it be impossible to restrain fearful outbreaks—of which we have had recent examples—of long-pent-up indignation and vengeance, provoked by insults offered to God in the changes to which His law is subjected, but by physical force, under the vigilant administration of a strong and effective government. JAPAN.*

THE PAST AND PRESENT OF CHRISTIANITY.

It is one of the novelties of modern times to find English bishops exploring foreign countries. The spirit of enterprise and the spirit of Christianity are pleasantly growing together in the episcopal mind. Bishop Mackenzie is travelling with Livingstone in Central Africa, carrying with him, as we trust, not simply the humanising, but also the saving influences of the Gospel; and here we have another bishop visiting one of the most singular and least known of the nations on the opposite side of the globe. If, however, we speak of Japan as secluded to a great extent from the knowledge of the rest of the world, and as unenlightened consequently by Christian truth, this seclusion is nevertheless a comparatively modern thing. Not only in earlier times did her fleets navigate remote seas in the Eastern hemisphere, but Europeans carried on a valuable commerce with her ports, and her nobles were even sent on deputations to the Pope. In the sixteenth century, Francis Xavier and his zealous fellow-labourers made so much progress in disseminating the Popish form of Christianity, that there seemed no great improbability of Japan becoming a nominally Christian country, and putting her neck under the yoke of the Papacy. The hopes entertained at Rome, however, were not destined to be realised. Her emissaries contrived to make themselves both feared and hated, until they brought upon themselves, nor upon themselves alone, a terrible overthrow. By an imperial edict in 1638, the Christian religion and foreign nations were involved in one common expulsion and extermination. Thirty-seven thousand Christians were put to death in one day; and in this horrible massacre the Dutch, under the influence of commercial rivalry with the Portuguese and Spaniards, lent their fratricidal aid.

signal reverse, or a more irretrievable disaster, been inflicted on a religious sect or a political party. From that time nearly two centuries and a-half have rolled onward, with all their recurring cycles of change, and yet no sign of improvement or prospect of amendment has revived the hopes of the fallen and persecuted system. . . . Executions of native Christians caused the land to overflow with torrents of martyred blood, which have not hitherto proved the seed of the Roman Catholic Church in Japan. From the bare, rugged top of Papenberg, tradition relates that thousands of Japanese Christians, who preferred death to an abandonment of their religion, were hurled down the precipice into the watery abyss below. The European padres evinced their heroic constancy by sharing with their native catechumens the common punishment of a violent death. One wretched man, the Jesuit Christopher Ferreyra, underwent torture in its most harrowing forms of subtle and refined invention. Human nature could no longer continue the conflict, and the sign of recantation was made. He lived on during a wretched life of ignoble security, doomed by his merciless persecutors to bear the marks of perpetual ignominy in filling the situation of Japanese inquisitor and spy, and adding to the infamy of a renegade the shame of forced concubinage with a Japanese woman. The tale of his subsequent contrition and martyrdom has been well observed by former writers to have no better foundation than the wishes of his co-religionists, and the charitable hopes of Roman Catholic historians. At the present time not a single native Roman Catholic survives throughout the kingdom of Japan, as a monument of former Propagandist triumphs, or as a record of the early labours of Francis Xavier, the canonised saint, hero, and patron of Papal missions in the East."

"Never (the bishop remarks) has a more

* Ten Weeks in Japan. By GEORGE SMITH, D.D., Bishop of Victoria. London: Longman, pp. 469.

Within the last few years the stern policy of exclusion has so far been relaxed, as to lead the Japanese Government to enter into treaties with the nations of the Western hemisphere. These treaties, however, do not provide for the re-introduction of Christianity. The American treaty stipulates only for the abolition of the custom of trampling on the cross, and for the profession of the Christian religion by American citizens in Japan. In the Dutch treaty there is even a clause inserted, by which all Dutch subjects are prohibited from circulating Christian books. And in none of the treaties is toleration secured for native converts to Christianity, or liberty for missionaries to propagate the Gospel. The chief statesmen of Japan have hitherto evinced a strong repugnance to the adoption of a more liberal policy. They tolerate the various forms of foreign paganism, and put no ban on the religion even of Jews and Mohammedans, but Christianity is proscribed. Old imperial proclamations are still posted up, offering large rewards for information against those who embrace it. Any allusion to it is rigidly suppressed in all foreign books in the Chinese or Japanese languages published in Japan; and in the present temper, we are told, of the native Government, the acceptance of the Christian Scriptures would entail the peril of death on the recipient. All the Protestant missionaries now in Japan accordingly concur in deeming it highly impolitic and inexpedient to attempt any distribution of a Japanese version of them.

A remarkable fact came to the knowledge of Mr. Smith during his stay at Yeddo, which shows how intensely the Jesuits must have been hated, and how completely they succeeded in transforming the only benign religion on earth into a system of terror and dismay. He says it was reported to him by foreign gentlemen, fully competent, by their official standing and personal opportunities of observation, to authenticate their statement: "In a part of the city called Ao-yama, there are now in existence a hundred families congregated in one spot and dwelling by themselves, the descendants of a hundred native Christians, who, during the sanguinary severity of the persecution waged by the Emperor Tyco-sama and his successor Eyay-yes against Christianity, had renounced the Christian faith, and had their lives spared on condition that they and their descendants in all time should retain a knowledge of the abjured religion in order to qualify themselves to act in every age as a body of religious detectives and inquisitors, for discovering and destroying the hated and proscribed sect. Supported by the Emperor and released from all other labour for their subsistence, they form a separate body even to the present time, and receive a daily payment of five rations of rice for each family from the imperial treasury." The bishop thinks they may have become a dead letter; but the old laws against Christianity still exist, and, should the slumbering spirit which led to their enactment be revived, here is obviously a most terrible machinery for carrying them into full effect.

At present there does not appear to be much scope for missionary zeal. We may entertain the hope that the intercourse recently opened with the United States, and the renewed commerce with European nations, will lead to an amelioration of the present jealousy of Christians, and intolerance of Christianity. In the meantime, there are a few missionaries residing at some of the seaports, whose quiet influence, in the absence of any direct and active efforts, will, as we trust, under the Divine blessing, tend to remove existing prejudices, and open the way for further conciliation. Very cordially do we unite, as we are sure all our readers will, in the devout and pious wish of the excellent bishop, when he says: "May the failures arising from the want of dignified firmness and conciliating forbearance in the demeanour of foreign diplomatists—of moral integrity and virtuous self-respect in European mercantile residents and traders—and of zeal tempered with wisdom, of cautious abstinence from political affairs, and of mutual harmony among themselves, on the part of Christian missionaries—which are among the lessons inscribed for our admonition, in the past history of foreign connexion with Japan—prove, in our future intercourse with that people, a beacon of warning against the errors of former times, and a chapter of human experience not altogether written in vain!"

We must not close without a slight—even though it be the very slightest—advertence to the other contents of this interesting volume. We were naturally drawn to those parts of it, especially, which treat of the past and the present of Christianity in Japan; but it is full of information on multifarious subjects. Scarcely anything seems to have escaped the intelligent observation of the traveller, so that his book is, in fact, a repertory of the most recent, trustworthy, and diversified facts and observations relating to Japanese life, manners, and customs; to its political, social, and religious condition; to the government, trade, and population of the country; to its scenery, towns, buildings, schools, and language, and to many things beside. The work is not to be found which, in so clear and lively a style, will give the reader such an acquaintance with whatever he may desire to know about the empire of Japan.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER IN ADELAIDE—THE SERVICES CHARACTERISED—PERMANENT UNITED PRAYER-MEETING.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Adelaide, South Australia.

Sirs,—I am happy to have this opportunity afforded me of expressing, as I now do, my gratitude for the copies of your invaluable magazine which have been sent to me.

We hailed with the liveliest joy the intelligence contained in your number for August last, that a call had gone forth from the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance to all Christians throughout the world, to spend the week commencing with the first Sunday of the New Year as a week of special prayer. At the half-yearly meeting of the South Australian Congregational Union, which was held soon after the arrival of that number of your journal in the colony, a committee was appointed to correspond with all other Evangelical denominations in South Australia, and secure, as far as possible, their concurrence in this scheme for united prayer. This committee was also instructed to correspond with the secretaries of the congregational unions of the other Australian colonies, inquiring whether steps were being taken in their colonies to carry out the plan of prayer proposed in the August number of Evangelical Christendom, and if not, suggesting the propriety of this being done. We have learned that in New South Wales, Victoria, Tasmania, and Western Australia, the scheme has been adopted by the Christian public, with various modifications, suitable to their local circumstances. In this colony the Church of England has conformed to the scheme as far as simultaneous prayer is concerned. Meetings have been held in its places of worship at the same hours with other denominations, and to pray for the objects specified in the plan of the Evangelical Alliance. All other Evangelical denominations in Adelaide and throughout the colony have, as far as practicable, held united prayer-meetings daily. They were held in places of worship belonging to the various religious bodies in rotation. All the meetings were pervaded by a subdued and deeply earnest devotional spirit. Of results we cannot yet say much, but a general confidence appears to be cherished, that they will be seen after many days, in which confidence I rejoice to participate. It was felt by us all, that in those meetings we breathed the air of a purer and warmer Christian clime than we had been wont to inhabit, that we were drawn nearer to Christ Jesus our Lord, and therefore nearer to each other, in answer to His prayer for the members of His true universal Church, "That they all may be one." We seemed to discover with glad surprise how much more closely united we all were than we had ever been or ever felt before, and in the recognition of this fact we felt our love both to our Lord and to each other increase. Is not this, dear Sirs, a measure of genuine revival?

The feelings of increased love and Christian unity between the various sections of the Christian Church found appropriate expression in the participation of the Lord's Supper together in one place on the evening of Monday, the 14th of January. This service was held in the Wesleyan Chapel, Pirie-street, Adelaide, which was chosen as the largest place of worship in the city, and the number attending it was limited only by the accommodation provided. The idea of holding such a service was suggested to us in Adelaide by a Christian gentleman in Gawler Town, who wrote to me, as secretary to the general union for prayer, intimating that they had resolved to have such a service there, and would be glad to know if we had resolved on having such a termination to our series of prayer-meetings, or if we would then, if possible, arrange for such a service in Adelaide. To the committee in Adelaide this seemed a providential suggestion of the best mode of terminating our series of united prayer-meetings. It was immediately resolved that a united communion service should be held, and that the Rev. L. T. Stow, whose long and efficient course of service to the cause of Christ in this colony pointed him out as the appropriate president, should be requested to preside. The other ministers who were present and assisted in this interesting service, were the Revs. J. Gardiner, L. Hamming, and J. Lyall (Presbyterian), S. Williams, W. Brown, and C. Usher (Wesleyan), G.

Stonehouse and G. Prince (Baptist), and F. W. Cox, C. W. Evan, H. Cheetham, W. Harcus, J. Jefferis, and W. Wilson (Congregationalist). The Church of England did not as a denomination unite in this service, but several of her members were present, and sat down at the Lord's-table. The gallery of the chapel was reserved for spectators, while the communicants occupied the other portion, which is seated for 800 people. But there must have been at least 900 communicants crowded into this space, while the gallery was equally full of spectators. This evening has been pronounced by many experienced Christians to have been the most hallowed season of spiritual enjoyment which they have had in South Australia. Similar services were held at Gawler Town and Port Adelaide on the same evening. A united missionary prayer-meeting has also arisen out of those united prayer-meetings, which is to be held in the churches of the various uniting denominations in rotation on the second Monday of every month.

I am, dear Sirs, yours faithfully,

WILLIAM WILSON, Hon. Secretary.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

THE NORTH A UNIT.

There is but one feeling among the people of the North with regard to the present struggle; and that is a feeling that the Union must be preserved, that rebellion must be put down, that treason must be punished, and that the Union must be preserved in its integrity. We passed last week over the western part of this State (New York), and never witnessed such a spontaneous uprising of the people as the proclamation of President Lincoln evoked. The roar of Niagara was not so majestic as the huzzahs of the people at every depôt. On public and on private buildings the flag of the Union was floating to the breeze. The traitors of the South do not know what spirit they have aroused, nor what vengeance they have provoked. Long, long have American citizens gloried in their flag, and exulted in the fame of their country, and it will be very long before American patriotism will permit the Stars and Stripes to be insulted and degraded with impunity by rebels against the Government. The rebel States should retreat from their folly at once, unless they wish to be converted into military provinces.

Mr. Seward is suspected of a willingness to try the arts of a politician in settling our present difficulties. He might as well try to stop the falling waters of Niagara as to stop the progress of Northern patriotism. We shall have peace and fraternity; but no peace until the South is ready to honour the Constitution, and support the Government.

NORTHERN RIGHTS.

The time is ripe for the due consideration of Northern rights. Long have our ears been filled with declamatory sounds respecting Southern rights; but since South Carolina has initiated war, forbearance on the part of the North has been transmuted into a determined feeling that hereafter justice shall be done to people of all sections, and equal rights secured to every citizen.

Among the rights which Northerners will hereafter claim, are the following:—

1. The right to travel without molestation through all parts of the Union.
2. The right to collect debts in the South due to citizens of the North.
3. The right to express political opinions, through the press or in the ballot-box, without fear of proscription.
4. The right to be Northern men with Union principles.
5. The right to feel that slavery is not a Divine institution, to be perpetuated for ever as the basis of American civilization.
6. The right to be Americans, and not sectionalists.

We do not know of a single Southern right that has been denied or invaded, except in so far as the foolish abolitionists, in times past, may have trenchoned upon Southern sensibilities. The North has been held at bay by Southern threats, but for ever that ignominy has now passed away. One great Union party has arisen, which will vindicate its rights at all hazards, and defend the Union at any cost.

INTERESTING CEREMONY AT THE OLD NORTH REFORMED DUTCH CHURCH—RAISING OF THE STARS AND STRIPES ON THE TOWER—ENTHUSIASM OF THE PEOPLE—SPEECHES, SONGS, &c.

The Old North Dutch Church [in New York] was the scene of great attraction and interest on Monday, 29th of April, at 4 P.M., connected with the raising of a beautiful and costly flag, the endeared emblem of our national Union. The announcement had been made that the Stars and Stripes were to go up on the steeple of this ancient but beautiful and grand edifice; and though Colonel Elsworth's Fire-brigade of Zouaves were marching down Broadway, two blocks off, a large company of ladies and gentlemen assembled to witness the spectacle.

The fact of the church being one of the few surviving memorials of the Revolution added much to the interest of the ceremony. The old church has stood in its place nearly a century, and was used for a hospital, prison, and barracks, by the British soldiery, at the time the British army had possession of New York. All these things tended to throw around the raising of the flag upon its steeple unbounded enthusiasm. It was the spontaneous outburst of the patriotism of the people.

After the introduction of the exercises, the National Anthem was sung:—

"My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty, Of thee I sing;"

by the great crowd, with admirable effect. At the same time all the windows in all the streets were crowded with beholders. Judge Woodruff, presiding, then called on Rev. Dr. Chambers to offer prayer.

Rev. Dr. De Witt made some very impressive remarks, exhorting to a devotion to the upholding the flag as the symbol of the Government, the Constitution, and the laws, which should never falter until that flag should proudly float again over all the land.

Rev. Dr. Vermilye was then loudly called for at the conclusion of the remarks of the preceding speaker.

He said he had positively been forced upon the stand, and told that he must speak. He had not a word to say for secession, but as a Dutchman, he was opposed to this kind of coercion. After all, he could not find it in his heart not to say a few words for the Old North Church, and the flag of his country.

It might appear a paradox, but he must say he was glad Fort Sumter had been taken—glad, for it had roused a spirit in the North, and had awakened the whole North to realise, as they would not otherwise, that this was war as well as rebellion. The insult had been offered to the flag of our country by traitors and rebels, and that insult would be fully avenged. It was just the thing the country stood in need of. We could not otherwise have believed that traitors meant so much as they do. But now there is no mistaking the meaning. They mean to pull down the Stars and Stripes, the beautiful emblem of our Union. The balls that rattled around Fort Sumter, and went through the old flag, meant just this—the pulling down the Government. Now, the right kind of enthusiasm has been evoked. There is no longer division in the North. All are for one object—the defending and upholding the American flag.

It has been said the Dutch are slow to move. We pause, we consider, we come to our conclusion; and when we do move, you know where to find us. We may be the last in the field; but one thing you may rely on—we will be the last to leave it.

Some people were opposed to mixing up politics and religion. For his part, he thought that was the truest religion that stood at the back of a good Government in its hour of need. The Stars and Stripes are the banner of civil and religious liberty, and he firmly believed the downfall of civil liberty would be soon followed with the enslaving of religion. We defend civil and religious freedom. To this extent we mix up politics and religion—no more. He hoped that the spirit which had been evoked would go on deepening, and widening, and intensifying over all the North and West, until not only the grave of secession shall be dug, but until secession is put into it, its death-knell rung, and the earth covered over it, burying it so deep that it would never have a resurrection.

Rounds of applause followed, amidst the most intense enthusiasm.

At the conclusion of these remarks, the beautiful flag, twenty by thirty feet, was flung to the breeze amid cheers on cheers.

The meeting was then addressed by Joseph Hoxie, Esq., in a strain of eloquent and touching remarks. The "Star-spangled Banner" was sung, and the concourse of people slowly dispersed.

BAHAMAS AND ST. DOMINGO.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.
Grand Turk,

Turk's Islands, March 28, 1861.

Dear Sirs,—Permit me to express my gratitude, through you, to the kind friends who, year after year, have extended consideration to these isolated parts of the globe, by the present of Evangelical Christendom.

We rejoice to find the Loodiana cry so universally responded to by our Christian friend—

That cry was not fully and formally replied to here at the stated time, in consequence of my absence and labour in St. Domingo; but on my return to Turk's Islands, in February, we attended to it in earnest. We held meetings morning, noon, and night, and up to date these meetings continue. Six nights in the week, exclusive of Lord's-day, our friends are found engaged for God at both ends of the island and in the chapel. But for the expense of lighting up the chapel, these meetings would have been held there, and with far greater advantage. These meetings, you will be glad to know, have not been fruitless. More seriousness, and a deepened interest in the salvation of precious souls, are apparent; while, at the same time, the zeal of our dear people is quickened, and their prayers are most solemn and fervent. These prayers, too, have already been responded to in the preacher's words having more than usual power, the house of God being better attended—some being seen there who were never guilty of the act before; while others, noted for their abandonment, have astonished all by the manifest and sudden change which has taken place in them. They have forsaken the path of the destroyer, and now are found humble disciples at the feet of Jesus. Persons of all ages are coming forth to give themselves to the Lord, and to us, according to His Word. Surely the idea of our Eastern friends was from on high!

Our various meetings for prayer and otherwise have been distinguished by a very sober, sedate, and serious spirit. The only excitement is the deep sobs and falling tears of the prodigal, coupled with the joy of the Church. We have, therefore, cause to believe that He who hath begun the good work will carry it on until the day of Christ, and yet show us greater things as the result of the Spirit being poured out from on high.

As the request of our Loodians friends has been heard and so extensively responded to, and with such blessed effect, in all parts of the world, would it be superfluous should the Turk's Islanders request the Christmas week to be devoted to God, and the supplication of His favour towards, and in behalf of, the prosperity of our various missions? We do feel far away from home and Christian friends, and, while surrounded by heathenism, formalism, and empty profession, that we may have too little of prayer, but never too much. Could I reach our dear friends at this moment, it would be to entreat them not to forget these western isles; and, particularly, to pour out their heart for St. Domingo—a land, perhaps, little thought of, and where we sometimes labour amid fearful evils, superstition, and gross idolatry. Here large towns, villages, and scattered people are found dead to God, and unable to say, is there not a lie in my hand? Happy should we be to engage the interest of our Christian friends at the throne of grace for this benighted people, scattered over an island nearly as large as England, and destitute in the Spanish part of efficient Gospel agency. Here, however, some good has been done. We are about to send a young brother there at once, and thus have an agency to carry out the plan proposed for the people's good. But one thing hinders our efforts there, in connexion with schools and Evangelical labours; that one thing is found in the significant word—means. One result, no doubt, of the revivals taking place, in various portions of the earth, will be the prevention of the missionary cry for help. Surely that help to extend the Gospel cannot be withheld where the love of Christ and souls is deeply and so truly felt! We will not forget the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and we should not forget to imitate it. We cannot do so if His love sets our hearts on fire. Excuse my freedom, reverend brethren, but truth will, somehow or other, leak out; as the shoulder feels the weight of having souls to care for, provide for, travel to, and no means adequate to the work in prospect. I would not beg if I could help it; but necessity sometimes obliges a trespasser one would not be guilty of. Forgive me, then, this liberty, and kindly permit me to say how much I should be encouraged as to my work in St. Domingo if some of your sympathising Christian readers would remember—first at the throne of grace, and then at the mouth of that efficient purse God has entrusted them with—the perishing thousands of St. Domingo. Here our needs are schools, chapels, school-houses, and suitable agency.

Permit me to remain,

Beloved brethren in the Lord,

Yours affectionately,

W. K. RYOROFF.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

Ingenious attempts have been sometimes made to trace various points of analogy and contrast between the great religious festivals of the Jews and our modern Christian anniversaries. To accomplish such a task with completeness, would involve a comparison, not only of the old and the new dispensations, but of ancient and modern civilisation. Those who might well forego any attempt of this kind, might yet gain a more vivid impression of the feelings of the devout Israelites of old, as they entered the Holy City at a festive season, by observing with what emotions they, or their country friends, visit the metropolis during the season of our great religious gatherings. One feature here can scarcely fail to present itself as common to both Jews and Christians; the augmented interest felt by the provincial visitor, as compared with the town resident, who is familiar with much, which, to the former, has more or less of the charm of novelty. There can be no doubt that to those who come up from a distance to attend the May Meetings, there is a relish in all that they see and hear that others miss. Hence any metropolitan experience, as to the character of the meetings, may be somewhat defective. Taking opinions, however, derived from different sources, we have reason to believe that the tone of the meetings this year has been fully equal to that which distinguished them last, when an improvement was perceptible in many of them upon preceding anniversaries. There are fewer attempts simply to amuse, to indulge in vague generalities, or to resort to a style of advocacy which is beneath the occasion. In fact, there is less than ever a mere advocacy of objects which, beheld in all their great proportions, plead their own cause better than the most eloquent advocate. The magnitude of the great mission of the Christian Church is felt more deeply by both speakers and hearers; and the appeal is oftener the indirect but more effective one of the presentation of striking facts and important results than, as it once was, the laboured solicitation to do that which ought rather to be pointed to as a duty, and welcomed as a privilege. As to the actual operations of the societies, they show an advance, affected but partially by the decline in the funds observable in some institutions, owing to the distress of last winter, and the consequent diversion of sundry contributions into other than their wonted channels.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

This great institution was unaffected by the circumstances to which we have just referred: in fact, upon the ordinary income, the funds show an increase of 4,143*l.* more than in any former year, and upon the income inclusive of special funds (for China and India), of 3,805*l.*, as compared with last year. The total amount now reported was 167,941*l.* (including 82,000*l.* received for Bibles and Testaments). The issues, during the year, were considerably over one million and three quarters, and since the society's commencement much more than thirty-nine millions and a quarter.

The report, as everybody knows, makes the tour of the habitable globe. We shall, of course, not attempt to follow it. But a few points must be noticed. In France there has been no instance of interference on the part of the authorities with the colporteurs; in Belgium an obvious change in the public mind, favourable to the reading of the Bible, is perceptible; and in Germany, by means of upwards of forty colporteurs and other agencies, 363,700 copies were, during the year, put into circulation. Austria, but the other day, prohibited the circulation of the Scriptures even amongst its Protestant subjects: the police regulations on this subject have been rescinded by Imperial decree, and they may now enter any part of the empire. In Russia the synod of the Greek Church has resumed the printing of the Scriptures in modern Russ, for general circulation; and two hundred thousand copies of the Four Gospels have been issued. With regard to Italy, the several centres of operations—Turin, Leghorn, Florence, and Naples—have each their point of interest. The avidity of the multitude in Naples to possess the sacred volume was mentioned, and it was added that the demand there continues with great steadiness. In Sicily, too, colportage having been introduced, there has been a considerable circulation. The result of the society's operations, during the year, in Italy, was that 30,000 copies were placed in the hands of the people, mainly through the agency of thirty exporters. An omission, to which Lord Shaftesbury made pointed reference in 1860, was supplied in 1861, and it was stated that during the year many thousand copies of the Scriptures had been distributed, by agency of the Bible-women, among persons who were beyond the reach of ordinary means, and who willingly paid for the Bible by instalments. The number of Bible-women now employed (all, we presume, in London) is 152. Among several able speeches, there were two which claim specific mention. Lord Shaftesbury, who occupied the chair as president of the society, struck the key-note, not only of that meeting, but of the whole series which followed. Referring to the "Essays and Reviews," he said:—

A company of seven gentlemen, conscientious, no doubt, in their own views, but holding a belief in the faith antagonistic in the extreme to that which we believe, have put out a volume with much pomp and circumstance. Now, I hold that all the authors of that book are responsible for the whole and for each individual part. United in a single publication, sharing alike the consequences, the profit, the loss, the honour, or the reverse, as it may be, of that publication, they are bound together in a common effort to introduce a new Gospel, which is to be propounded and circulated for the general acceptance of the British public. It may be asked, what concern is it to the Bible Society? Simply this, it is a notice to quit. If that book be true we have no business here. Now, we protest against that work. The bishops—I thank God for it—have denounced the work; but that is not enough. The laity must take it into their own hands, and must determine to what schools, colleges, and universities they will send their children for instruction in Christian life. The laity must determine what literature they will encourage, what men they will countenance, how far they will in social life support or repel those who maintain doctrines that are subversive of the great foundations on which we stand. It is not for us, perhaps, to say to the clergy what they ought to do; but I will say to the clergy, on my own behalf, and on behalf of many of the laity, that we wish them to do. We wish the clergy to lead their flocks to the fountain-head of truth. We do not wish them to enter into controversy, and to quarrel fact by fact, and statement by statement. It may often prove your adversary to be in the wrong without proving yourselves to be in the right. We ask them to preach incessantly the great and saving doctrines of the Word. We ask them to let the Bible do its own work—a work upon the man in his inner experience, and not a display of outward learning. And if they will do that, rely upon it there will rise up a million or more of the most able controversialists—men of deep knowledge of the saving truths of the Scripture, vigorous in heart, well-furnished in mind, and able to give an answer to all who shall gainsay the Word and the faith that is in them. And if these gifted men, for such they are, will float down the stream of theology, rejoicing in the mixture of the impure tributaries of human science, we, who are orthodox Nonconformists and members of the Church of England, will, with our pastors, ascend the stream to the fountain-head, and there drink the waters fresh and pure as they first came from the lips of the living God. I should like to ask, what, after all, is the value and force of this famous book? Does it contain anything really new? What is there in it that is new? Aye, there is one new thing, and one only. Having eviscerated from the Gospel all vital religion, so well do the authors know the wants and cravings of the human heart, that they substitute for the vitality of truth a mawkish sentimentality. But is there nothing new but that? Is there nothing in it that may not be found in the whole range of infidel writers, from Celsus down to Tom Payne? What then has given such currency to it? Have there not for years been pamphlets and writings of all descriptions bearing upon these points—seeking to invalidate Scripture, and to subvert the faith of man—introducing ingenious difficulties to perplex men's minds and disturb their hearts? But all these have gone into the only place that is fit for them, the waste-paper basket, for the purpose of consumption in the fire? Why is it, then, that this book has been rescued from so well-deserved a fate? For no other reason than this: this is the first time in our history in which a plan of a new Gospel and a new system of interpretation of Scripture has been boldly put forward by men whose names are notorious—by men who hold high offices in the Church—by benefited clergymen—by dignitaries. The value is not in the writings but in the offices of the men, not in the force of the work, but in the names of the persons who have sent it forth. Had it not been for that, satisfied I am that they would have shared the same fate that all others of a similar description have shared, and I doubt not that in the course of a short time, though the fact will remain in the minds of men that there was such a book, there will scarcely be found in the whole realm of England a man who would be foolish enough to give half-an-hour to the perusal of it. And yet the work is producing great mischief. A friend of mine told me that in one of his tours of investigation in the metropolis only a short time ago, he ascended to the upper room of a gin-palace, and there he found twenty men engaged in the perusal of this work, relishing everything that tended to subvert the original truths of Scripture, and to take away from the Book of God its coercive power upon the human heart. And yet, even in that body, there was found one man to say, that, whatever might be the truth of the book, it was the truth he had been taught as a child at his mother's knee. But I am alarmed to see to what an extent in the present day—a day of inquiry, and, as we are told, of intellectual effort—people are carried away by mere names, without really estimating the truth of those things which they so readily believe. Sooner or later, I daresay, we shall see another extraordinary proposition as readily imbibed. Only let the doctrine of the development of species be taken up by dignitaries or men of position and name, embodied in a volume, and put forth to the public, and hundreds will be found to rejoice in the discovery that they are sprung from a fungus, and that as soon as possible to a fungus they will return. But this really becomes very serious, because upon these things unthinking men ground the dreadful assumption that the Scripture is un-sued to the times in which we live. Good heavens! were the truths of the Book prevalent in the hearts of men, should we be disturbed and frightened as we are day by day by those gigantic frauds that are bursting out in every community, and which lead us to believe that all honesty in trade, all honesty in public, all honesty in private life, have left the earth for ever? Is it unsuited to the times in which we live, when, if its holy precepts and its Divine commands had been listened to, we should not have before us those gigantic cruelties that pervade the continent of America, the non-observance of which precepts has now led to that great and astounding issue, the severance and demolition of the largest Republic that ever figured upon the face of the earth? These are two instances in which, if that Book had been adopted as suitable to the age in which we live, those great and terrible issues would have been avoided.

The Rev. Henry Venn thus gave the estimate which his lengthened experience in the Church Missionary Secretariat had taught him of the relative position of the Bible and the great missionary societies:—

The more I have entered into the interior of the missionary work—the oftener and the longer I have conversed with those who have come from every corner of the earth—the more I have been introduced to an intimate knowledge of the working of Missions; not only the Missions of the society with which I am connected, but of other societies in which it is our privilege to unite together in brotherly conference. The more I have known and studied the world at large, and its wants, the higher has this Society risen in my estimation, and the more deeply have I felt that the work and constitution of this Society is that great work and constitution which every missionary society most needs. I no longer look on the British and Foreign Bible Society, as I once mistakenly did, as the handmaid of the great missionary associations throughout the world; but I humbly confess that I look upon her, “as the King’s daughter, all glorious within, and her clothing of wrought gold,” and that we missionary societies are her companions, that bear her company. I give the Bible Society precedence on many grounds. My Christian friends, I would not presume to offer to this great and impressive assembly thoughts which had not been the subject of long and deep reflection. I am not accustomed to address public meetings such as this. I am an humble workman. But, in the course of my daily labour, there are certain convictions which have forced themselves on my mind; and I thank God that He has given me this opportunity of proclaiming them before my Christian friends. One of the grounds on which this Society may claim precedence is, the aid she renders to all missionary societies. She is not the handmaid, but the royal predecessor. I stand here to thank this Society for all the encouragement it has given to our missionaries throughout the world—in printing, to any extent, on the shortest notice, and under circumstances of every conceivable difficulty, whatsoever we have asked it to print. But the Society has done more than this. There is a modest tone in the report as it states, version after version—“at the request of the Wesleyan Society,” “at the request of the Church Missionary Society,” “at the request of the London Missionary Society.” My lord, the Bible Society has done far more than printing at the request of this or that society—she has exerted a little gentle pressure on every society. We, perhaps, being engaged in other matters, might have been backward in placing in the hands of our native Churches the whole Word of God. The pressure, then, has come from this society—“Why do you tarry? Give us more of that blessed Word. We are ready to print it. We are ready even to support your own missionaries, if you cannot do it yourselves, while they are engaged in this work; only let the whole Word of God be given to the native churches.” And this Society has done it, not only for the Church Missionary Society, but for every other society. My dear brethren, the secretaries of other societies are present to answer for themselves; but there is a royal munificence in the British and Foreign Bible Society. It takes our Version, or the Version of any other society, and puts the broad stamp, which is the stamp of common property, on every one of its Versions; and it is no longer the Version of the Church Missionary Society or any other society—it is the simple Word of God. That little stamp is on the backs of all the books which the British and Foreign Bible Society issues, and it is the broad arrow which makes it common property for the defence of the whole nation—no longer belonging to this or that society, but belonging to the Church of Christ in every clime and in every age.

THE MISSIONARY SOCIETIES.

The funds of the several great missionary societies exhibited considerable difference. Their position, respectively, as compared with last year, was as follows:—

	Increase.	Decrease.
Church Missionary Society...	—	£14,447
Wesleyan " " ...	£673	—
London " " ...	—	8,513
Baptist " " ...	922	—

It must be remembered that we have included special funds in this statement, and that a decline in some of these may sometimes result in a large gross decrease, without the steady current of wonted liberality being checked, or the great work retarded, to the extent which might, at first, seem inevitable. The comparison, it will be noticed, is between one year and another. The comparison between receipts and expenditure, in the case of the Church Missionary Society, showed a deficit of 6,100*l.* upon the society’s ordinary operations. The falling off from legacies and benefactions was large; but the amount contributed by the associations was the largest ever received from that source, being upwards of 1,100*l.* more than that of the previous year. The London Missionary Society also reports that its decrease of income arises from the falling off of special funds, the ordinary contributions being larger than usual.

We subjoin the gross sum received from all sources, by each society, during last year:—

Church Missionary Society.....	£149,182
Wesleyan " " 	140,678
London " " 	85,363
Baptist " " 	30,468
Total.....	£405,691

Among the points of interest at these meetings, we may notice the speech of the Bishop of Victoria, at the Church Missionary anniversary, which, slightly varied, according to circumstances, would probably be found to express the feelings of British missionaries of all denominations in all quarters of the globe. The Bishop said :—

We, in the distant land of our wanderings, in a different sense of the term, often turn in thought, and revert to the scene of our great missionary gathering. We picture to ourselves the vast assemblies of the supporters of Missions congregated in this hall. We reckon the difference of longitude, and calculate the time at which your meetings successively occur—the early morning meeting for spiritual communion and prayer, the address of your president, the reading of the committee's report, and the heartstirring appeals which follow. Two years ago this day, as I sailed along the western shores of the Australian Continent, I transferred myself in imagination from the Southern Indian shores, and observed this commemorative festival. From my Buddhist temple lodgings in Japan I accompanied you in mind in watchful meditation through the scenes of this recurring festival. We were stationed far abroad, but there is a chord of missionary sympathy vibrating in responsive accents to our appeals for help, telling us that we may look to be supported by your example, and by the assurance of your continued help; and although wide continents and deep oceans separate us from the land of our fathers, be assured we forget not England, and England's Church, and England's Church Missionary Society; and we enter somewhat into the feelings of the Psalmist when he said, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget its cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth."

Laymen might perhaps with some advantage be more frequently found among speakers on these occasions, when a testimony like that subjoined can be borne by them. We quote from the speech, at the same meeting, of the Right Hon. Joseph Napier, ex-Chancellor of Ireland :—

I speak very humbly. I speak in the presence of many of my fathers and brethren around me, but I think that I have served a very gracious Master; He has brought me the greatest honour, and He has comforted me on every side. I have had one of the greatest positions that a mere subject can aspire to in these realms, and He has now given me leisure and opportunity to testify of Him. I have had my day of science. I love literature, but let me bear the simple and honest testimony that, after all, there is only one thing in this world worth living for, and that is to live and to serve the Lord Jesus.

The operations of all the societies exhibited features of great interest. The Church Missionary Society called attention to the spontaneous action of the natives, both in seeking and in spreading the truth. "This feature," said the report, "has become so marked and important at the present day, as to excite in the minds of your committee the inquiry, whether we are not entering upon a new era of missions; whether we may not apply the Divine illustration, 'When the fig-tree putteth forth her leaves, ye know that the summer is at hand.' This spontaneous action in the midst of heathendom becomes more significant when viewed in connexion with the revival movement in many parts of Christendom, and now extended to North Tinnevely and Jamaica." Here are some of the facts relating to the Tinnevely revival :—

There has been an important revival movement at the north-west extremity of the province, and there has also been an independent and large increase of converts in the south-eastern extremity. The first movement began among a few school-children, who became suddenly affected by an earnest desire for the pardon of their sins. It rapidly extended; native teachers, hitherto supine, worldly-minded, and even living inconsistently with Christian profession, became deeply penitent, and powerful preachers among their friends and neighbours. . . . The second encouraging movement in the older districts of the Tinnevely Mission is far more extensive, and mixed up with feelings of unalloyed hope. The origin of the movement is to be traced to special prayer-meetings at the commencement of last year, which, in many instances, have been kept up. Accessions of converts have been much larger than in former times. In the first six months of the year they amounted to 216 souls. In another of the Tinnevely districts the report is that 607 persons have been brought into the fold of Christ. A third missionary states the statistical returns show an increase of 781 converts during the year, and the attention of the people at the public services and to the preaching of the Gospel has shown a marked improvement. Although, therefore, the same spirit of revival has not been witnessed in the South as in the North, yet the Holy Spirit's influence has fallen on the hearts of the people as the gentle dew from heaven. In the whole of the returns enumerated—and returns have not been received from the whole of the district—no less than 1,600 converts have been made.

In the Baptist Missionary Society's report a leading feature was the Jamaica revivals, with the details of which our readers are already familiar. At the London Missionary Society's meeting the painful duty devolved upon the directors to relate the death of nearly all the members of the Makalolo Mission. It is some slight relief to this dark page in the history of missions to have the opinion of those best competent to judge, that they did not perish, as had been reported by the natives, from poison, but from the effects of the climate. At the Wesleyan Missionary meeting, the absence, from illness, of Thomas Farmer, Esq., the Treasurer, was a source of universal regret.

He lingered but a few days, and then entered into his rest.

MISCELLANEOUS SOCIETIES.

A mere enumeration of all the societies which might be classed under this head would exceed our limits. We content ourselves with the mention of those which seem to demand it from some special circumstance. First, we have to report the formation of a new association—the British Beneficence Society, the object of which is to systematise giving for the cause of God, by making it bear a definite proportion to every man's income, by promoting the laying by in store on the first day of the week, and by quickening vigilance in the application of charitable expenditure. The society was inaugurated by two public meetings, at the first of which—a public breakfast—Sir Hugh Cairns presided. This society bids fair to fulfil its promise of becoming the auxiliary of all, and the rival of none other. The Colonial Church and School Society has changed its name, and will henceforth be called the "Colonial and Continental Church Society." This designation far more accurately indicates the functions of the institution which is doing good service in the cause of Evangelical truth. The present state of the East imparts to the Turkish Missions Aid Society more than ordinary interest. The meeting, which was addressed by Lord Shaftesbury, Mr. Layard, Sir H. Rawlinson, Dr. Pratt, from Aleppo, and Dr. Perkins, from Persia, was worthy the important object which they met to promote. We conclude with a quotation from the speech of Dr. Perkins, which gives, in a few sentences, the outlines of one of the great moral revolutions of which the American missionaries have been privileged to be the instruments, together with the Doctor's remarks upon the indirect results of British benevolence extended in aid of American activity:—

The Nestorians now number about 150,000 souls, about one-third of whom were in Persia or ancient Media, and the remaining two-thirds in Kurdistan, or ancient Assyria—the whole being thinly scattered among the Mohammedan population, by whom they were treated almost as serfs. When the missionaries first settled among them, they were so ignorant that they had scarcely heard of America, or even of Europe. They found them artless, confiding, entirely accessible, retaining the ancient simplicity and forms of their ancestors, and reverencing the Bible as the only rule of faith. They had never had pictures or images in their churches, they never practised confession, never held the doctrine of purgatory; so that it seemed not without reason that Church historians had usually designated them as the Protestants of Assyria. Yet with all this simplicity there was no adequate idea of the truths of salvation as a living system. By the blessing of God great and glorious changes had since taken place among these people. The labours of the American missionaries early took the three-fold form of education, the press, and the oral preaching of the Gospel. As regarded education, not a single female could read when the missionaries first went to Persia. Very few of the men could read. In place of this state of things the missionaries were now able to point to between three and four thousand intelligent readers of the Scriptures, of both sexes. There were two chief seminaries or colleges, one for males and the other for females. From the former there had already gone forth sixty native preachers of the Gospel, able and faithful ministers of the Word, well-cultivated, intelligent, and devoted to their work. From the female college there had gone forth about 100 well-cultivated and trained graduates, who, in the various relations of wives, mothers, and teachers, had exercised an influence not inferior to that of the male graduates as regarded the advancement of the Gospel among the Nestorian people. Within the last twenty years, there had been issued from the mission press more than 80,000 volumes, including several editions of the Scriptures. From the first the missionaries regarded the preaching of the Gospel as the paramount object of their work. The Nestorian clergy at once opened to them their pulpits, and from that time to the present they had continued to preach in them. There had been ten or twelve most interesting revivals, issuing in the conversion of hundreds of souls, and in marvellous transformations of character, especially among the female converts. In Persia, as in every benighted land, the missionary must descend several degrees lower among the females to reach them than among the males. There were no terms in the Persian language answering to our "wife" and "home," for the simple reason that these did not exist, in our sense, among the people. That little fact spoke volumes. "Woman" and "house" were the nearest approximations to "wife" and "home;" but what a wide interval was there between! Perhaps "Topsy," in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," would convey the best idea of ordinary women in Persia. Yet, through the educational labours of the missionaries, and the blessing of God resting upon them, there had been raised up within a few years a number of refined, cultivated, intelligent young ladies, and the work of female elevation is still progressing. The reformation in the Church of the Nestorians, interesting and important as it was in itself, was only a means to an end—namely, the conversion of the millions of Mohammedans among whom Providence had placed this ancient sect of Christians. It was, he said, twenty-seven years since he first met Sir Henry Rawlinson in Persia, and from that hour to the present, the noble representatives of this country in Persia had not only given an ample protection to the American missionaries, but had in every way in their power aided and encouraged in their work. This was the more important, because the United States had never had a representative in Persia; and he earnestly prayed that God would prosper and bless that country, which was the bulwark of Protestant Christianity, from the rising to the setting of the sun. He believed there was no one thing which so strongly bound together the hearts of American and English Christians, as the aid rendered by that society to American Missions in the East.

THE "ESSAYS AND REVIEWS."

The notorious "Essays and Reviews" are at length about to become the subject of judicial inquiry. We subjoin the communication in which this announcement is officially made. It is addressed by the Bishop of Salisbury to the Archdeacon of Dorset:—

"The Palace, Salisbury, Whit-Monday, 1861.

"Dear Mr. Archdeacon,—Last week I informed Dr. Rowland Williams, whose name is prefixed to one of the essays in the book entitled 'Essays and Reviews,' that I have determined to institute legal proceedings against him in the Court of Arches.

"I have come to this decision most reluctantly, and only after the most anxious consideration of the consequences which may arise out of the course which I have now adopted. But my duty seems to me clear. As I still agree with the opinion expressed in the letter addressed by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, on February the 12th, to one of my rural deans, the Rev. H. B. Williams, with regard to this and the other essays, and as I believe (on the very best advice) that the writer of this essay has brought himself within the reach of the ecclesiastical law, I cannot escape from the conclusion that I am bound to endeavour to show that the Church of England does protect her members against such false teaching as is contained in different parts of Dr. Rowland Williams's essay.

"I will only further say that the feeling of my clergy, as expressed to me both privately and in public addresses, with regard to this essay, has quickened my own sense of responsibility about it, and that I am now acting in full reliance on their prayers, that the issue of these proceedings may be such as to vindicate the truth of God, and that we may be all kept from mixing up with the pure feeling of loyalty to the Church of England any leaven of bitterness and want of charity.

"I shall send a copy of this letter to the two other archdeacons of my diocese.—I remain, &c.,

RELIGIOUS AWAKENING IN ABERDEENSHIRE.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Dear Sirs,—I wish to give you a few particulars regarding the religious movement in the part of Aberdeenshire on Don side. You may judge of my surprise on finding, on my return thither, that, whereas the good work seemed to be going back, and what was done more than swamped by a fearful inroad of Satan, now a most glorious movement, most manifestly of God, had, in its turn, successfully stemmed the mighty torrent of evil. I saw there the fulfilment of the principle so clearly laid down in Holy Scripture, both by example and express teaching, that, "when the enemy cometh in like a flood, the spirit of the Lord lifteth up a standard against him." The opposition which grieved us so much had apparently ceased. A large number of young people had been converted, some of whom had established a meeting for prayer weekly among themselves. Two Sunday-schools were established. All this was after the ordinary means of grace had been removed. One man had his son and daughter, who were at home, converted, and another daughter, residing in the island of Jersey, was converted at the same time. Was not this really an answer to prayer offered up for her conversion? and have we not here a most ample encouragement to parents in praying for the conversion of absent children? Nor would we restrict the application of the principle to parents. We should like to apply it to brothers and sisters similarly circumstanced. Another man, who kept a shop, was converted, and his wife, servants, and shopboys, all at the same time. But perhaps the most remarkable case was that of a lad, who had been for some time a perfect pest in the neighbourhood—one could read malice in his very countenance. This case was all the more remarkable from its having been brought about simply by two or three words spoken kindly to him by one of the shopboys just alluded to; which, by the power of the Spirit, so wrought on his heart and conscience, as to effect an entire transformation in him. Next day he was seen going about telling one and another "what a dear Saviour he had found." It was my lot to converse with this lad, after the aforesaid change, having had occasion to know him well before, and, while hearing how he had spoken of these things, and with such evident delight, and beholding the change in his very visage, I could not but wonder with amazement at what God had wrought.

I could give more particulars respecting individuals whom I visited, and with whom I conversed, did I think it desirable to publish details. Convinced I am that it often injures a work to do this too much. Enough has been said to show that there has been a work of God there. I may also add, that there were at least one or two cases somewhat similar to those of physical prostration in Ireland.

While in Aberdeenshire last March I gladly accepted an invitation to visit Skene, a lovely spot between the rivers Dee and Don, where mountain scenery, with wood and a beautiful lake, combine to give an inexpressible charm to the landscape. But there were also the attractions of spiritual loveliness; a most interesting revival having, as I understood, taken place, more extensive than that to which I have just alluded. The situation was about eight miles to the south of the other locality, the two parishes simply touching one another at one point. The work there was totally independent of that at the other place, illustrating the isolation and independence of each individual parish in that part of the country. Owing to this circumstance, the church in the other parish to which I formerly ministered, being the only Evangelical church in the parish, was to some extent a parish church. Here, then, we had two centres eight miles apart, and the rays of light emanating from each simply meeting at one point. The means which led to the work were similar in both cases. The Free Church minister of Skene, who invited me thither, had been in Ireland. On his return, his soul being stirred by what he had there seen and heard, he told his tale to the people. They were led to pray for a similar work there; and it did come, and so as to astonish the people. Now a large proportion of the inhabitants of the parish, which is a very large one, nearly a dozen miles in length, are converted, and in one part of it almost every soul seems to give evidence of a saving change. On approaching my destination from the neighbourhood of Aberdeen, I could discern as I passed through part of the parish a difference in the outward appearance of the people. An air of pleasant civility and cheerfulness appeared in their countenances, very similar to what I had noticed in Ireland, and not like what one usually sees among Aberdeenshire peasantry. The sudden change in this respect struck me forcibly. Being on foot, I could observe all this more narrowly; I could see some at their cottage doors with Bibles in their hands. On my arrival at my friend's house—which, with the Free Church, is delightfully situated on the margin of the lake—between three and four on Saturday, I found a congregation assembling in the church, who expected me to preach to them. On entering I saw a most interesting assemblage of females. For some time past had there been such an assemblage every Saturday at four. They exhibited a degree of fervour in the devotional exercises quite unusual in Scotland, the opposite being, as is well known, so generally observable there. They also listened with fixed attention to the Word, evidently enjoying the truth. My friend told me that he had reason to believe, from personal knowledge, that almost if not all these people were converted to God. Some remained for conversation, according to usual custom, at the close.

Next morning I walked five miles to Echt, where, westward from Skene, and in the adjoining parish, is a Scotch Baptist Church. I had for long known this congregation and their pastor. He had again and again told me that, during a ministry there of twenty years, he could scarcely say he had known of any case of real conversion to God. The congregation had dwindled from about thirty to little more than half that number, and the number in communion with them had varied from about a dozen to half-a-dozen, or perhaps less. They were entirely composed of those who had left other religious bodies and joined them. Now, however, I found the state of matters was totally changed. The pastor told me that he had been surprised to find in visiting the families round about him that they were all more or less in earnest about their souls. There had been many real conversions to God, and, among these, his own son and daughter, with his son's wife. The particulars of some of the cases were very remarkable. If asked how all this came about, I would say it was by carrying out the principle of the Evangelical Alliance. A godly man came to labour at Echt as Free Church minister. He at once called on the Baptist pastor. His friendly intentions were reciprocated. The Baptist pastor came to his week-day services, and was so pleased with them, that, though himself not a member of the Alliance, and prejudiced against it, he thought struck him that, as he and his brother held so much in common, they surely might act a little in concert with advantage. The consequence was the establishment of regular united religious exercises. Just then the work of conversion began to appear. Soon after, a series of open air meetings were held on the banks of the lake of Skene, which were attended by all these aforesaid brethren, and accompanied by the happiest results in the case of the people who assembled. By this means new fire was imparted to the Echt brethren. Returning home, they strengthened each other's hands, and thus the work which had already commenced received a new impetus. When there last June I had preached in this place, and been then struck with the change in the congregation. Now I was still more so. I addressed them on Jacob calling "the name of the place Peniel," and it was evident that some felt that humble sanctuary to be truly Peniel. One or two persons were weeping apparently under soul concern. Formerly I have said similar things in that pulpit without any apparent effect. How clearly this shows the barrenness of the mere machinery of the Christian ministry, and the necessity of oil to the wheels.

In the evening I went back to Skene, and preached to a very full and attentive congregation. Though the weather was wintry and somewhat inclement, and I was by no means well, I spent a very pleasant Sabbath there, and found its exercises quite a feast. Monday was still more inclement, the snow flying thick. A large number, however, assembled as usual at eight in the evening, some coming from a distance of several miles, though there was no moon. The Spirit of God was most manifestly moving in them while I addressed them from "Christ Jesus, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things." It was evident that they sympathised with the subject to a degree not usual in congregations. Some were visibly affected during the service, though they did not exactly exhibit the manifestations I had seen in Ireland. The lateness of the hour did not prevent many from remaining for conversation. Altogether it was evident there was a remarkable work here. I had seen nothing like it except in Ireland. Though I, as a stranger in that locality, studiously avoided speaking much to them about their religious experience, I could see that face answered to face wherever one could go.

I may also add that in two or three parishes in the neighbourhood of Huntly there has been a similar work. During this visit I met with the Free Church minister of one of these parishes, and was quite convinced, from what he told me, of its reality. I had also the testimony of another minister who had been preaching there to the same purport. The origin of the movements in that quarter may be traced to an open air meeting which was convened at Huntly under the auspices of the Duchess of Gordon, a lady who seems to lay herself out in every way in her power to promote the cause of God. Would that there were many like her in high places! This meeting was followed by the happiest results. It was no doubt blessed directly to the conversion of many who there assembled. This I feel assured of from the testimony of those who were present.

In Aberdeen I fear we can say little as yet as to anything of the kind; they have for long had their daily prayer-meetings; and while I was there last they had special daily religious services in different churches alternately. One of these I attended, and addressed them, it being their wish to have as great a variety in the preachers as possible; and to get strangers if they could. The attendance was good, and the people attentive, and somewhat impressed; but it seemed to me as if they were not accustomed to have the truth set before them so earnestly as I naturally felt it my duty to state it. Two or three remained for conversation, and I was given to understand that that was the first occasion on which such a thing had occurred since these services commenced. Altogether I was disappointed with Aberdeen. Still good has been done there; and I should be sorry to be suffered to undervalue it. Let us seek and pray that it may increase ten, yea, an hundredfold.

I am about to start next week on another visit to Aberdeenshire, and have no doubt that I shall then see what will still have gladdened my heart. Since I was there, I have heard favourable accounts in the general as to the satisfactory state of the work. I shall also have to visit Auvergne, in the South of France, in July, and shall be glad, as I once before did, to furnish you with any gratifying intelligence I may have to give from that locality.

LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. YOUNG'S DEFENCE OF HIS TRANSLATION OF THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

WE have received a reply from Mr. Robert Young, of Edinburgh, to our remarks upon his translation of the Song of Songs. We are sorry to say his letter is written in such a style as to preclude its appearance in our columns. In our previous remarks we treated Mr. Young with kindness and consideration; and, while we endeavoured to point out his mistakes, we fully acknowledged his merits. We were favoured last year with a letter of a character similar to the present from Mr. Young, criticising an article in our last volume, on "The Romanising of the Indian Alphabets," to which we replied very mildly, out of respect to Mr. Young's position at that time as a literary missionary of the Irish Presbyterian Church. We regret, however, that Mr. Young is unable to understand the amenities of controversy, and that, from his too exalted opinion of his own abilities and acquirements, he refuses to take "the rebukes of a friend."

Mr. Young's reply has impressed us painfully with the feeling that he is not an educated man, and that he is in a great part unacquainted with the subject on which he writes so dogmatically. He claims to be able to construct grammars and lexicons for himself, and utterly despises any reference to the labours of others in those departments, except when they happen to coincide with his own views.

We have doubts respecting the propriety of taking any more notice of Mr. Young's reply, as we cannot argue plain points of Hebrew grammar with him. Yet forasmuch as he has obtained some locus standi on the other side of the Tweed, we will very briefly notice his remarks. With respect to his principles of translation, we have said enough in our article in the number of last month, which we would commend to Mr. Young's study a second time, as he has mistaken our meaning on several points.

Mr. Young writes: "The reviewer denies the use of רעד in chap. i. 7, in the sense of 'delight.' This denial is based on the lexicons and the English version." We must call the fact to his remembrance that we have not denied that the verb bears that meaning, but only that there is no instance of its being used "ABSOLUTELY" in that signification. We hope he is aware of the technical use of the term. In defence of his rendering of תרביץ, he says: "Probably the reviewer is not aware that the ך is omitted in certain MSS., so that the word may be only in the kal conjugation; or that, admitting it to be hiphil, the hiphil is not always or necessarily causative." But, firstly, it makes no difference whatever whether the ך be omitted or not, unless the punctuation be altered, and we will be obliged to Mr. Young if he can name any Hebrew MS. in which his reading is found. Secondly, though the hiphil conjugation is not always causative, the hiphil of the verb in question always is, unless we except this passage, which we maintain cannot be proved to be an exception.

In defence of his rendering of פִּרְעוֹן, the proper name Pharaoh, as an abstract noun signifying "freedom," Mr. Young refers us to Judges v. 1, which is quite beside the question, as the word פִּרְעוֹן does not occur there. His rendering is unsupported save by his own supposition, that the song was written "when Solomon was just appointed king," and therefore "it must have been before he knew anything of Pharaoh, or his horses, or his chariots!!!" Mr. Young considers the comparison of a woman to a fine steed as a "gross absurdity," notwithstanding that it is a simile used by poets like Theocritus and Horace, and is moreover the simple meaning of the passage in chap. i. 9. He explains his own translation by supposing that "Solomon compares the Church, the ideal bride, to his own joyful exulting queen, sitting in a royal chariot, "though he has not informed us why a royal chariot should be designated as "chariots of freedom;" nor has he proved, nor can he prove, that סוסה can mean anything else than "a mare."

We no longer marvel why Mr. Young should set about composing, not compiling, a Hebrew lexicon for himself, when we find him asserting that מֶלֶךְ means "chief," instead of "a thousand." On his principle, that because such a rendering may fit into, and make sense in a given passage, therefore it is correct, anything and everything can be proved out of Scripture; we may translate the word "to speak" as meaning "to weep," the pronoun "I" to mean "You," or any other equal absurdity.

We refer Mr. Young back again to our criticism on his rendering of chap. vii. 7—10, as he has there again missed the point of our remarks, and we do not wish to trouble our readers with needless repetitions. We would note in conclusion that Mr. Young has altered his translation, "He speaketh with the lips of the aged," into "strengthening the lips of the aged;" "taking דִּבֵּב as the root of דֵּב, a bear, so called from its strength," as Mr. Young says, regardless of the cognate languages in which the root has the idea rather of "creeping," and from which, from its peculiar walk, the idea of "the bear" has really been derived.

BRIEF LITERARY NOTICES.

Regeneration. By WILLIAM ANDERSON, LL.D.
Second Edition. Edinburgh: Black. Pp. 322.

We do not wonder that this work has gone into a second edition; it will be a far greater occasion of surprise if it does not speedily reach a third. There is a charm about it and a power, which an original thinker alone can impart to a book. And this is the more remarkable, because the subject is neither new nor unfrequently treated of. Its vital importance, both as a dogma in the system of Evangelical Christianity, and as a necessary element in Christian character, must always assign to it a permanent place in religious instruction, and lead to its being often discussed. But no preceding publication on the subject that has ever come under our notice has rendered this unnecessary. Not that we could not, if that were our purpose, question some of the author's positions, qualify some of his statements, and criticise his style; but we are little disposed to do either. Take the book as a whole, and it is one of the most instructive and striking treatises which in modern times we have met with.

A Guide to the Study of the Holy Scriptures.

By the Rev. E. A. LITTON, M.A. London: Seeley. Pp. 402.

THIS book everywhere exhibits the hand of a master. It treats of topics, it is true, which, in one form or another, are treated of in all similar works; but the method and style of the writer are not only his own, but are so logical and perspicuous, as greatly to facilitate the end at which he aims. The author's remarks on the inspiration of the Scriptures, although comprised in a very few pages, are judicious and sufficient. He is more concerned to establish the fact than to define the mode; and, while he notices difficulties which no candid theologian will pass over as though they either had no existence, or no force, he maintains, in the face of them, that in its entirety the Bible is an inspired book. On the qualifications necessary for the interpretation of the Word of God there are also some satisfactory observations, showing the insufficiency of human reason to discover or comprehend spiritual truth, and the consequent necessity of the teaching of the Holy Spirit. Altogether, the work is the fruit of sanctified scholarship, and will be a valuable help to those who use it.

The Atonement: its Reality, Completeness, and Extent. By ROBERT S. CANDLISH, D.D. London: Nelson. Pp. 400.

WE have too long delayed our notice of this admirable work. The truth is, we have intended, for some months past, ourselves to discuss the important subject of which it treats, and then to have done more ample justice to its reasonings than we can in one of our ordinary brief notices. This, however, may yet be done, while in the meantime we commend it in the present manner to the attention of our readers. Among the present tendencies of theological speculation, we regard none as more fraught with danger than those which go to subvert the received Evangelical views of the doctrine of the atonement. It is not now so much a question of the nature and limits of the atonement as of its reality; for while the term is conserved, another meaning altogether is put upon it. Divine law and Divine justice are eliminated from the definition: it has no aspect towards God, and no relation to His moral government; it means only some influence exerted upon human character, some improvement effected in the heart of man. This view of the design and actual operation of the death of Christ pervades the writings of the Maurician school of divines, and is to be found in volumes of sermons which have been delivered from the pulpit, and are now spreading this shallow but pernicious doctrine by means of the press. The pulpit and the press must both supply the antidote. To some extent they are doing so, and this volume of Dr. Candler is very valuable in this light. We do not here pretend to analyse and examine it critically, but we recommend it as a good book, written with great force and perspicuity, and upholding, by strong arguments and Scripture expositions, the real expiation of sin, and the real cancelling of guilt, and the real remission of punishment, and the real pacification of justice, and the real fulfilment of the law, and the real exhaustion of its curse, and the real reconciliation of God by the substitutionary and sacrificial death of His incarnate Son.

The History of the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century. By the Rev. J. H. MERLE D'AUBIGNE, D.D. Abridged and translated by the Rev. J. GILL. London: Routledge.

INTERESTING as Dr. Merle's history is, it is prolix, and, although we would not part with it as a library book, we are not sorry that it is now put in an abridged form into the hands of younger readers. The editor has fulfilled his duty well and ably. His translation is free without being inexact or loose, and his abridgment retains much of the vivacity and graphic power of the original work.

Evidence of Christianity derived from its Nature and Reception. By JOHN BIRD SUMNER, Archbishop of Canterbury. London: Hatchard. Pp. 333.

THIS is a timely republication, avowedly occasioned by the "Essays and Reviews;" for although it cannot of course meet the objections of that insidious volume, in the precise form which they assume there, those objections have in reality little in them that is new. The evidences, moreover, of the Divine origin of Christianity—although they may be exhibited under various modifications, to suit the varying tastes of the age, and the diversified tactics of its assailants—are essentially the same at all times. By all means, let the new lights of advancing science, while they are made by one class of writers to throw a sinister hue on the credibility of the Christian doctrine, be shown by another and a better class only to give additional confirmation to the inspired Word of God. But we are not, therefore, to abandon the old proofs, as if they were no longer pertinent, or their force were exhausted. Should philosophy declare a miracle to be antecedently incredible—which, however, we may be assured a sound philosophy never will—we show still, relying upon its own proper evidence, avow our faith in the resurrection of the Redeemer of mankind, and demand what solution of the fact could be rationally given which did not render it into a supernatural interposition.

The able work of the Archbishop is too well known to require commendation, but, as nearly forty years have elapsed since it was written, we may very well presume that the younger clergy are not so conversant with it; and to them especially, as well as to intelligent and thoughtful young persons of all classes, we recommend it.

Sermons Preached in Rugby-school Chapel in 1858, 1859, 1860. By the Rev. FREDERICK TEMPLE, D.D. London: Macmillan and Co. Pp. 390.

WE wish Dr. Temple had published better sermons than these, or none at all; better, we mean, in the sense of clear, definite, Evangelical teaching. As it is, although they may, perhaps, to some extent modify the opinion he has created of himself, by his chosen position in the volume of "Essays and Reviews," they but too plainly make it manifest that his theology is fundamentally wrong. If anything is fundamental to Christianity, it is the doctrine of atonement by the Cross of Christ. But Dr. Temple says that we are so totally in the dark as to what that doctrine is, that no intelligible, consistent statement has ever been made of it, nor possibly can be. Here are his words: "Every explanation that has been attempted is overthrown with an ease which warns us that explanation is impossible. Every statement of the doctrine which has ever yet been made always contains those self-contradictions, those manifest breaches of the plainest rules of logic, which indicate that the human intellect is baffled. . . . We cannot understand it, but we can be thrilled by it. We cannot say how or why we need it, but we can feel our need of it. We cannot explain its strange power to help us, but we can walk by its help." That there is an unfathomable mystery in the atoning death of Christ is readily admitted, but when we are told that we cannot say how or why we need it; that every statement of it is self-contradictory and illogical; that it is something to thrill but not to instruct us something we may feel but cannot understand, we are constrained to say that such statements tend to the utter subversion of the Gospel, and to the production of infidelity. If, in matters of infinite moment, a man's religion requires him to renounce his understanding and build upon his feelings, the process will not be long which makes him a fanatic or a sceptic. In other parts of his volume, however, although Dr. Temple is so far consistent as to manifest his incapacity to say what is the proper nature and use of the atonement, he possesses light enough to tell us what is not its design. Thus he says: "We come not here (that is, to the Cross) with desire to stand right in God's sight. We come not thinking of His justice, and asking to be made holy, that His justice may have nothing to find fault with. We come not asking to be spared His wrath." And this is the theology which underlies and runs through all the sermons. The death of Christ is never exhibited in its relation to law and moral government. Its aspect is wholly human, its influence wholly subjective. In the author's own words, it is not meant to set man "right in God's sight." Whatever it does for him it does not cancel his guilt, it does not pay the penalty of his transgression; indeed, it is hard to learn from Dr. Temple that there is any guilt to be cancelled, any penalty to be paid. For these defective views of the atonement spring from, and are indicative of, defective views of sin. Sin is a much more terrible and solemn thing than simply a violation of the laws of human propriety, or consistency, or honour; it is not cowardice, or vice merely, or even an injury done to a loving Father; it is the "transgression of the law," the law of God, the law which says "the soul that sinneth, it shall die." The Lawgiver is not merged in the Father, nor does the love of the Father in the character of the blessed God prevent the proper action of the justice which is the distinctive attribute of the Lawgiver. But we cannot pursue the subject here. It is sufficient that we have laid our finger upon what we deem the unsound, essentially unsound, part of the teaching of these sermons.

Evangelical Alliance.

NOTE.—The Evangelical Alliance is responsible only for what is inserted under this head.

MEETING OF THE COUNCIL AND OTHERS FOR CONFERENCE.—Agreeably to the notice contained in last month's report of proceedings, a meeting of the Executive Council was held in Freemasons' Hall, on Friday, May 10, to which delegates of local committees and other members of the Evangelical Alliance, were invited for conference on the general interests of the Alliance, and with special reference to recent events.

A large number of private members of the Alliance, from various parts of the United Kingdom, in addition to members of the council and delegates, were present, including, among others, General Sir J. Rowland Eustace, K.H., Admiral Vernon Harcourt, Hon. and Rev. Leland Noel, Captain Littlehale, R.N., Thomas Chambers, Esq., Q.C., Rev. A. S. Toolwall, Rev. W. H. Trendell, Rev. W. Mansell, Rev. R. H. Webb, Rev. W. C. Bishop, Dr. Camps, Colonel Reynolds, Rev. R. G. L. Blenkinsopp, Richard Mullings, Esq., and H. Roberts, Esq.

The following were also present as delegates appointed by the several committees of subdivisions at the following places:—

Edinburgh—The Hon. Lord Benholme and the Rev. D. T. K. Drummond.

Glasgow—J. Henderson, Esq., and Rev. J. W. Borland.

Liverpool—R. A. Masfie, Esq., and James Howell, Esq.

Nottingham—Rev. Canon Brooks.

Wolverhampton—Rev. Dr. Morton Brown and Colonel Hobson.

Bath—J. W. Little, Esq., and Rev. Sewell Hamilton.

Cardiff—Thomas H. Graham, Esq., and John Nanson, Esq.

Guernsey—G. Pidcock, Esq.

Reading—Rev. Thomas Welsh.

The Potteries—Frederic Bishop, Esq., and Titus Hammersley, Esq.

South London—F. G. Millar, Esq.

Sir C. E. Eardley, Bart., occupied the chair.

The meeting was opened by the singing of a hymn, the reading of Scriptures by the Rev. Dr. Morton Brown, and prayer by the Rev. D. T. K. Drummond.

Previous to the discussion of the special subjects for which the Conference had been summoned, some ordinary business was transacted by the Council. Inter alia, the minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed; a resumé of the proceedings of the committee in the interval was also read; and forty-one new members were admitted.

A letter from a friend in Belfast was then submitted to the meeting, expressing an earnest hope that the Evangelical Alliance will in due times suggest to the Lord's people the observance of a week of special prayer, at the opening of the next year, as was done at the beginning of the present year, and remarking upon the "advantageous position which an alliance of Christians of the various Evangelical bodies occupies with regard to the repetition of such a proposal to their fellow-Christians throughout the world." The writer continues: "I feel that if the Alliance had never accomplished anything else than the bringing about an universal concert of prayer, as it was this year privileged to do, it has done an untold good."

The subject having been considered, the meeting unanimously adopted the following resolution:—

"The Council, cordially approving the suggestion on this subject contained in the letter just read, refer the matter to the Committee of Council, to carry it into effect."

We may add that the Committee, agreeably to these instructions of the Council, have already commenced taking action in this matter.

A communication from Dublin was also laid before the meeting, relative to an effort now being made to have the Royal Dublin Botanic Gardens opened to the public on the Lord's-day, and asking for the exercise of any influence which the Evangelical Alliance might possess to counteract a movement which, if successful, it is feared, may be followed by other encroachments on the sanctity of the Sabbath.

It appears that the society to which these gardens at Glasnevin belong has been for more than a century incorporated by Royal Charter, for the encouragement of agriculture and other useful arts in Ireland. The members consist of noblemen and gentlemen, who are admitted by ballot on the payment of specified amounts. It has of late years become associated with the Educational Department of the Board of Trade, and is aided by an annual parliamentary grant. On several occasions, similar attempts to open the gardens on Sundays as a place of recreation have been made, but the Society, by large majorities, has each time negatived the movement. On the last occasion the votes were only 18 for it, and 129 against it. Failing in the Society itself, the parties have for the last few months commenced and carried on an agitation beyond its range, and by obtaining signatures to petitions at Roman Catholic Chapels, and by other methods, they have sought to induce the Government to coerce the reluctant majority of the Society by the threatened withdrawal of the parliamentary grant. The measure, it is stated, is strongly deprecated by the Protestant ministers and people, who have striven in every way to oppose it. With this view a deputation has waited on the Lord-Lieutenant, and a public meeting has been held in Dublin, presided over by the excellent Dean of St. Patrick's, and in which Christians of the different Evangelical denominations took part.

The Council having heard these statements, and feeling themselves bound to use whatever means might be within their reach to aid these united efforts of Evangelical Christians in Dublin, especially in consideration of the Evangelical Alliance having been originally designed to endeavour, in subserviency to the great object of uniting Christians "on the basis of the great Evangelical principles held in common by them," "to exert a beneficial influence on the advancement of Evangelical Protestantism, and on the counteraction of Infidelity, Popery, and other forms of superstitious error and profaneness, especially the desecration of the Lord's-day" (see Manual), adopted the following resolution, in which all present at the meeting cordially concurred, viz. :—

Resolved: That, mindful that among the objects for which the Evangelical Alliance was formed, stands specially prominent the defence of the sanctity of the Sabbath, and fully sympathising with the friends in Ireland in their opposition to the evil with which they are threatened, the Council recommend to the Committee to take such steps as may seem best, to aid in effectually resisting a movement which must, in their judgment, tend to the secularisation of the Lord's-day.

After the transaction of the above business, the special subjects for Conference were introduced. Among others, who took part in the proceedings, were Sir C. E. Eardley, Bart., Lord Benholme, Hon. and Rev. Leland Noel, T. H. Graham, Esq., General Alexander, Thos. Chambers, Esq., Q.C., Rev. Canon Brooks, Rev Professor Hoppus, Colonel Stace, Rev. T. R. Birks, Major Scott Phillips, R. A. Macfie, Esq., Rev. W. M. Bunting, H. C. Tucker, Esq., Rev. Dr. Fry, Rev. Dr. Steane, Rev. D. T. K. Drummond, Rev. A. S. Thelwall, F. Bishop, Esq., J. Corderoy, Esq., Rev. Dr. Morton Brown, Rev. S. Minton, W. R. Ellis, Esq., Dr. G. H. Davis, Rev. R. Eckett, Rev. Dr. Hewlett, Rev. W. Sandford, Rev. A. D. Campbell, Rev. J. Smith, Rev. Sewell Hamilton, and Rev. W. Harris. The tone of the meeting was in harmony with the great principles which the Evangelical Alliance was formed to promote; and the various addresses delivered, and the cautions and suggestions expressed, were characterised by "due forbearance and brotherly love," a mutual and tender regard for each other's convictions on minor points of difference, and, at the same time, by an unhesitating avowal of uncompromising adherence to the great and essential truths of the Gospel, on which Evangelical Christians are agreed, and which they are bound, especially at the present time, to maintain pure and undefiled.

In the course of the Conference, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted.

I.

Moved by the Rev. Canon Brooks, of Nottingham; seconded by the Hon. Lord Benholme :—

The Delegates and Members now assembled rejoice in the opportunity afforded them of meeting the Executive Council, and conferring with them on the state and prospects of the Evangelical Alliance. They desire to record their warm and unabated attachment to the great principles and objects of the Alliance, and their deep conviction of the increasing importance of this organization for promoting a real fellowship among true Christians, and for taking united action, whenever and wherever needed, for the defence of religious liberty and the interests of vital Christianity throughout this world.

II.

Moved by T. H. Graham, Esq., Edmond Castle, Carlisle;

seconded by the Rev. Thomas Welsh, Reading :—

The Delegates and Members take this opportunity of urging upon the Executive Council to adopt such measures as they may deem best for a wider extension of the Alliance at home, and a fuller and more frequent communication with our Christian brethren abroad, persuaded that passing events and the work of the Holy Spirit in many lands are pointing with increasing clearness and power to the duty of all Christians to witness for truths of paramount importance, and to maintain them in a spirit of perfect harmony and love.

III.

Moved by the Rev. W. L. Thornton, of London;

seconded by G. Pidcock, Esq., Guernsey :—
That in order to assist the Executive Council in extending the Alliance throughout the United Kingdom, and in forming local Committees, Ministerial and other Members are earnestly requested to aid the Secretaries in making arrangements for public and social meetings, at which deputations will be present to advocate the claims of the Society.

IV.

Moved by the Rev. Samuel Minton, London ; seconded by the Rev. W. M. Bunting :—

That looking to the great importance of this Alliance, and the desirableness of disseminating as widely as possible its principles, and increasing its means of usefulness, Ministers be earnestly requested to preach periodically a sermon to their people on behalf of the Alliance, and to make a collection in aid of its funds.

At the close of the proceedings about sixty members of Conference remained to dinner. And in the evening a devotional meeting was held, at which an address was delivered by the Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel.

ANNUAL SOIREE.—The Annual Soirée of the Evangelical Alliance took place at Freemasons' Hall, in the evening of April 30. A considerable number of Metropolitan and Provincial members and friends assembled at tea, and after some time spent in partaking of refreshment and in social intercourse, the public meeting was held in the large hall. Robert Baxter, Esq., presided, and after the singing of a hymn, the Scriptures were read by the Rev. W. M. Bunting, and prayer was offered by the Rev. A. S. Thelwall; the addresses which then followed were of an unusually interesting character. After some remarks by the Chairman, the Rev. W. Arnott spoke on the subject of the Religious Revival in Glasgow. The Rev. D. Macafee, of Lisburn, referred to meetings held in that Hall in the early years of the Evangelical Alliance, and then spoke of the Irish Revival. He was followed by the Rev. J. S. Jenkinson, Vicar of Battersea, who gave information of a remarkable manifestation of the Holy Spirit's gracious influence at the present time in his parish, and mentioned instances of the holding of meetings for prayer by labouring men and by young persons. The Rev. Robert Wallace, Secretary of the French Canadian Missionary Society, made a statement of the valuable work of that society. Lord Benholme then spoke of religion in Edinburgh, and referred with much feeling to the civil dissensions in America. The Rev. Dr. Perkins, having responded to the kind allusions to his native country, by Lord Benholme, proceeded to speak of his labours for the last twenty-seven years among the Nestorians in Persia, after which Dr. Macgowan made some remarks on the character of the inhabitants of Japan.

The Rev. Mr. Layer, of Wurtemberg, the Rev. Theophilus Redier, of Etienne, and the Rev. Mr. Wiberg, of Sweden, were also prepared to speak, had time permitted, respecting real Christianity in their respective countries. The addresses delivered were necessarily brief, but they conveyed much information, and all of them referred to the diffusion of the principle of union amongst those who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, and its importance in relation to the efforts made to promote His kingdom.

The meeting was closed with the Doxology, and the Benediction by the Rev. P. La Trobe.

PARIS: ANNUAL MEETING OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

The subjoined letter has been addressed to the Foreign Secretary, by Pastor A. Racine Brand :—

"Fontainebleau, May 18, 1861.

"Dear Brother,—I send you the following brief account of our annual meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, held on the 23rd of April, which I hope will be interesting to the readers of your Monthly Intelligencer.

"The meeting took place at the Chapelle Taillout, under the presidency of M. Lucien des Mesnard. In the absence of the Secretary, Pastor G. Fisch, (who is at present in America), the annual report was read by M. Guillaume Monod, the esteemed chairman of the Committee.

"He made some cursory reflections on the true mission of the Evangelical Alliance, and recalled the memory of subjects of sadness and joy, which the friends of the Alliance have, in the course of the past year, experienced. The mission of the Alliance is, as every one knows, to exhibit the union of real Christians, who are one in faith. One of the subjects of sadness touched upon in the report was the decline of brotherly love. It seemed to him, M. Monod said, that Evangelical Christians had kept aloof from each other more than formerly. The pastors had, in many cases, been behind Christian laymen in largeness of heart. There had been in England a glorious maintenance of Scriptural truth, an almost universal protest of Evangelical Christians against a publication dangerous to the faith; but, at the same time, we had all been grieved at the bitterness which some had displayed in their zeal for the upholding of the truth, and which had sadly disturbed the peace among the children of God. Let us learn how both to love and to defend the truth, and in defending the truth let us never confound with its foes brethren who, though they appear to be in danger of erring on some points, are yet faithful. M. Monod also alluded to the principal differences which separate Christians in our days, and to which they very often seem to attach too much importance—viz., differences of opinion with regard to the relation of Church and State. The difference between the Free Church and the Church connected with the State, is one of position rather than of doctrine. They both pursue the same end, and will one day reunite in the same eternal liberty to which the Church of Christ has a right. Another subject of grief was the death of the King of Prussia, that sincere friend of the Evangelical Alliance, who is now with his Saviour in the eternal assembly of the Evangelical Alliance in heaven. Again, what at the present moment was happening in Spain must fill our hearts with profound sadness, for there we have brethren who suffer and are in bonds for the truth's sake. Sweden now afforded a subject of joy, for though the laws of that country are not yet what they should be, the Gospel is there making such progress that persecution will soon become impossible. M. Monod then spoke of the Revivals that have taken place in England, Scotland, Ireland, the United States, Germany, Jamaica, and in the French Missionary Stations in South Africa, and he concluded with the prayer that the turn of France might soon arrive. After this address, of which I have indicated only a few points, several speakers followed, and successively gave their testimony in favour of the value of the Alliance.

"A hymn having been then sung, and prayer offered by the Venerable President of the Consistory of Nîmes, M. le Pasteur Borrel, the meeting terminated.

"In the evening of the same day a very large assembly met again in the same place, to partake of the Lord's Supper. M. le Pasteur Casalis, Director of the Mission-house, Paris, conducted the service, which worthily crowned the services of our religious anniversary meetings, and which, I am convinced, produced a salutary impression on all who were present. The following pastors of various denominations took part in the service, viz.: Martin, of Condé (Wesleyan); Dez, Paris (Baptist); F. Monod, Paris; Ph. Boucher; Malan, Piedmont (Vaudois); Gaume, Arbousset (late Missionary to South Africa); Petavel, of Neuchâtel; Borrel, Armand-Delille, &c., &c.—a lively and touching exemplification of the Evangelical Alliance which united us. After a hymn and prayer by M. G. Monod, we separated, with our hearts greatly moved."

BULGARIA.—The following letter, just received from the Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance at Constantinople, contains further information of the movement in the Bulgarian Church:—

Constantinople, May 14, 1861.

TO SIR COLLING HADLEY, PRESIDENT OF THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

My dear Sir,—In my letter of a fortnight since, I mentioned that Ali Pasha had declared to the Bulgarians that their Bishops were to be banished in accordance with the sentence pronounced upon them by the Greek Patriarch. My letter had hardly left the city, when we were informed that the Bishop of Philippopolis had been actually arrested and sent into exile. A letter from that city represents that he was suddenly seized by an armed force, marched like a felon to the Pasha's palace, and immediately hurried out of the town under guard, without any opportunity to arrange his affairs, or even to take leave of his family.

An attempt was made, a few days later, to arrest also the two Bishops residing here, but the Bulgarians rallied in such numbers to their defence, that the Government desisted for the time from the attempt. Between two and three thousand persons gathered at the Episcopal residence, and declared to the officers sent to arrest the Bishops, that they should not be taken; that if there was any fault in the resistance to the Greek Patriarch, it was the fault of themselves, the people, and not of the Bishops. The Bulgarian community sent a petition also to the Sultan himself, praying for his interference in their behalf. In answer to this, orders were issued, suspending all proceedings for the time being. This was during the week preceding the Greek Easter (May 5). Taking advantage of this partial concession, the Bishops performed Divine service with their people on that Sabbath to their great satisfaction. It appears, however, that the Government only wished to get safely through Easter without exciting a tumult, for at the close of the succeeding week (May 12) they proceeded to execute upon the Bishops the long-threatened banishment. By sending an overwhelming military force the arrest was effected, and the Bishops were sent off into some part of Asia Minor, where I do not as yet know. What the Bulgarians will now do remains to be seen. They may, in sheer despair, go over in large numbers to the Roman Catholic Church. The convention of delegates from various parts of Bulgaria, of which mention has been made in previous letters, met here during the week preceding Easter; but the very hostile attitude taken by the Government at that time seems to have prevented their attempting to act at all as a convention in respect to the objects for which they had assembled. I have good reason to believe that the banished Bishops and some of their friends were very much disposed to avow their acceptance of the cardinal Protestant doctrine of the supremacy of the Scriptures, and to claim from the Government on this ground their right to protection as Protestants. Some preliminary steps were taken in this direction, but the plan was not carried out from the fear that it would prove a premature movement in reference to its influence upon the nation at large. The banishment of these Bishops closes one chapter of the history of this Bulgarian movement. We wait with interest for the opening of the next. But, whatever may be the result of this particular struggle for deliverance from the domination of the Greek Patriarch, we believe the work of reformation among the Bulgarians will go on to an ultimate triumph. For that triumph we labour and pray with hope.—Yours most truly,

EDWIN E. BLISS.

THE LAW AND THE GOSPEL: THEIR DIFFERENCE AND HARMONY.

If I give unto the Law his proper definition, and kepe it within the compasse of his office and use, it is an excellent thing. But if I translate it to another use, and attribute that unto it which I should not, then do I not only pervert the Lawe, but also the whole Scripture. . . . Let every thing serve in his due place and order. Let the Sun shine by day, the Moone and the Starres by night; let the sea geve fishes, the earth graine, the woodes wilde beastes and trees, &c. In like maner let not the Lawe usurpe the office and use of another, that is to say of Justification; but let it leave this onely to grace, to the promise, and to faith.—LUTHER. Blackletter Translation, A.D. 1577.

In that part of his epistle to the Galatian Churches, in which St. Paul discourses on the different offices of the Law and the Gospel, he introduces one of those abrupt and pregnant questions which are so characteristic of his manner, and so suggestive to the mind of his reader. "Is the law then," he asks, "against the promises?"* The question implies the possibility of its being understood to be so. To prevent, however, such a conception from taking possession of the mind, he immediately interposes his emphatic and wellknown Μη γένοιτο! † "God forbid!" As though he had said, "There is no antagonism between them, no inconsistency even; they differ from each other, but they are in perfect harmony; they fulfil different functions, but they are both subservient to the same end."

Before proceeding with the subject to which we devote this paper, it may be well to define the contrasted terms of the question. These are the Law and the Promises.

By the latter term, the Apostle is not to be understood as if he were speaking of the promises generally, but of the specific promises made to Abraham, and fulfilled in the dispensation of the Gospel—with a special reference, however, to its grand fundamental doctrine of justification, not by works of law, but by faith in Jesus Christ. These Abrahamic promises all definitely culminate in this privilege. For they are all comprehended in the final words of God's gracious declaration, made to him after the virtual sacrifice of his son: "In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." ‡ But those words are a prediction of Christ, and of the method of salvation to be afterwards fully revealed in the Gospel. So St. Paul interprets them: "The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed. So, then, they which are of faith, are blessed with faithful Abraham." And, in a subsequent verse, "Now, to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ."§ It is plain, therefore, that the "Promises," as we here use the term, is but another word for the Gospel, of which the principal and characteristic feature is salvation by grace through faith.

By the other term, "the Law," the Apostle refers to that promulgation of the will of God which was made through the mediation of Moses, four hundred and thirty years later than the transaction on Mount Moriah. His own words are the proof: "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect."§ This law consisted of two parts, the moral and the ceremonial. The former was not then for the first time made known, as will afterwards require to be remarked, nor was it peculiar to the Mosaic economy. It consisted of those first principles of moral rectitude which arise immediately out of man's relation to his Creator and his fellow-men, and which at that time were reduced into ten precepts, and written on two tables of stone. The latter or ceremonial part of the law, comprehended all that relates to the polity, both civil and ecclesiastical, of the Jews. It prescribed their various religious observances, and was designed to contain, and yet to conceal as under a veil, those Evangelical doctrines which receive their complete development in the Gospel. It is chiefly of the moral law, as distinguished from the ceremonial, that we shall have to speak in the following observations.

Of the Law and the Promises, then, as thus defined, St. Paul asks, "Is the law against the promises?" And the reason of the inquiry is this: The Promises, in other words the Gospel, or the covenant of grace, provides a righteousness, whereby we are justified through faith; but the Law subjects us to a curse for our sins. Hence there appears to be an opposition between them. The one condemns the sinner, the other justifies him, and so they seem to be in conflict with each other; while yet they are but the several parts of the same system of religion, the two related and necessary portions of the same scheme of Divine and revealed truth.

I.

This one great difference between the Law and the Gospel comprehends many differences, to all of which it is the key; but which are, nevertheless, of sufficient importance to possess a distinct individuality, and both to require and reward a separate examination. Some two or three of them only can be now touched upon.

And we may begin with a difference which, although at first it seems to be only of a circumstantial nature, involves in fact an essential distinction. The Law and the Gospel differ in the manner in which they are respectively communicated. The Law was written originally on natural conscience. In man's condition of innocence, no external communication from the Lawgiver was required to make it known. Adam intuitively understood his duties. And even now moral obligations are discoverable, in part at least, by the light of nature. So St. Paul reasons: "For when (he says) the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; which show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts, meanwhile, accusing or else excusing one another."* Hence the remark previously made, that the Law was not then originated when it was promulgated from Sinai. That was only its republication. It had existed long before, being, in fact, coeval with the creation of man. It is not, however, to be inferred that its Sinaitic promulgation was unnecessary. On the contrary, such had been the influence of depravity, that the original record on the human heart was almost obliterated. Only a few faint traces of it remained: so that, if it was not to be totally lost, it had become necessary that it should be republished, and incorporated with Divine Revelation. The Gospel, on the other hand, is by that Revelation exclusively made known. The knowledge of it comes, not through the medium of conscience, not by the light of nature, not by the deductions of reason, but by an external communication from God. Its very nature, as a manifestation of mercy to the fallen, supposes the necessity of some extraordinary and supernatural conveyance. For whence could reason infer that if, instead of being loved and obeyed, the Creator should be condemned and insulted, He would make such a provision of grace as the scheme of human redemption unfolds? Such information man possesses no means of acquiring. It belongs purely and exclusively to the province of Revelation. Facts confirm these statements; for wherever man is found, we find him acquainted, partially at least, with the Law—he possesses some standard by which he distinguishes right and wrong—but wholly ignorant of the Gospel. Until the good tidings are carried to him, he hears nothing of a Saviour, and he knows nothing of mercy.

This difference is next observable in the points of view from which the Law and the Gospel severally contemplate man. The Law contemplates him as he was originally created, the Gospel contemplates him in his actual condition; and between these two points of view, there is the widest possible divergence. When man came forth from the hand of his Creator, he not only possessed all the capacities requisite for rendering a perfect obedience to the Law, but those capacities were under a holy bias. There was no darkness in his understanding, no obliquity in his will, no turbulence in his passions, no depravity in his heart. Erect in the grandeur of moral integrity, he stood, as in his redeemed and restored nature he will again ultimately "stand, perfect and complete in all the will of God." The Law was made for man then, and it has not been altered since. Its obligations and requirements are precisely what they were when they were first engraven on the human conscience. The fall has deprived man of the disposition to obey, but assuredly it has neither obliterated, nor in any way impaired, God's right to claim his obedience. That claim rests upon man's relation to God as his Creator, and is thus deduced from the first and most simple principles of justice. These principles are immutable, and that relation is undisturbed by any events that have occurred in the subsequent history of man; and as the principles from which the Law is deduced, and the relation which gives it birth, are both of them unchanged and unchangeable, so also is the Law itself. It is an imagination as vain and unphilosophical as it is unscriptural, which supposes that the Law is softened down, and accommodated to man's present circumstances, in which his moral powers are depraved. "The perfect law of God (to quote the language of one of the greatest of our Puritan divines) is attuned to the possibility of the upright man, not to the infirmity of fallen man." * The Law has undergone no alteration consequent upon the apostasy. Its claims are in no degree abated, its strictness is in no measure relaxed. Nor is it right that they should. If the Law was originally "holy, just, and good," it is so still, and if any man seek to be justified by it, let him perfectly fulfil it, and he will not seek in vain. The Gospel, on the contrary, contemplates man, not as God made him, but as sin has ~~made~~ made him. It accommodates itself to his actual condition as a guilty and depraved creature, lost and helpless. The very design of the Gospel is to provide for a new case in the government of God. And it is itself, therefore, a new expedient, unknown to a condition of being the elements of which are integrity and moral strength. It stoops to fallen humanity; it comes with provisions of grace. The message with which it reassures our confidence is this, that "when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly." † "It is not the prescription of a rule of life to the innocent, but the annunciation of a stupendous method of relief for the sinner." ‡ Jesus Christ came "not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." With Him, therefore, is, not the Law that convicts, but the blood that atones—not the justice that condemns, but the sovereignty that pardons, the righteousness that justifies, and the grace that renews. He is the fountain of life, and the light of men, and the rest of the weary, and the refuge of the guilty, and the hope of the penitent, and "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." "Overlooking all petty varieties and subordinate distinctions (to use again the eloquent language of the writer just quoted), the Gospel places the whole human race on one level; abases them all in the dust before the Infinite Majesty; and offers, indis-criminally, a provision of sanctification to the polluted, and of pardon to the guilty. These are the glad tidings; this is the jubilee of the whole earth." *

The Law and the Gospel differ still further in the motives to which they appeal, and the opposite considerations by which their claims are enforced. The one appeals to fear, the other to love; the former operates by terror, the latter by hope; in the one obedience is enjoined on the penalty of death, in the other it is encouraged by the promise of life. To the first enunciated law a threatening was annexed; the first dawn of the Gospel was ushered in with a promise. The spirit engendered by the Law, as a necessary consequence, is a spirit of bondage, but that produced by the Gospel is a spirit of liberty.† The Law begets in us a profound sense of veneration by its inflexible justice, which knows no relentings, and is never softened into pity. Its eternal rectitude and spotless sanctity, its stern but righteous denunciation of sin, and its impartial condemnation of all sinners, fill the mind with reverential admiration, but it is admiration blended with despair. We stand in its awful presence with sentiments akin to those with which we gaze on Alpine altitudes crowned with their chaplets of untrodden snow—the very image of eternal but inaccessible purity. Its moral grandeur creates a sense of the sublime, but begets no affection, and inspires no hope. The Gospel, on the contrary, since its essence is mercy and its errand salvation, awakens at once confidence and joy. If its origin is Divine, its sympathies are human. It pities our weaknesses, stoops to our miseries, is the lenitive of our sorrows, and the overflowing fountain of life and peace. Like the Law, it never connives at sin, but unlike the Law, it pardons the sinner. Like the Law, it sets before us a standard of perfect holiness, but unlike the Law, it stretches forth the hand which helps us in our efforts to reach it. Like the Law, it upholds the justice of God, but unlike the Law, it reveals His mercy. Like the Law, it affords all necessary guarantees of order and obedience, but unlike the Law, it leaves open a door of penitence and restoration to the transgressor. It thus appeals to a class of motives which never come within the scope or knowledge of the Law; it persuades but never coerces, it allures but never compels. The one is the taskmaster driving the terrified slave to his hated toil, the other is the loving parent eliciting and rewarding filial duty; the one is Mount Sinai, upon which the Lord descended in smoke and fire, the other is Mount Zion rejoicing in the sunshine, and bathed in the dews of heaven.

The difference between the Law and the Gospel is seen finally in the ultimate power of each. The former ends in condemnation, the latter in justification unto life. Each runs out to its final issue, each attains its proper result. The Gospel justifies and saves, the Law condemns and punishes. The one is "the ministration of death," the other is "the ministration of the Spirit." The end with a view to which the Gospel was originally promulgated, was that men, although guilty, might be saved through faith, and to this end it attains: for "it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek."‡ He that believeth is justified. By his faith he acquires a righteousness which entitles him to life, so that it becomes a just thing on the part of the Lawgiver and Judge to cancel his guilt, to absolve him from punishment, to treat him as a righteous person, and after death to put him in possession of an immortality of blessedness; for which, meanwhile, he obtains a moral preparation and fitness through the gracious operation of the Holy Spirit. And this is the ultimate power of the Gospel: it is "the power of God unto salvation." The Law, on the contrary—having no right of forgiveness, and incapable, from its very nature, of relaxation—necessarily issues in the death of the transgressor. And it is its glory that it should. No greater indignity can be done to it than to suppose that it varies with the varying conditions of man. It is eternal, fixed, immutable, alike in its requirements and its sanctions. It speaks now in terms terribly emphatic and brief—"The soul that sinneth, it shall die;"* and its last accents will be heard when the Just One shall say, to all who have not sought a refuge from its condemnation in the Cross, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."† This is the ultimate power of the Law—it is the power to "turn the wicked into hell, and all the nations that forget God."‡

II.

To these differences between the Law and the Gospel a few remarks may be added, showing their harmony with each other.

Their harmony, then, is seen in the fact that they are parts of the same system of moral government. Each has an office and a use in God's government of mankind, but each has its own use and its own office. The Gospel does not supersede the Law, nor, on the other hand, does the Law nullify the Gospel. "The covenant that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect."|| What the Apostle thus affirms of the Sinaitic law is as true of the moral part of it as of the ceremonial. The Gospel was not disannulled by the republication of the former, any more than by the contemporaneous enactment of the latter. Nor, on the other hand, did the introduction of the Gospel immediately after the fall militate against the Law, which existed antecedently to it. The fact that the Law continued to exist, is sufficient proof of this, and it is a proof also that the Law did not stand in the way of the Gospel, which took effect notwithstanding its continuance, and, of course, in harmony with it. It thus becomes evident that it was never the design of the blessed God, in publishing the Gospel, to cast any disparagement upon the Law, still less to reveal a method of salvation antagonistic to it. And that they are parts of the same system of moral government is still further evident from the circumstance, that they run together through all the Divine dispensations which have followed each other since the fall. Before that disastrous event there was Law but no Gospel, for then no Gospel was needed, but ever since there has been Law and Gospel both. Adam was not sent out of Eden a lawless creature, neither was he sent out a hopeless creature. The Law remained, but the Promise was added. The dispensation which then ensued was not a dispensation without the Gospel; and the dispensation which has ensued since, and was introduced by Christ, is not a dispensation without the Law. On this point His own words are conclusive: "Think not (He says) that I am come to destroy the Law, or the Prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil."§ Indeed, man's apostacy, which gave occasion to the introduction of the Gospel, gave occasion also to the promulgation of the Law. For "the Law (as the Apostle teaches) was added because of transgressions;"¶ because, that is, sin had rendered it necessary that the Law should speak in louder and distincter terms than while its utterances were restricted to the retired chamber of the human conscience. The effect of sin upon the understanding was to blind it, and upon the conscience to harden it, and thus to render men insensible to sin, ignorant alike of its true nature and consequences, and, therefore, all the more disposed to indulge in it. Hence the promulgation of the Law became a necessity, and was an act of kindness. And since the event which makes the Gospel necessary, makes necessary also the republication of the Law, we have another proof, in that very circumstance, that the Law and the Gospel are parts of the same system of government, and so are not opposed to, but in harmony with, each other.

Their harmony still further appears in their mutual subserviency to glorify Christ.

¶ Gal. iii. 19.

That the Gospel glorifies Him needs no proof. Christ is its sum and substance, its beginning, its middle, and its end. Take away Christ, and more definitely still—for when so many ambiguous voices are heard on every side, it becomes us to speak with precision—take away the satisfaction for sin made by the death of Christ, take away the doctrine of Christ's substitution, the innocent dying for the guilty, and making a real expiation and atonement for transgression, and it is the Gospel no longer. The worth of the Gospel consists in the testimony it bears to Him as the Redeemer who hath "redeemed us from the curse of the law, having been made a curse for us,"* and as the promised seed in whom all the promises meet and are fulfilled. Christ is "The Lord our Righteousness."† Believing in Him we are justified; and the one supreme and permanent design of the Gospel is to hold forth and glorify Christ in this character. Hence it is fundamental to right views of the nature of the Gospel, and fundamental to a right reception of the Gospel, that, renouncing every other hope, spring from what quarter it may, a man should look to be justified, wholly and alone, by faith in Him. And it is thus that the Gospel pre-eminently subserves the glory of Christ, since it leads sinners to Him, and to Him only, as the Saviour of the lost. But the Law, when rightly understood, does the same thing. It reaches the same end, although by a different method. For by showing the true nature of sin, and its inevitable consequence, it cuts the sinner off from all hope of salvation by means of his own righteousness. The Law never justifies the sinner, but, on the contrary, always condemns him. It discovers to him his vileness, and misery, and helplessness. It restrains, and commands, and punishes; but it speaks nothing of mercy, and provides no forgiveness for the transgressor. But it convinces him, at the same time, that unless he is forgiven, he must be lost. Its eternal obligations are not to be dispensed with, its terrific penalty will not be remitted. The Law must be fulfilled, or the case of the sinner is hopeless. These are truths which the Law teaches as of necessity, for they are inherent in its very nature. And thus the Law broken shows that salvation is impossible unless the Law be fulfilled, and so leads the law-breaker to the Divine law-fulfiller: to Him, in other words, who by His sinless obedience and atoning death has become "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth."‡ In the person of Christ, therefore, and in His finished work, the Law and the Gospel find their central point of meeting, and harmoniously concur in glorifying Him.

Their harmony, it may be remarked finally, is seen in their combined influence in forming and perfecting Christian character. The consummation of the Gospel is not attained in the personal experience of the recipients of its grace, until they appear "without fault before the throne." It is an inadequate representation of the design of the Gospel, to say that its end is reached when the sinner is pardoned, or even when the believer is justified. These are ends in order to which the Gospel has been revealed, and ends which the Gospel accomplishes; but they are not its ultimate end. There is something in conception more glorious, and more glorious in reality, than pardon or than justification, and that is perfect sanctification. The sublimest and the most complete conception we can form of heaven, is not that it is a place of perfect happiness, but a state of perfect holiness; and the loftiest and most spiritual of all the Christian precepts is that of St. Peter, quoting from the Mosaic law, "Be ye holy, for I am holy."|| To produce this holiness is the design of all God's dealings with us, whether in the Law or the Gospel, in Providence or in grace; for "this is the will of God, even your sanctification."§ But if we now inquire what the holiness of a creature is, in what his perfect sanctification consists, no other answer can be given to our inquiry than that the holiness of a creature consists in a perfect conformity to the Divine law. So that when there comes to be a complete correspondency between the believer's character and the law of God, then, but not before, even though he may long antecedently have been justified, will he be perfectly holy. And this consummation will be attained at length. The prayer of Epaphras for his friends at Colosse, that they "may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God,"* will be answered in the persons of all the redeemed. Every child of God may appropriate the language of the Psalmist, "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness."† Marvellous, therefore, it is to see how, although at present the Law does homage to the Gospel, the Gospel, in the end, will do homage to the Law. That which was first shall also be last. After long ages of dishonour, cast upon it by the rebellion and lawlessness of an apostate world, the Law will emerge again into its original dignity, and resume its ancient role. As there was no Gospel in Paradise, because none was needed there, so, for the same reason, there will be none in heaven; but the everlasting supremacy of Law. Christian character will stand forth in grand parallelism with its lofty precepts of moral virtue; its summit of inaccessible purity—as it once seemed—will be actually reached, and nothing, thenceforth, disturb the order or the harmony of the government of God. "Wherefore (to conclude in the language of Hooker—language as just as it is eloquent), of Law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power; both Angels and Men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all, with uniform consent, admiring her as the Mother of their peace and joy."‡

DORNER ON THE PERSON OF CHRIST.¶

DR. JOHN AUGUSTUS DORNER is in many respects a remarkable man. He was born in 1809, and after studying at Tübingen, he returned to Neuhausen, his native place, as the assistant of his father, who was pastor there. Four years later, or in 1836, he went back to Tübingen, where he took his doctor's degree in theology; after which he undertook a journey into Holland and England, with a view to investigate the condition of the Protestant Churches. Since he went back to Germany, he has occupied professorial chairs at Tübingen, Kiel, Königsberg, Bonn, and Göttingen, where he resides at present. He has always distinguished himself by his clear and profound insight into the most difficult questions of theology; and although his language is sometimes obscure, and even when distinct not always in harmony with the forms of expression current among us, he has, nevertheless, rendered immense service to the cause of Evangelical literature, both as a professor and as a writer. The work on which his reputation as an author mainly rests, is that of which we give the title below. It first appeared at Stuttgart, in 1839, and was afterwards republished in 1854, in a more enlarged and perfect form. As an historical work it is every elaborate, and of the highest order, and the author undertook to supplement it by a work on the doctrine of which it is the history. Of this second work we believe two volumes only have been given to the public (1845, 1846). Besides these, he has written some other treatises, and has been an active contributor to theological journals, as well as a partaker in the theological controversies of his time.

The Messrs. Clark have performed a useful service by the undertaking of Dr.

¶ History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ. By J. A. DORNER. Second Division. Translated by Rev. D. W. SIMON. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark.

Dorner's work on the Person of Christ. The first volume, translated by the Rev. Dr. W. L. Alexander, is not yet ready, but is expected to appear in a few months; it has, however, been thought best not to wait for that, but to issue the first volume of the second division at once, and we have no doubt the plan adopted will meet with general approval. Of course there is a disadvantage in having the second volume first; but still, we believe the publishers have acted wisely, especially as the work is divided into two great periods. The first of these periods is terminated by the Council of Constantinople, in A.D. 381, and the second extends from that point to the year 1800. The volume now before us comes down to the sixteenth century, or to the commencement of the Reformation, and therefore includes the first great epoch of the second period, reaching over about eleven centuries. When we call to mind the multitude and diversity of theological writers who flourished during these eleven centuries, and the difficult and obscure problems which they discussed, we shall appreciate the immense labour which Dr. Dorner has had to perform, and we shall be willing to concede to him the honour which he justly deserves.

The prominent place which was occupied by controversies respecting the Person of Christ is very remarkable, and yet not unaccountable. That He was really man as well as truly God, was the orthodox doctrine derived from the Scriptures. But this statement did not answer all the questions and doubts which were raised, and it was continually found that new explanations of the "great mystery of godliness" were either demanded or offered. To this we owe the rise of so many sects and parties, the occurrence of so many heresies and schisms, the production of so many works, and the calling of so many councils. The Ebionites and the Gnostics, the Manichæans and the Sabellians, the followers of Paul of Samosata, of Photinus, and of Arius—were all partakers in controversies respecting the Person of Christ, and were but the precursors of many who succeeded them under various names. It was asked whether the divine and human in Christ constituted one person or two; whether there was really one nature, or whether there were two; whether there was one will, or whether there were two. Hence arose such words as Monophysites and Dyophysites, Monothelites and Dyothelites, and others; which, however harmless now, were once potent enough to stir the most violent passions of men. The lives of Arius and of Nestorius are as exciting and diversified as a romance, and call to mind some of the fiercest of theological disputes, and some of the most disgraceful of religious persecutions. The Greek Church, like its Oriental allies, as we may term them, was deeply imbued with a spirit of restless inquisitiveness and speculation. It was continually striving to fathom and to explain the profoundest mysteries of religion, and yet its members were often most intolerant towards each other when they did not agree. Many of their hottest controversies are now but little understood, and their history is yet more obscure. Every new chapter of Oriental Church history in the fourth and two or three following centuries only reveals more completely the violence which religious disputes occasioned, as well in deeds as in words. And we can hardly wonder sometimes that the Mohammedan heresy arose, and like a deluge swept them almost from the face of the earth, and nearly into oblivion. The Rationalism of these churches, constantly striving to bring within the range of human intellects, and into the limits of man's words, the deepest and divinest truths, was sadly fatal to piety and faith. Creeds took the place of faith, and zeal for them the place of piety, while charity, meekness, and other graces, were all but forgotten. Even missionary activity was often little better than a party propagandism, which endeavoured to make up for its losses at home by conquests abroad, or which sought to forestall or supersede the agents of a rival system.

These things may not be generally known, and yet they are none the less true. The hostile parties gave each other opprobrious names, and used the most violent language in speaking to or of each other. The Condobaudites, who argued that there were as many natures, substances, and godheads in the Trinity as there were persons, were called Tritheites, or believers in three Gods, although they said they believed in but one. We find John Philoponus charged with believing in four Gods. When abuse and misrepresentation failed to silence an opponent, it was not uncommon to secure his confinement in a convent, or his exile to some remote district. Many cases are on record where extreme violence was had recourse to, and some in which the penalty was death. If violence was out of the question, and could not be practised, the "parties drank and swallowed down the turbid dregs of the mutual excommunications" which they "pronounced against each other and their respective adherents." Or, when mutual excommunication was impracticable, the one in the seat of authority excommunicated the other. Thus, by various means, they divided and subdivided, until they were split into fractions as well as factions, over questions more frequently arising out of the Person of Christ than any other. The traces of these feuds remain to this day, in the existence of the Monophysites, the Nestorians, and the orthodox churches of the East. So many were the evils arising out of the different answers to the question of our Lord, "What think ye of Christ?"

There was less of this in the West, where men were generally less speculative than in the East, or at any rate less inclined to reason on the mysterious Person of Christ. It is true that questions arose out of this, but it is apparent that they occupied a far less prominent place than did discussions on more practical, and, we may say, human questions. The doctrines of almost all the heretics, whose existence troubled the Church, so far as they relate to the Person of Christ, originated in the East. If the views of Manes, and Sabellius, of Arius, or of Nestorius, took any hold upon the West, they were, nevertheless, importations from the East. Heretics there were in abundance in Europe, but usually their errors related to a different class of subjects. The form of a ceremony, the proper period for a festival, matters of order and discipline, were continually debated; but, as Dr. Dorner says, he who is the teacher and the truth in the East, becomes, in the West, the lawgiver and the king. True, abstract questions often arose, as in the case of Pelagius, but even Pelagius found his most formidable antagonists, not at Rome, but in the bishops of Africa, and in the theologians of the East. In the West the idea of authority and of obedience favoured such a state of things, and the hierarchy were more intent in building up a grand and complicated system of Church government, and in weaving an elaborate spiritual network to secure implicit submission; more earnest in founding monasteries and churches, in winning endowments and privileges, in making salvation easy to others and profitable to themselves, in devising rites and ceremonies which should appeal to the imaginations of the devout, and in other matters pertaining to the Church militant; in a word, were more anxious to make the Church militant a Church triumphant on earth, than to weaken their strength and hazard their dignity by discussions of the doctrine of the Person of Christ. In the eyes of the people, the clergy, from the Pope to the parish priest, were as the "pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night"—the symbol and representative of the Divine presence, will, and favour. To fortify themselves in this position was their great task; and we all know how their steady perseverance was crowned, when the sacerdotal principle culminated in Hildebrand, as Gregory the Seventh. Under such a system, as Dr. Dorner says, dogmas are considered to form part of the law, and, therefore, acquiescence in them, when once framed, became a matter of duty, and a sign of obedience. These dogmas were couched in language as precise and unchanging as chemical formulæ, and the admission of the words was universally considered to be inseparably connected with the admission of the doctrine. Not only was the idea intended imagined to be infallibly the truth, but the words in which it was expressed to be the only words which could express it. Priests and people were thus transformed into human parrots, who had no use for their reason, and who had only to repeat what they found in their creeds and liturgies, or in such other writings as were stamped with official sanction. It naturally followed that there was no need for the general possession of the Scriptures, since they did not contain the language in which it had been decided that Christian truth ought to be expressed, and indeed must be expressed. The superseding of inquiry, in matters of such moment as the Person and nature of Christ, brought with it a neglect of all other inquiry, and inasmuch as there remained no sphere in religion for the exercise of the intellect, certainly none in the way of discovery or improvement, "sacramental grace and rules of life" were all in all. And thus the Church was reduced to that Pharisaical condition which our Lord condemns under the likeness of "whited sepulchres." Men cared much about certain forms and ceremonies; they acknowledged that the outside should look pure and fair, but nothing more. So long as the outside was carved and painted, gilded and adorned, according to the approved Church pattern, all was well for time and for eternity.

If it should be objected that various modifications of doctrine were admitted in the Church of Rome, and that, therefore, there must have been some inquiry, we answer, that we can admit the fact, but reject the inference. Modifications of doctrine, so far as they affected the Person of Christ, and His work, only took place when they seemed to be required by some development of the sacerdotal system. They did not occur as the result of calm and diligent study of the Scriptures and search after truth, but they were permitted when they seemed to be needed for the perpetuation of some profitable innovation. Such, for instance, was the doctrine of Transubstantiation and the Mass, which grew up so silently, and as it grew modified so sensibly the view taken of Christ and His work in the Church of Rome. The connexion of this enormous fiction with sacerdotal power, privileges, and advantages, is too apparent to need explanation.

Dr. Dorner calls attention to Anselm as an apparent exception to the general rule, and a kind of herald of the Reformation by means of his immortal work, Cur Deus Homo (Why God became Man); but he remarks that towards its close, even Anselm sinks back into the general tendency of his time, and applies his theory to the support of an ecclesiastical royalty. This is but too true, and equally true is what follows, suggesting that Christ became practically the minister and servant of the Church in after ages. "The reward which Christ earned by His innocent sufferings, and which He did not need for His own benefit, he represents as having been conferred on the Church—a treasure which is the basis, and which it administers for the purposes of its authority." Humiliating as this statement is, it is true. The supposed viceroy was the actual ruler of the world, and the glory of Christ was eclipsed on earth by that of the Pope. That magic, mystic word, the Church, served many purposes, but they generally tended to this—to widen the distance between Christ and the congregation, and to merge His mediators in that of the priesthood, who claimed His authority and the monopoly of His grace.

Until the schism between the Greek and Latin Churches was complete, it naturally happened that they both took part in some great questions. Hence we find several of the popes actively participating in controversies which arose in the East. They were not always on the side of orthodoxy. The name of Leo the Great is inseparably connected with the Council of Chalcedon and the Monophysite disputes of the fifth century, and in his celebrated epistle to Flavian endeavoured to pronounce a final decision as to the true doctrine of the Church concerning the Person of Christ. Boethius, also, who was neither pope nor priest, but a philosopher and a statesman, engaged in these controversies, opposed the Arians, and wrote against Nestorius and Eutyches. Honorius, the first pope of that name, distinguished himself in the Monothelite controversy, as did other popes and Romish prelates of the time. Alcuin was another whose name is connected with the more important disputes respecting the Person of Christ, especially that of the Adeptianists, as they were called. There were, moreover, several councils, as those of the Lateran, of Toledo, and of Frankfort, where these questions were discussed, and decisions pronounced upon them. At a later period the rise of the scholastic system led to the consideration of the doctrine of the Person of Christ. Thus the names of John Scotus Erigena, Richard of St. Victor, Hugo of St. Victor, Amalrich of Bena, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, Peter the Lombard, Albertus Magnus, and of many more, might be mentioned. But, after all, they added little to the results previously attained, and were more occupied with minute details and explanations than with fundamental questions. They took as a basis what had already been accomplished, and had little thought of being anything more than expositors of the creed of the Church. Even when they went further, they never, or seldom, lost sight of this, and wasted their energies in vexatious trifling. There may have been some exceptions, but this was the rule. What shall we say, for example, to questions like that famous one of Thomas Aquinas, etc., "Whether Christ would have come if Adam had not sinned?" The mysticism in which many of them revelled was calculated to do anything rather than to lead to profitable investigations. The same may be said of the philosophical principles known as Nominalism and Realism, which, while they favoured speculation and controversy, rendered very little service to the cause of truth. Even the disputes respecting grace, freewill, and other theological matters, were almost utterly barren of results in relation to the work and Person of Christ. Indeed, we may say the same of the doctrine of the atonement itself. Therefore we conclude that the whole reign of Scholasticism, including its philosophical and mystical Pietism, was unprofitable to the Church on this great subject, and that it threw no new light either upon the Person or the work of Christ. Its decay and extinction was no real loss for the world, but rather a benefit, because it left men more free to return to the sources of truth. Possibly the only advantage which Scholasticism conferred upon after ages, was the disappointment which its results created. It had promised much and given little, and we may therefore adopt the words of Dr. Dörner: "The mind of the Western nations, dissatisfied with what it possessed, turned its eyes in all directions, inquiring whence it could again draw the spiritual certainty and joy which it had now lost. The German mind, in particular, became the theatre on which the entire past intellectual history of man was reproduced, with the design of preparing the way for the great work, destined soon to be accomplished." That great work was the Reformation, which, as the author truly intimates, was due, "not to the forces now in process of decomposition, but to a new outpouring of the Holy Spirit."

At this point the volume closes, and here must we terminate our observations. Our readers will find in this volume not only the amplification and illustration of what we have said, but possibly sometimes its correction. Nevertheless, we have endeavoured to convey to them a general view of the tendencies in operation in the East and in the West during the eleven centuries to which the volume relates. We have seen that during the earlier portion the East is prominent, while the West only casually takes part in the discussions. When, however, the mental activity of the East declined, and the ecclesiastical system of the West was developed, its intellect began to work, and Scholasticism reproduced and refined upon the problems of the past. Scholasticism had its day, and its last hours were those in which the heralds of the Reformation appeared. Their cry may have often been, "They have taken away the Lord, and we know not where they have laid Him;" but happier times were soon to dawn. Men gazed again upon Jesus, as if once more risen from the dead, and we share in their bliss of knowing Him whom to know is eternal life.

Foreign Intelligence.

THE clamours and the crimes of the Ultramontane party, and especially of the clerical portion of it, furnish the chief, and, unhappily, it is a very fruitful, topic to our French correspondent. There are a few enlightened men in that country who understand her great want, and point it out to her; but how little she herself knows it, may be seen in a recent article in one of her popular journals, an extract from which is given in the concluding paragraph of our second French communication. Our third French article opens a remarkable state of things among the Jews. That a deputation from that people should be appointed to attend the Geneva Conference, is certainly a novel, not to say a startling, circumstance. Who can refrain from the devout wish that the intercourse they may there have with united Christians, and the view they will obtain of united Christianity, may be blessed of God to lead them to Christ?

The articles from Germany and Prussia contain much to interest. In the former will be found portions of the speech delivered by the Grand Duke of Baden, at the opening of the General Synod of that little state, in which sentiments are uttered such as we do not often hear from the lips of monarchs. In the latter an account will be found of the religious condition of Berlin, and the efforts that are made to Christianise the lower classes of the people.

A paper on the state of religious parties in Holland, somewhat, perhaps, obscure, will nevertheless interest our clerical readers.

It was natural that the remarks of our Berlin correspondent, last month, on the Schleswig-Holstein question, should call forth a rejoinder from Denmark, to which, on the principle of hearing both sides, we call attention.

And the special attention of our readers we call to the letter from Austria. They will find in it a clear exposition of the new ecclesiastical constitution granted to the Protestant Churches in the German and Slavonian portion of that empire, and the light in which it is regarded by themselves. It contains, also, some interesting notices of the literature of the Slaves. From having personally visited them, we know something of the state of our Protestant brethren in some of the districts referred to, the dreadful oppression under which they have so long struggled, and the consequent feebleness of their small and scattered communities; and we are glad to second what our correspondent says of the importance of fostering these "sparks of light" in those "dark lands."

A resumé of the recent operations of the Waldensian Church in different parts of Italy shows the zeal and activity with which they are labouring to spread the Gospel through that country, politically renovated, to make her inhabitants, as we trust, the more accessible to Evangelical truth. While we write, intelligence reaches us, through the Italian papers, that significant movements are taking place among the Cardinals, in prospect of the approaching death of the Pope.

A chapter of miscellaneous information, which we give this month, contains many items of intelligence, which will repay the reader's perusal.

Turkey and Africa, lastly, send us several communications, from which we may derive encouragement still to labour for some of the darkest portions of the world.

FRANCE.

DISCUSSIONS ON RELIGIOUS QUESTIONS IN THE SENATE AND THE LEGISLATIVE BODY.

Religion and politics have become more mingled in this country. The Popish clergy are animated with an intense feeling of irritation against the Government, and seek, by every means in their power, to attack and destroy the men whom they were wont to flatter. This warfare has produced stormy discussions in our parliamentary assemblies. We may observe, in passing, that the clerical party is willing enough to avail itself of that liberty of public speech which it before so violently opposed; so true is it that liberty, at some time or other, is for the benefit of all opinions.

A petition addressed to the Senate, furnished Cardinal Matthieu, Archbishop of Besançon, with an opportunity for complaining of the severity exercised, in his opinion, towards the priesthood. This reverend personage asserted that the priests were placed under the surveillance of police functionaries, that they were compelled to appear before civil prefects, and that these poor ecclesiastics were subjected to shameful grievances, which they endured in such a manner as to set an example of every Christian virtue! M. Matthieu is rather a poor speaker, and the prolix homily which he delivered before the Senate did not excite much notice among his colleagues. These princes of the Roman Church, as they are called, are deficient in solid learning and talent, and it is easy to understand why they should wish to shut the mouths of their opponents.

The Minister of Public Instruction and Worship replied to M. Matthieu. With a show of great respect, he refuted, with much energy, that prelate's assertions. If certain priests have been reprimanded by the prefects, it is because they have, in their sermons, exceeded the limits of justice, moderation, and even simple decency. Instead of preaching the Gospel, they had poured forth upon the depositaries of legal authority the most vituperative language. The Government had employed great forbearance, and had warned the priests, unofficially, in order that they might not incur a severer penalty. The Minister of Worship concluded by requesting the Cardinal to read to the senators a letter he had recently addressed to him; but M. Matthieu refused, fearing apparently that revelations would thus be made which would compromise the clergy too much.

In the Legislative Body, M. Keller, a young deputy, greatly devoted to Ultramontane principles, delivered a violent philippic. Never, since the accession of Napoleon III. to the Crown, has the Opposition dared to employ language so bitter and outrageous. M. Keller accused the Government of favouring whatever tended to degrade the clergy in public estimation. According to this disciple of the Jesuitical school, all the Romish monks and clergy are models of piety, charity, and gentleness. They fulfil their duties with exemplary fidelity! They are as quiet and unoffending as lambs! What a pity to abandon them to the jaws of the wolves—that is to say, the revolutionists, who are the most abominable and ferocious of human beings!

M. Keller puts on one side all the virtues, and on the other all the vices. Rome and its ministers do an unknown amount of good, while the antagonists of the Papal See are monsters, who, if they had their deserts, would be bound in triple chains!

This intemperate harangue of the Catholic orator (such is the proud title awarded to him by the Ultramontane papers) provoked in the Legislative Body a storm, which has once and again subsided only to break out afresh. The President of the Assembly addressed him in these severe terms: "The Honourable M. Keller has frequently reminded us of what has been preached by the Church. Well, I must here say to him, that the Church has always preached forbearance, concord, moderation, and the forgiveness of injuries. . . . I should advise those who regard themselves as the representatives, within these walls, of [Roman] Catholic opinion, oftener to set the example." M. Ollivier, an Opposition member, reminded M. Keller of the horrors of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and showed that the priests declare they are persecuted when they are prevented from becoming persecutors. The reproach is perfectly just.

IRRESOLUTE AND QUESTIONABLE PROCEEDINGS OF GOVERNMENT.

It would seem that the Government, attacked and calumniated with so much fury by the clerical faction, ought to allow the greatest latitude to those who combat the pretensions of Rome and her agents. But no. The councillors of Napoleon III. are irresolute and vacillating, and threaten the opponents of Popery with being cast into prison.

Here is an extract from a strange official notice lately published in the official Moniteur: "Religious questions tend to assume a more impassioned character, and violent aggressions are every day directed, either through journals or pamphlets, against the [Roman] Catholic clergy. The Government, whose duty it is to make religion and its ministers respected, recommend writers to observe more moderation . . . and it is resolved to repress attacks of this kind. . . . The Minister of Justice, on a representation made to him by the Minister of the Interior, has just laid before the law authorities two pamphlets—one entitled 'Crimes, Offences, and Scandals among the Clergy in these Recent Times,' and the other, 'The Little Book of the Rue de Fleurus.' Proceedings were immediately commenced against the authors of these publications."

they hope, by these illiberal proceedings, to disarm the clerical party of their hostility? If so, they are entirely deceiving themselves. The Jesuits will never forgive the Emperor for having consented to the diminution of the Pope's temporal power. Nothing will be gained by the sentences pronounced upon a few radical pamphleteers. The hatred of the priests to Napoleon III. is inextinguishable, at least until the head of the State kneels before Pius IX., and, striking his breast, utters his mea culpa.

I have not read the obnoxious pamphlets. They are perhaps abusive and unjust. But have not the Romish bishops of France a hundred times denounced their antagonists as impious persons, depraved beings, wretches, enemies of God and man, and the like? Why should not those who are so disgracefully abused be allowed to answer in the same tone? Where is equality—the dealing out equal measure to contending parties? And besides, what matters the violent language of obscure pamphlets? The most dangerous enemies of the priests are among themselves, and nowhere else. Happy the country where everybody can publish what he pleases upon religious questions, leaving the good sense of the nation to condemn what is exaggerated or bad! France has not yet attained this free expression of the most different opinions.

NO MONEY, NO PRAYERS.

Before the appearance of this deplorable notice in the Moniteur, a writer, well known by his opposition to the Jesuitical party, M. Edmond About, the author of the "Roman Question," had sent to the Paris journals an article, with this singular title, "Warning to the Dead: No Money no Prayers." In this article he related a scandalous act of cupidity upon the part of a priest. Here are the facts:—

The wife of an artisan being dead, the funeral service was celebrated in one of the churches of the capital. In the midst of the sad ceremony, while the father and the husband of the young woman were shedding tears of grief, a sacristan shouted out to them, "Gentlemen, give your offering!" This referred to the money that the Romish clergy demand for interment. As the father and the husband, absorbed in their affliction, did not respond to this appeal, the priest who was officiating broke off the prayers he was repeating; and, turning towards the mourners, said aloud, "Ah! you want prayers, and you refuse to give your offering!" He then quitted the altar, without concluding the service, and re-entered the vestry!

I withhold the other details. There were three hundred working men present. Their indignation was rekindled, and as they went out of the sacred edifice, one of them exclaimed, "What a sad thing to be a Catholic!" It was a simple, but fearful saying.

Cardinal Morlot, Archbishop of Paris, feeling the extreme gravity of the case, immediately ordered an inquiry into the conduct of this covetous priest. All the circumstances were acknowledged to be true, as related. The ecclesiastic was suspended from his functions, and the Archbishop published in the Paris journals a notice, in which he declared that the offerings of the faithful for the services of the Church are purely voluntary, and that the clergy have no right to require payment for their prayers, &c. Such are the advantages of publicity! If M. Edmond About had not written his article, the simoniacal priest would never have been punished. A free press imposes a check upon all abuses and excesses.

MORE JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE PRIESTS.

I have been often obliged, of late, to speak of Popish ministers—parish priests, curates, monks, brethren of the Christian doctrine, and others—who have been sued by courts of justice, and sentenced to heavy penalties on account of crimes and misdemeanours. Several cases of this kind have occurred within the last month.

First, I may mention that a country curate has been condemned to two years' imprisonment, because he had seriously insulted Napoleon III. in a sermon. The Government has not permitted the press to give the details of this trial. We only know that the priest in question had explained and commented upon, from the pulpit, the celebrated parallel between Napoleon III. and Pontius Pilate. M. Pie, Bishop of Poitiers, had already traced this comparison, at some length, in a pastoral letter. The only punishment which he underwent was a declaration, on the part of the Council of State, that he had committed an abuse of authority; the curate who has followed his example will pass two years in captivity. The two sentences are not at all equal. But what then? One of the delinquents was a bishop, and the other a simple village priest! Such is the world's justice!

The Abbé Clergeau, honorary canon of the Archbishop of Sens, and formerly chaplain to the illustrious Châteaubriand, has been summoned before the Paris law courts, on a charge of having extorted money by fraudulent means. The sums gained by these means have reached the enormous amount of 2,274,000 francs. This Abbé Clergeau is a very clever man; he possesses, in the highest degree, the art of opening the purses of devotees, but he pushed his wonderful skill too far: and the judges have required him to give an account of the plans he adopted to gain millions. The affair is very complicated, and sentence has not yet been pronounced.

Two or three other priests have been brought before the magistrates, on account of their having committed shocking offences against morality. I shall not narrate the particulars of these scandalous affairs. They have moved public opinion; and a literary man, who has obtained a certain reputation—M. Cailla—has just published a pamphlet against clerical celibacy. He proves, by numerous testimonies from history, that the pastors of the Primitive Church were married, and he proposes that this wise and ancient practice should be restored. The ecclesiastical journals have replied to M. Cailla by invective, saying that the author is a materialist, a sensualist, who does not understand the virtue of self-denial, &c., &c. But there is no argument in vituperation. The question of the marriage of priests has been started, and if the members of the sacerdotal body fall too often into the serious irregularities which are imputed to them, the moment will come when Roman Catholics themselves will demand that ecclesiastics should be allowed to contract lawful marriages.

A Brother of the Christian Doctrine, named Maximin, has been condemned by the tribunal of Saint-Brieux to a month's imprisonment. The punishment is very light. He was accused of having committed acts of atrocious severity, of incredible brutality, upon his scholars. He had so violently struck, among the rest, a child ten years of age, that the poor little fellow died after five days' suffering. The judges ought to have inflicted a much more severe sentence upon this wretch, Maximin. But imagine the mother—yes, the very mother—of the child thus cruelly treated, coming before the court to plead, with tears and in suppliant tones, the cause of the murderer of her son. "For the love of God!" she said, "do this good brother no harm! It was not I who killed my child. Have mercy upon me!" You see what power the Popish clergy have over female bigots. This mother evidently repeated to the judges the words dictated to her in the confessional, and obedience to the priests was stronger in her heart than the sorrows of maternal love.

APOCRYPHAL MIRACLES.

We have still in France several manufactures of miraculous cures. This innocent traffic will last as long as there are persons credulous enough to consent to pay for these wonders. The water of Salette, for example, continues to be distributed and sent over all the provinces, at the price of from four to five francs a bottle. It is simply pure water, which costs the priests nothing; but the vision of the Virgin to the two little shepherds has communicated to this beverage a marvellous virtue, and the sale of it proves very lucrative.

There is another method of working miracles. The Ultramontane journals announced, at the commencement of this month, some sudden cures accomplished by an image of the Immaculate Conception at Séez, in the department of the Orne. A gentleman, who had long suffered from a diseased knee, was instantly cured by the holy image. The same with a soldier who had been taken to the hospital. The same also with a lady who had been afflicted with palsy in the head, &c. It is all done very conveniently. Patients have only to send by post a certain sum of money to those who own the Immaculate Virgin of Séez, and the cure takes place immediately! The editor of a Paris political paper hereupon remarks that the image of the Immaculate Conception might, with advantage, take the place of physicians and apothecaries! Will the Romish clergy never learn that these contemptible impostures compromise religion itself in the eyes of sensible persons?

FORMATION OF A LIBERAL PROTESTANT UNION.

French Protestantism is, at the present moment, a prey to a somewhat exciting agitation. Rationalism, which prevails among a number of the pastors and laymen of our churches, is becoming more and more audacious. An association has been recently formed in Paris, under the title of the Liberal Protestant Union. The committee is composed of eighteen laymen. No pastor's name appears upon the list; but everybody is very well aware that certain members of the pastoral body are the leaders of the association, though they deem it best to conceal the hand which directs the enterprise.

The object of the soi-disant Liberal Union is to combat orthodoxy, and to propagate among our flocks the principles of toleration, of free examination, and of mutual support. The founders of the society have circulated thousands of copies of a programme, in which they speak neither of the Holy Scriptures, or Jesus Christ, or even mention the name of God! A Pantheist might, without scruple, sign such a document. Such are the men who ostentatiously proclaim that they wish to protect, within the bosom of the Protestant National Church, the free profession of the faith! In reality, this is an electoral intrigue. As a portion of the members of the consistories will soon have to submit to the test of universal suffrage, these gentlemen have set to work to obtain a majority—especially in Paris. I shall hereafter revert to this contest, which may, perhaps, be productive of serious consequences.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT IN PARIS.

You have heard, I presume, of the religious movement which has taken place in the French capital. It is the commencement of a revival, something similar, but upon a smaller scale, to what has taken place in the United States and Ireland; and the fact proves that the French people are, like others, accessible to these striking manifestations of the grace of God.

Two Englishmen, Mr. Reignald Rudcliffe and Mr. T. Shouldham Henry, held, from the month of April till the month of June, special meetings for preaching and prayer. They understood very little of the French language, and their addresses had to be interpreted. There was, however, an immense crowd of attendants. Numerous and cheering conversions have taken place. The two evangelists are animated with powerful convictions, deep piety, and great devotedness, and the Lord has blessed their labours abundantly.

"CE QU'IL FAUT A LA FRANCE." BY M. R. DE ST. HILAIRE, PROFESSOR OF HISTORY IN THE SORBONNE.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Lyons, June 12, 1861.

Dear Sirs,—It is not only through visiting and preaching that efforts are being made to spread the Gospel in this godless land. The excellent M. R. St. Hilaire, Professor of History at the Sorbonne, born a Roman Catholic, has published a substantial pamphlet, in which he endeavours to point to his countrymen the different ways in which they have hitherto been attempting to reach liberty and happiness. This admirable treatise, entitled, "Ce qu'il faut à la France," with the epigraph, "I have believed, and therefore have I spoken," is written with the deepest conviction from a heart overflowing with the purest and noblest patriotism. The religious history of France is summed up in a hundred pages, and divided into five periods: 1st. The period of militant piety (the crusades), from Clovis to St. Louis. 2nd. The cloisters and the struggle with the Holy See (Royalty triumphant)—the Papacy humbled; extending to the time of Charles VII. 3rd. The Concordat and the Reformation (from Francis I. to Richelieu). "God in His infinite compassion at length shows France in the Gospel the true road beside the false. . . . Poor France! In choosing the Gospel she might have been spared three centuries of faults and misfortunes. . . . But the die is cast. Between the Gospel and Catholicism she decides for the less severe of the two."

4th. Till the death of Louis XIV. (Jansenism and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes). "Louis XIV. gave France up to the Jesuits, as he had given himself up, bound hand and foot; but the soul of this captive France will always escape them. The soul of a great people—the moral breath by which it lives—is its faith; and this breath from above is soon stifled when there is no freedom in the air." This leads us to the 5th period, from the death of Louis XIV. to the present day. It shows us France become infidel—France attempting to do without God. The bold and fearless way in which M. R. St. Hilaire attacks Voltaire and his disciples, has caused quite an explosion in the infidel camp—a very numerous one, alas! To attack Rome and the Papacy would have been quite allowable—nay, would have been applauded; but Voltaire is the idol of the day. We may, therefore, conclude that France is deeply tainted with, and preyed upon by, the gangrene of infidelity, and what greater service could have been rendered to the truth than to tear off the mask, and unveil the evil?

But our author does not stop there: he goes on to point out the remedy. Oh! that his words might find an echo in many hearts, and that the "still small voice" might be listened to above the din of this world! To all those to whom this cry of the heart speaks loudly, thou all the prejudices of birth or habit, we would repeat Peter's words to his Master, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." Beaten about by so many storms, shattered against so many rocks, our poor France has but one port where she may find shelter, and that is the Gospel. But it will be said, Is the Gospel then something new for her? Has she not known it long? No, France does not know the Gospel! Her conscience has not been pierced through by the "two-edged sword piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow." She has not heard the call of that loving voice—a Saviour's voice—saying to her, "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, and ye shall find rest for your souls."

Take and read! we say, like the mysterious voice that spoke to Augustine under the trees in the garden! And if reading the sacred volume on her knees, in the sight of God, far from all human influence, she does not find in it healing for all her anguish; if she does not feel herself satisfied by this bread of life, which has nourished the world for eighteen centuries; if the water of which Jesus told the Samaritan woman be not in her—"a well of water springing up unto everlasting life"—well, then, let her return to her choice—to Catholicism or infidelity.

To this touching appeal the Siècle has returned an answer, and in what terms? Allow us to make a single extract from the article, that you may judge for yourself to what an extent "the God of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ should shine unto them:—"

"You say to France, read the Gospel! But France is the living Gospel; it is the Gospel become a people! Is it not the Christ of nations? Who then has showed forth more magnificently the spirit of the Gospel? Who, if not she, has followed up the explanation of the law of Christ? . . . Modern France, democratic France, as she has come out of the Revolutions, is profoundly religious; she is the Apostolic nation par excellence; she is the eldest daughter of Christ, the soldier of God, the fifth evangelist."

Yours very truly,

CLEMENT DE FAYE.

THE UNIVERSAL ISRAELITISH ALLIANCE AND THE GENEVA CONFERENCE.

(Translated for Evangelical Christendom from a Geneva Journal.)

Some months ago we announced to our readers that, under the impression caused by the seizure of the Mortara child, a universal Israelitish Alliance had been formed, with the view to come to the assistance of those Israelites who, in different parts of the world, are still suffering oppression from the force of prejudice or legislation hostile to their liberties. On the 30th May last, this association met for the first time in Paris in the Bonne Nouvelle Palace, under the presidency of M. Carvallo, civil engineer. M. W. Pétavel has kindly given us an account of the meeting, from which we extract the following: The presence of many eminent Israelites from the capital, as also from foreign countries, was remarked, especially MM. Léon Nordmann and Aristide Artrue, both Rabbis; M. Narcisse Leven, advocate at the Imperial Court of Paris; M. Horn, political refugee, president of the Hungarian Israelitish Alliance; Eugène Manuel, professor aggregate of the University. The president read a report of the doings of the Alliance since its foundation. He announced that two works, undertaken under the direction of the Alliance—one of universal Israelite statistics, the other on the different legislations to which the Israelites at present are subjected—will soon be terminated; and two medals were promised as a prize for the best works on the two following subjects—one of 1,000 francs, for the best work on what various other religions have borrowed from Jewish dogmas and morals; the other of 1,500 francs, for the best work on universal Jewish statistics.

M. Carvallo reported several communications made to the committee—amongst them one from Professor Pétavel, of Neuchâtel, that old and warm friend of the people of Israel. The following are some fragments of the letter:—

"Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown. (Rev. iii. 2.)

"That which you have and which you hold, dear President, is that Israel in all the earth ought to unite, so as to show forth by the voice of publicity, by every well-ordered step, every honest and legitimate means, the injustice and the wrongs that have been committed against all that bears the name of Israelite: so also to work for the emancipation, civi-political, and religious, of that nation, wherever it is still oppressed, in order to free Israel from the impediments which prevent its accomplishing its great and eternal mission—a mission at once humanitarian, and at the same time Divine.

"The mission of Israel is to bring all other nations to the knowledge of the only true God, and in freeing itself to set free the whole human family from what now oppresses it and makes it take a false course.

"The Evangelical Alliance is an effort of the Christian Church to reunite and concentrate its living forces against the adversary of all good. Its principle is not to dispute nor to contend with any one, but to say to all, 'Let us join hands in all that the conscience of all approves, not on what divides Christians, but on what unites them.'

"The Israelitish Universal Alliance comes exactly at the right moment to give to the principle the universality that it ought to have. These two alliances, jealous as much as they please of their own particular convictions, must regard and understand each other. It seems to me that the occasion of the approaching conference of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva, next September, would be a favourable opportunity for doing so."

Mr. William Pétael, son of the professor, afterwards read a letter addressed to his father by Sir Culling Eardley, President of the English Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, in which the same wishes are expressed:—

"On occasion of the assembly at Berlin, five years ago, a meeting was held in the same city, consisting of Jews and Christians. Why, in these solemn times that are coming for humanity, should we not meet, give each other the hand, and at least understand each other, as to what we believe of the past and what we hope of the future, like honest men who feel mutual respect, who possess in the Old Testament a common foundation of their faith, and who, as reasonable and immortal beings, desire before all that God's truth, such as it is, may triumph on the earth?"

Sir Culling also says in his letter some words on the steps taken by English Christians in the Mortara case, which, he adds, approaches its solution.

The reading of these two letters was followed by the warmest signs of approbation from the assembly. The president, M. Carvalho, informed it that the Israelite Alliance accepted the brotherly invitation which was addressed to it, and would send its representatives to the meeting at Geneva.

The rest of the meeting was occupied with the speeches of MM. Horn and Armand Levy, on what course to pursue in regard to the Moldavo-Wallachian authorities to improve the condition of the Israelites in their country.

It is scarcely necessary to add that this movement, called forth by the Alliance, is principally among laymen. It is the nation which awakens, it is the people of Israel which rises from the field of the dead, on which it has been lying for centuries, and says to itself, on opening its eyes to the ray of light which reaches it, "Is it really true that I exist; and if I exist, why should I not act?" It is not about questions from the Talmud, or doctrinal or ceremonial questions, that we now speak—Israel is gathering its dispersed members, and is born again to unity for the accomplishing of its mission!

GERMANY.

THE RELIGIOUS QUESTION IN THE PRUSSIAN CHAMBERS—OPENING OF THE GENERAL SYNOD OF THE GRAND DUCHY OF BADEN—REACTION IN AUSTRIA—FANATICISM IN THE TYROL—A MISSIONARY FESTIVAL—THE POPE'S TEMPORAL POWER.

Frankfort, June, 1861.

The Session of the Chambers of the Prussian Parliament has been closed within these last few days by a speech from the King. The numerous political and administrative questions which were discussed and decided by them we shall not enter upon. We shall only say, that upon more than one occasion the true relation of the Church to the State—that is to say, their mutual independence, as the basis of religious liberty—was solemnly recognised. These great principles, which spring from the very essence of Christianity, are as yet so little understood among our population, that in the course of this session various petitions were presented to the Chamber of Deputies for purely ecclesiastical or religious objects. Members of the Chamber, in the debate upon the Budget for Church expenses, also raised questions of the same nature. Happily, there were men in the assembly sufficiently enlightened to prevent its being led astray in that direction. The eloquent M. von Vincke specially did not allow one of these occasions to escape without his professing boldly and clearly the thorough distinction which exists between politics and religion, Church and State. "As a member of the Evangelical Church"—he each time declared—"I have my convictions upon the question proposed to us, and I desire such a solution of it as shall be most favourable to the prosperity of that Church, but as a deputy I must declare myself incompetent." And as often, supported by the Minister of Worship himself, the opinion of M. von Vincke was solemnly sanctioned by a vote of the Chamber. Here was a real triumph over the confusion which exists throughout almost the whole of Germany between the interests of politics and those of religion.

Another occurrence, which will doubtless tend to advance the Protestant Church of Germany in the same path, though through many contests and difficulties, is the opening of the General Synod of the Grand Duchy of Baden, which took place at Karlsruhe, on the 5th of June. Your readers are aware, from my former letters, that this synod was convened in consequence of a sort of religious revolution, which has greatly agitated all the Protestant parishes of the country, and which resulted in a complete change of the ecclesiastical authority (Oberkirchenrath). This triumph of popular opinion appeared at first to be a lamentable defeat, looked at from a doctrinal and Evangelical point of view. But may we not hope that in the end the everlasting Gospel, preached with more freedom in the various parishes, which will henceforth make it their business to look after their own religious affairs, and not imposed by temporal authority, will speedily regain the ground which it now seems to have lost? Such, at least, is the hope of the Grand Duke himself, who, sincerely attached to his church, delivered at the opening of the synod a remarkable speech, from which we translate the following brief extracts:—

"Since my accession to the throne, I have constantly and firmly held to the principle of the most entire possible independence and self-government on the part of the two Christian Churches of my country. As to my own church, which is dear to me, already, on the 7th of April in last year, I publicly sanctioned this principle, amid the troubles and difficulties which we had to overcome. It is for you now, gentlemen, to discuss and to approve the plan of a constitution which will be submitted to you.

"An important day dawns upon us—a day

when we have to bear witness to the spirit which must live in the Christian Church. I have confidence in the power of that spirit—it is the spirit of Christian love and Christian faith. It is in this spirit that I beg you, gentlemen, to commence this work of peace. There is no question before you involving a passing triumph by any party or any tendency. As God can be truly glorified only by a willing and unconstrained love, the question is how to put our churches in a condition to bring forth to open day, by their own activity, the faith and love which is in their hearts. The free activity of the churches, in every grade of their organism, such is, in fact, the fundamental idea of the constitution which is proposed to you—an idea which is in full harmony at once with the doctrine and the history of the Christian Church—an idea which, on this twofold ground, has a right to be realized among us.

"The constitution which we have to work out together does not, it is true, relate to anything more than the external life of the Church, and does not pretend to be able to create, by forms, inward renewal—the awakening and sanctification of the soul. But in order that the renewed and sanctified life of the Church may show itself, and move and act freely, it must be rescued from its inertness, which is the source of many evils; it must be made to take part in its own affairs. Thus we may hope that, as the external temple is constructed anew, the spirit with which it is to be filled will also be renewed and strengthened. The more vitality there is in the faith which worketh by love, the more scope can be given to freedom for the most varied developments of that faith. . . .

"Commence then, dear friends and brethren—now commence your labours in the fear of God; work together in harmony and devotedness, in faith and freedom, in steadfastness and piety; and let us strive together to glorify the eternal Head of the Church invisible, by striving to invigorate that part of our German Church which is confided to our care.

"May He for whom we labour—He whose kingdom we desire to extend—bless and enlighten us in our deliberations!"

These are certainly earnest and gratifying words. They would be still more so if the men who drew up the scheme of the new ecclesiastical constitution, had not placed the sovereign at the head of the edifice, with the title of supreme bishop of the Church. That title which at the present time all the Germ princes, and even certain republican Governments, claim, is a decided abuse, which has no foundation either in the Holy Scriptures or in the principles of the Reformation. There is reason to fear, that so long as secular rulers do not acknowledge and repudiate this abuse, they will, in spite of all their good intentions, cause the promised self-government of the Church to be nothing more than an illusion. But patience! the progress of truth in this world is slow; but so soon as certain principles are acknowledged and practised, their results inevitably follow.

Nobody is more convinced of this than the Ultramontanes, and hence the papers are telling us already of a formidable reaction which is taking place around the Emperor of Austria, who, but a few months back, promulgated such novel principles of political and religious liberty. The bishops, seconded by the heads of the nobility, members of the House of Lords (Herrnhau) have opened the campaign by a programme, published in the Vaterland journal, and which is to be followed by a petition to the Emperor. Their object is especially to paralyse the action of the Parliament by securing a denial of its political competency, and to obtain the preservation in its integrity of the Concordat—two measures which would have, as their first result, the abolition of the liberties recently granted to the Protestant churches of Austria. The promoters of these intrigues are mentioned as being Count Leo Thun, and the Prince-Bishop of Brixen, in the Tyrol.

This Austrian province, instigated by the same bishop, is continuing to present an exhibition of fanaticism which would certainly not have been believed to be any longer possible in the present age. The object of the agitation maintained by the priests among these ignorant mountaineers, is what they call the unity of the faith—that is to say, the prohibition of any heretic exercising his worship, or even establishing himself and acquiring possessions, in the province. On the 31st of May, the whole population of Moran and the vicinity, led on by their priests, quitted the town in a monster procession, and proceeded to beseech a miraculous image in the neighbourhood, to preserve the country in the unity of the faith. A monk of Motri preached a sermon such as the world has not heard since the time of the League under Henry III. Amidst the grossest abuse and falsehoods respecting Protestantism, Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin, the monk declared that whoever acknowledged that Protestants and Catholics are entitled to equal rights—that is to say, whoever would not trample under foot the constitution granted by the Emperor—ought to be regarded as a Judas, as a traitor. Not less a Judas, not less a traitor, would be the Tyrolean who should sell anything to a heretic. And to conclude, fanning the flame of fanaticism in the minds of his hearers, the monk proposed for their admiration the zeal of an ancient burgomaster of Moran, who, seeing the emissaries of the devil entering the country to preach the Gospel, made no scruple of at once thrusting them out—the only procedure adopted being physical force.

If the cause of Popery in Europe were not already ruined, it would certainly be ruined by such demonstrations as these. To see men thus blinded, doubtless by the righteous judgment of God, is far more calculated to excite pity than indignation. How can we help being involuntarily reminded of the saying of a heathen, Quos perdere vult Jupiter, demorat?

Let us turn aside from these sad scenes, and be refreshed, as we contemplate a great and admirable missionary festival, which took place at the end of May, at Marburg. There, instead of a furious monk addressing the audience, the Word of Life was preached by the eminent Pastor Harms, of Hermannsburg, to thousands of hearers, who had assembled to deliberate upon the world's evangelization. I may be able, God willing, to tell you, in another letter, somewhat in detail about this extraordinary man, whose preaching is so powerful, whose life is so devoted to his Master, and who, standing alone in a village parish, has sent forth into the pagan world more than a hundred missionaries. While the Lutheran Church produces such men as he, it will prove a salt, which has not lost its savour.

The Pope's temporal power is in a sad condition. Its final catastrophe is being brought about as respects men's ideas, as well as in actual events. Here is a proof, in a fact which has occurred in the very bosom of Ultramontanism. The Abbé Doellinger, head of the royal chapter, and professor of ecclesiastical history in the University of Munich, has declared himself openly, in a public lecture, against the Pope's temporal power. He proved by Scripture, the Fathers of the Church, and by history, that that power is not essential to Catholicism. The Pope's Nuncio, who was present at the illustrious theologian's lecture, went out in the middle of it. The professor, who was not to be intimidated, when he next addressed his audience, took up the same position.

PRUSSIA.

THE RELIGIOUS STATE OF BERLIN.—THE PASTORAL CONFERENCE.

Berlin, June 17, 1861.

In the first article from Germany that appeared in Evangelical Christendom for June, the writer finished his interesting letter with a desire, above all things, that a religious awakening might take place in Berlin, where ungodliness and immorality are so great in some circles; and, as a proof of this being the case, he cites the lamentable occurrences that have taken place lately in the administration of the police at Berlin.

I can assure your esteemed correspondent that Christian believers at Berlin, with all their hearts, join in his wish—that there is nothing they so ardently pray for as that the Lord of the Church may grant the outflowing of His spirit on the masses, who in the Prussian capital remain strangers to Him and to His word. I must remark, however, that he seems to have taken too dismal a view of the occurrences in the Berlin Police which the Berlin newspapers have been so occupied in discussing. It cannot be denied that many abuses have come to light, but it now appears, after strict investigation, which brings out the case more and more clearly, that the opposition press has been very exaggerated in its statements. The whole affair, as far as has now been discovered, seems to consist in some not very important embezzlements committed by subordinate officers, certainly worthy of punishment, but such as will take place in all other countries and other large cities, where hundreds of officials are employed in the administration of public affairs, and sometimes on a greater scale. As regards the higher officials of the police, it must be remarked that nothing has been alleged against them, as your correspondent would imply—only one of them being in prison, and that not so much on account of fraud from self-interested motives, as from having overstepped the limits of his official power. Even this, though nowise justifiable, does not give any right to conclude that there is a very low moral standard among the higher officials in Prussia, as your correspondent seems to infer. No other charge can be brought against the President of the Police, Freiberr von Seidlein, by those who know his honourable character, than that he, in his very extensive official duties, that surpass the powers of one man to fulfil, has not watched more carefully over his subordinate officers.

He has himself, for a time, withdrawn from his office, so as to give to the investigation a more impartial character.

All this said, it must at the same time be acknowledged, that to large numbers of people in Berlin the Gospel is still a sealed book, especially among the lower and middle classes of the population, still full of unbelief.

As in all large cities, so also here, with the great start that Berlin has taken during the last ten years in regard to its extension and population, a numerous "proletariat" has risen, of which the workmen in the manufactures form a great proportion. But in what other city have efforts proved successful to bring back such masses to Christianity? There has always been a beginning everywhere. What the Prussian proletariat has in preference to that of most other countries is that, thanks to the Prussian system of education, scarcely a workman, however poor and humble, is to be found who cannot read and write, and who has not in his youth received religious instruction, so as to be acquainted with the principal truths of Christianity, and at least have them in his memory. Every one is consequently capable of reading the Bibles and the tracts that are now spread in abundance, and when it pleases God, by His Holy Spirit, to touch his heart, he may receive deeper impressions from their perusal, so as to be converted. It is a fact that the Christians of Berlin every year make greater efforts to bring the Word of Life within reach of the erring and lost ones—efforts that do not seem inconsiderable to those who know how little of the sort took place amongst us twenty years ago. There are now many societies, which are diligently occupied in administering Christian charity and Christian consolation to the poor and sick; others trying to bring those in health to the Lord.

The children of the poor are received into numerous institutions for the destitute, and there taught to pray and to love the Lord Jesus. Christian tradesmen gather their apprentices and workmen into young men's associations. The union of young merchants, though of late formation, is constantly gaining ground. The association for publishing works for edification, spreads thousands of tracts—the Prussian Bible Society thousands of Bibles, in the houses of believers and unbelievers. Christian hospitals, under the care deaconesses, stand open for invalids; and to many of these, their weeks of suffering—during which the power of Christian love is so strongly exhibited before their eyes, in the conduct of the servants of the Lord who surround them—become the time of their conversion. The Christian Association for the Sick has many members, who, for the Lord's sake, visit the invalids in their own homes, and try to lead them to the true Physician of souls. In many parishes the Christian care of the poor is well organised under the direction of the pastors. In the large prison for separate confinement at Moabit, the warders are brethren from the Rauh Haus, at Horn, near Hamburg, which owes its institution to Dr. Weichern. They visit the cells of the criminals, directing them to the Lord. Also in other prisons, ministers are working diligently for the good of souls. Female servants, who in large cities are much exposed to seduction, are watched over by Christian ladies, and gathered into small associations. Governesses have now a Christian home, where to stay on their passing through Berlin, or if out of place. The Evangelical Union has established a home for travelling apprentices, and holds regular lectures, from a Christian point of view, for the educated as well as for the ignorant. Several Prussian missionaries to the Jews seek to gather in the lost ones of the House of Israel. There are three associations for missions to the heathen, of which one—the Gossner Missionary Association—alone has sent nearly 200 missionaries to all parts of the world. A series of other attempts at Christian work, such as the Gustavus Adolphus Society, an association which assists poor Evangelical congregations dispersed among Roman Catholics, another for the assistance of the Syrian Christians, &c., &c., are well supported in Berlin.

The Johannes Institution, founded three years ago at the instigation of Dr. Wichern, seems to be richly blessed. It receives into its care hundreds who have left the prisons and houses of correction, and who are in much danger of returning into their old bad ways if no one takes them up. Notwithstanding the short time they have been in existence, the Johannes brethren have seen greater results of their work than could have been expected.

In addition to this it must be mentioned that the number of believing ministers is constantly on the increase, so that already, in almost all churches, you can hear an unsophisticated Gospel preached; and in Bible, Missionary, and other meetings for edification, it is also abundantly proclaimed.

It is worthy of observation that when lately a minister was to be chosen in one of our parishes, which has no great reputation for godliness, but where the owners of houses have the right to choose their minister, out of three candidates, just that one was chosen who, in his probation sermon, most decidedly professed his faith in the full truth as it is in Jesus Christ. The number of churches and preachers has certainly not increased in the same proportion as the population, notwithstanding all that the late King Frederick William did in this direction. How much can be done by an increase of clerical agency has been shown in the cathedral parish, where, during the last seven years, eight candidates, in the so-called "Candidate Institution," have been actively at work regularly visiting the poor families in their houses. So much has at last been gained by it, that numbers of these have been brought again to attend Divine service. Few of the associations I have mentioned have been in existence many years, and most of them only since the year of revolution, 1848. The levers which are now everywhere in operation to elevate the mass of the people of Berlin have only just, as it were, begun to act; but when they come to full development, then certainly no small results will be attained.

Those who work in all these different Christian agencies are, besides the clergy, mostly persons belonging to the higher classes in Berlin, and these consist of the higher functionaries and the nobility. Since the year 1848, a sort of awakening has taken place among them. The Revolution, and the threatening prospect of the overthrow of the existing state of things, had no little influence in making people who belonged to these classes lift their eyes to the hills from which all help cometh. The middle classes have been least influenced by this new Christian spirit. It is not impossible that this, in a certain measure, may be ascribed to the large number of Jews belonging to this class, who, with the persevering spirit which distinguishes some of them, use all their influence, even through the means of the public press, to withstand all Christian tendencies. The most popular Prussian newspaper is the Volkszeitung, edited by very talented Jews, but who are very much opposed to Christianity. It contained lately an article on the Pentecost, which was almost blasphemous. In this field much remains to be done by Christian people. But the Lord, who, during the last twenty years, in so unexpected a way has given room and power to Christian influence, will also, through His Spirit, work further among us. It is in the natural course of things, that as infidelity, during the last century, first made its way among the higher classes of society, and then penetrated to those of lower degree, so also this revival of faith will take its course from the highest to the middle classes. The organization of the parish regulations, which is in constant progress, in the view of vivifying a Christian spirit among laymen, is looked upon very hopefully. While now, in all Prussian parishes, the ministers are surrounded by presbyters, the statutes for the synods of the different circles in the eastern provinces of Prussia are ratified.

In Trinity week we have also had this year the anniversaries of the different missionary societies among the heathen and the Jews; the Jerusalem Association, which cares for the spiritual wants of German congregations in the East; and the Pastoral Aid Society, which places clerical assistants in extensive parishes where their help is required. All these meetings have been held in a prayerful spirit.

THE PASTORAL CONFERENCE

in the province of Brandenburg was held in connexion with the above meetings. It was only attended by members of the confessional Lutheran party. The most interesting part of it, was the introductory speech of Dr. Stahl. He made his remarks on the present state of the world, of which he thinks the characteristic is the monstrous falling off from the Word of God, and the rising against all the powers ordained of God. Allies in this struggle against this general revolution, he thinks, are to be found among English Christians, in whose protest against Bunsen and against "Essays and Reviews," Dr. Stahl saw the most joyful testimony to the seriousness and sincerity of the Scriptural faith prevailing in England. So much more, he therefore regretted that there was such divergency, or rather direct opposition, in the views regarding the revolutionary spirit; the first disapproving of it altogether—the latter having the fullest sympathy with it.

It will, perhaps, not be without interest to you in England, to know with what views Dr. Stahl, this first champion of the confessional party in our country, is filled in regard to England. It is rejoicing to think that all this party, which hitherto has looked with a certain disdain on the ecclesiastical subjectivity of the Evangelical party among the English Episcopalians and the Dissenters, now no longer can refuse their acknowledgment of the power of the Christian life and faith in England.

HOLLAND.

THE RELIGIOUS CRISIS IN HOLLAND.

(Translated from "La Semaine Religieuse" for Evangelical Christendom.)

M. Chantepie de la Saussaye has published a book with the above title. It is divided into three parts. The first contains a retrospective view of the state of the Church in Holland during the years between 1825-50. The first chapter, which is devoted to the supernaturalistic school and its most eminent representatives, is very interesting. The second speaks of the awakening which commenced about the year 1880, and is composed of two elements—one national Orangist, of which the poet Bilderdijk, and after him his disciples, Da Costa and Groen van Prinsterer, are the most illustrious representatives; the other, Foreign English, which, after having taken its course through France, was communicated to Holland by the religious literature of French Protestantism. The alliance of these two elements gave to the awakening in Holland a character at once methodical and anti-revolutionary, and it was faithfully allied to the traditions of Dort. Its partisans, in proclaiming that the State ought to be Christian, had at once an "ecclesiastico-confessional" aim and a political one. The first manifested itself in its struggle against the Groningen school, whose teaching, though insufficient in more than one respect, nevertheless was an attempt at an awakening in the theological territory, and a real progress, because it proclaimed that Christ was the principle of all religious truth, at a time when theology knew of nothing higher than a "doctrine on the nature and work of Christ, or a morality that He might have preached." But the awakening (greatly important as it has been, from the development given by it to the Inner Mission), by its great and healthful activiand by its resuscitating in the Church the work of the Reformers, has completely failed as an anti-revolutionary and confessional party.

It has not, however, yet said its last word, as we see from the second part of the work. There was in it an ethical or moral principle, which for the first time showed itself on the entry of Mr. Beets into the ministry, in 1840, and which, separating itself from the juridical tendency, wished rather to be "medical," asserting that "the aim ought to be to heal the Church, not to judge her." The pastors who had adhered to this principle tried to uphold the moral side of the received dogmas, and showed how it accorded with the demands of conscience. They soon formed a society, which at a later period received the name of "Seriousness and Peace." It was composed of the most influential members of the body of Dutch pastors. The want of a scientific basis was soon experienced among them, and in 1853 appeared the first number of the Review, organ of the ethical and conciliatory tendency, but in which people persisted in seeing "a manifesto, more or less mitigated, of the anti-revolutionary and confessional party." This was not long in pronouncing itself against the new principle, which, moreover, was always passed by in silence by the liberal schools. Add to this the defection of several pastors, who, not having, at the time of their adhesion, sufficiently understood the bearing of the moral principle, ended by refusing it their co-operation.

All these united causes occasioned the cessation of the journal towards the end of 1858.

During the latter period of its existence, this Review especially sought to combat the school of Mr. Scholten, a professor of large erudition, of whom M. de la Saussaie draws the following picture: "This school, in placing the truth on a basis independent of Evangelical facts, and not taking into account the phenomena of moral life, is essentially idealistic." Afterwards he gives a resume of its doctrine as a "negation of the authority and sovereignty of God, and a negation of freewill."

The third part describes the present religious position. It is with regret that we abstain from entering into details. We should have to speak of the actual philosophical movement which has caused the rise of another school, the Empiric School, taking for a starting point that neither authority nor speculation, but only experience, can conduct to the knowledge of the truth. It has found a clever and distinguished leader in Mr. Pierson, and for it is reserved perhaps, in a future more or less distant, the sceptre of science; while a few years ago its founder, Mr. Opzoomer, was condemned to silence by various ecclesiastical parties, for having asserted that philosophy reconciles man to himself. After having made an inroad on the territory of theology, this school has become the most formidable adversary to that of Leyden; but the last has been still more compromised by the manner in which one of its disciples, Mr. Busken Huet, has pushed to its last consequences the principle of Mr. Scholten, in denying the miracles to which the latter had not attached any importance as religious facts.

This is the logical consequence of the idealism of that school. Mr. Busken Huet, who has a way of writing remarkable at once for its originality and its power, is, with Mr. Pierson, the man of the day in the religious and theological movement.

The exposition of these debates—the serious importance of which none can overlook—is given with great lucidness in the book of which we are speaking, and shows how much its author (M. de la Saussaie) has taken part in all these struggles, and proves that he lives, as it were, in the discussion of them. It also shows what, according to him, makes it so sterile, that the question of method has never been debated, and it is, before all, necessary to be of one accord on this point.

In the second chapter of the third part, the subject is the duty of the Church of Holland. This is a beautiful chapter, which every body may read with interest and edification.

This Church, which we all love so much, is represented as divided into two camps, which watch each other continually, which skirmish with each other without coming to a regular battle, and which can never understand each other, from the want of a common principle that might serve both parties as a starting point for a serious discussion. This Church ought to awaken our interest, and that it will not be slow to do.

Who can read, without being edified, those beautiful pages in which the author traces the future course of the Church of the Netherlands?

"The future of the nation," he says, "depends on the awakening, in the bosom of the Protestant Church, of a piety at once profound and enlightened, on the alliance of science with faith—an alliance which has been the strength of our illustrious learned men, and to which we owe what remains to us of greatness. It is only at such a price that the Church of the Netherlands can reconquer the place which it ought to hold among Christian nations, for Holland, from its 'peculiar genius,' and its geographical situation, is fit to serve as mediator between France, Scotland, and Germany. It is notorious that what the Dutch want is not sympathy with the austere character of Puritanism, and the missionary spirit which characterises it, nor with the oratorical talents of the great preachers of the awakening in France, nor with the learned works of Germany. What is wanted in the Church of the Netherlands is faith in herself, in the genius by which she is distinguished, in the mission which is confided to her, in the future which awaits her. 'This faith she wants, and just in proportion as she wants it, national self-love and national vanity hold their place. Oh! that God may renew that faith in all hearts, so that Holland may show herself worthy of the part which she ought to take in the common work. And that it may be so, may great Christian faith, the mother of all fruitful aspirations, and all noble devotion, be renewed in all hearts—faith, I say, in a living Christ, the Son of God, and Son of Man!'

DENMARK.

THE SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN QUESTION.

In the June number of Evangelical Christianity, a German correspondent has striven to demonstrate that a cruel religious persecution reigns in Schleswig. I do not doubt that he believes this is the case, notwithstanding that your Danish correspondents have several times shown, that the question is political, and not religious, and that the Danish Government in this, as always, acts with great forbearance and justice. But he certainly does not understand Danish, and accordingly only reads what appears in the German language, and emanates from the insurrectional party at Holstein and Schleswig. In the paper referred to, he cites an article in the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, and says that this article is from the pen of a man who is an authority on this point. But it is quite impossible for any one but the initiated to know if the author is an authority, for he is anonymous: and, besides, this author shows in his article, which I have before me, an ignorance as to Danish history, which is almost stupendous in an authority. Your correspondent will not enter into general reasonings, but limits himself to the communication of some facts, extracted from the articles referred to. But not to observe that these facts, extracted from the articles referred to, are not all extracted from them, as your correspondent says, I beg permission to demonstrate the nature of several of these facts.

1. Every pastor from Schleswig requires a special permit, if he wishes to cross the frontiers. I may observe, that every pastor in Denmark proper requires a special permit if he wishes, not only to cross the frontier of the diocese, but to undertake a voyage to the remoter parts of the diocese.

2. When he says that all those societies which were formerly carried on by Schleswig and Holstein in common are interdicted, I may, first, observe that Holstein and Schleswig have the liberty to have such societies separately (Schleswig has a separate, very flourishing, Bible Society); secondly, that such an interdict is necessary, while the insurrectional party makes use of such societies to propagate their political views as to the union of Holstein and Schleswig. And the author of the articles in the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung assures us that in the Duchy of Holstein it is not so, even in the religious (kirchliche) question, but one party, the Sleswigholsteinische. . . . The same is the case at Schleswig. It was this party who mutinied in 1848. Is it not necessary that the Government, if it does not wish another mutiny, should interdict such united societies, when it hears "religious men" declaring that they mingle religion and politics together? That the Government interdicts German societies from having auxiliary associations at Schleswig, does not surprise any one. Would England permit French associations to form branches at Jersey and Guernsey, when these islands had risen in insurrection with the intention of uniting with France?

3. That the candidates of theology of South Schleswig dare no longer frequent the University of Kiel, is an invention of your correspondent, and not at all the truth. At this very moment there are pastors in Schleswig, who, in 1848-50, were perjurers against their King, and, nevertheless, they are not yet deposed; and pastors who have studied at Kiel, candidates who have studied at this university, now also obtain charges in this land.

4. What your correspondent says about candidates being required to give a pledge, that they will assist in suppressing the German language and German customs "in the south of Schleswig," exists only in his imagination. The Government has not the intention (has never proclaimed it) to suppress the German language in the south of Schleswig (south of Husum and the city of Schleswig). But that the Government does not send such pastors to Schleswig as meddle with politics, and wish to make Schleswig a province of Germany and Prussia, cannot but be approved by every one, except perhaps by a Prussian, who wishes the enlargement of his own country.

5. That Danish officials and Danish pastors have been sent in numbers to congregations, in which, up to the year 1850, the language spoken was exclusively or predominantly the German, is not at all correct. Amongst the pastors who, since 1850, have been nominated in Schleswig, not a few natives of Schleswig are to be found; and the Government always prefer them, except when they are suspected of political intercourse with the enemies of the realm. The Government nominates no pastor who has not been examined as to his capability to preach in the language of the congregation, Danish or German. Where the German or Frisian exclusively, or almost exclusively, is spoken, the services are held in German; where German and Danish are spoken in the same congregation (in these mixed congregations German predominates in some, Danish in others), the services are held alternately in each language, as I have shewn in earlier articles.

6. That the people of Schleswig were formerly known for their religiousness, may be doubted. Extracts of the official protocols of the visitors (in Allen det danske sprogs historie i Schleswig, or "History of the Danish Language in Schleswig," 1858), illustrate the real situation. In Kirken-und-Schulblatt für die Herzogthumen Schleswig, Holstein, und Lauenburg, 1848, p. 358 ("Journal for the Church and the School in the Duchies of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg"), the author, a pastor of Schleswig—N.B., a German pastor—says: "The churches are empty, the communion table is deserted (verødet), the Bible is made a martyr, prayer is made over to the weak, the sermon is only tolerated. . . . Does the mother teach her children to pray? Does any father erect the family altar? No." So speaks an insurrectional Schleswigian pastor of the people of Schleswig, who were then known for their religiousness! And in 1849 Pastor Nievert, of Altona, says (Stimmen aus und Luder streitenden Kirche Barmen, October, 1849): "Of the 600 tutors who are in our country, scarcely, perhaps, ten are to be found who believe and profess the Gospel. The German authors speak otherwise, for now the Danes reign over the country; but is this a veracious manner of proceeding?"

7. That even the German services are almost deserted, would be difficult to prove or to refute, unless we had accurate statistical returns from all the parishes, which cannot be had but with great difficulty. Two weeks ago I visited several parishes in the mixed districts, and I shall inform you of the results. At the city of Sonderborg the German services (the city is almost entirely Danish) were not attended by many, but by more than before 1850. At Grumtofts-at-Angeln, the German services are attended by from 300 to 800, the Danish by from 150 to 400, and the Bible meetings in the same proportion. (Before 1850, Danish had not been preached for many years at Grumtofts.) At Sattruss-at-Angeln, the German services are attended by very many, the Danish by some. At Fjolds, near Husum, the German services are attended tolerably well, the Danish by one-fourth or one-fifth of the German attendants. All these congregations have had new pastors, and the Danish language alternately introduced at the services since 1850. But I have no doubt at all, that very many prefer politics to the Gospel, and do not attend church, intending thereby to demonstrate against the suppression of the mutiny, and against the defence which the Danish language, after suppression of centuries, now enjoys.

8. The pathetic exclamation of the author, that he should like to know whether there is a country in the wide world, where parents, where children, do not understand the language in which instruction is given in the public schools, I beg permission to illustrate with some real facts. First, I may observe that before 1850, the children had in many Schleswigian schools been instructed in German, which they did not understand when they entered the schools: witness the many extracts from books written in the 18th century, and from official reports, cited by Mr. Allen in the work. Next I will say what I have witnessed myself, two weeks ago. I had also read in the German journals, that the children did not understand Danish, and did not learn anything at the schools. I, therefore, purposed to inquire into the matter, as far as the time would permit. I visited three schools, situated in the extremest parts of the mixed districts, where one should suppose that the Danish should be understood by fewer than in the more northerly districts. They were the schools of Løsk, Fjold, and Sattrup. At Løsk, on the western frontier of the mixed district, the children understood and spoke Danish quite well, and had acquired as good a knowledge as could be expected, from their age, and from the capacity of the teachers. At Fjold, four miles north-west from Husum (concerning the population of this and the more southerly parish, my coachman—with whom I conversed only in German, and who all the more supposed me to be a German, as he heard that the day before I had arrived from Hanover—said, "Much Danish is spoken in these parishes"), the children had acquired completely the same stock of knowledge, as in the schools of Denmark proper. At Sattrup I was much surprised, for I never found a more excellent school. I believe that a school in which the children are so well instructed, is scarcely to be found anywhere. After the hour was terminated, from twenty to thirty children—those who did not understand Danish, and of these several were little children—came to the pastor to change the Danish books, which twice a week are changed, and which, even during the summer, they have time and the desire to read. These are real facts, and had I had the time to visit all the parishes of the mixed districts, I could have produced more than a hundred such real facts. That Danish is understood in the mixed districts is evident, for Danish books are read by many. Danish gratuitously-lending libraries exist in all the mixed parishes. The report of the committee of these libraries, for 1856, shows that at Rylov (population 850 souls) 450 books were lent the last year; at Gramtofte, 450; Kocern, 300; Husby, 300; Sterup, 850 (in this parish a Danish book society also exists); Stenbjerg, 760; Eskrù, about 1,000; Versø, about 1,300; Solt, 750; Vandrup, 1,300; Valbol, 900; Adelby, about 1,500. And the Danish readers are doubtless now still more numerous, and that in these "German" districts!

9. That instruction in the now Danish schools has been given from time immemorial in the German tongue is not altogether the case. I regret that—being on a journey more than a hundred miles from home, and, therefore, unable to make any use of my library—I cannot exactly state the very year when the German language was introduced into the churches and schools of the now mixed districts; but it did not happen before the superintendency of Stefan Klotz (about 1870), a German, who most vehemently suppressed the Danish language at Schleswig. That is certainly not time immemorial!

And in 1801, as is asserted by the editors of a Schleswig-Holsteinischer Historischer Kirchen- und Schul-Almanach, Schleswig, 1801 (Historical Schleswig-Holsteinian Calendar of the Church and School), two pastors of the German districts of Schleswig: "At the rural deanery of Flensburg, the services are everywhere held in the German tongue, although the native and conversational language of the country parishes is almost entirely Danish. And at the rural deanery of Gottorj the services are, in the city and country parishes, completely held in the German tongue, although in the country universally almost nothing is spoken but Danish. The rural deanery of Flensburg is now a mixed district; only nine of the parishes of the rural deanery of Gottorj are now mixed; the rest entirely use the German language at church and school."

10. Your correspondent asks: "What is the view of faithful Danish Christians in this respect? Has not Provost Otzen, of the Isle of Fehmarn, who is a thoroughly loyal Dane, &c.?" Would not everybody believe that he means that Dean Otzen is a Dane? But Mr. Otzen is rural dean of Fehmarn, a Schleswigian island, situated eastward from Holstein, and entirely German-speaking, notwithstanding that your correspondent makes him figure as a Dane. Does he not hereby seem to say that, also, the German-speaking Schleswigians are Danes?

11. As to the opinions of the Rev. Mr. Grundtvig, I must again regret, that not being at home, I have not his article. But this I may say, that he does not mean that the Schleswigians of the mixed districts are unjustly dealt with; but as he in all other respects contends for the complete liberty, he here also commends it. If you wish it, I shall very willingly send you a representation of his opinions.

12. As to the opinions of Bishop Martensen, nobody can say what a man's opinions are who has never published anything on these questions, so far as I know, except a letter to the insurrectional superintendent, Nielsen, in which he as strongly as possible condemns the perjuries of the insurrectional clergy.

As to the invitation of your correspondent to Englishmen to visit the "unfortunate" country, I will produce a saying of a rural dean of Schleswig. He is a very pious man, so far as I know a native of Schleswig, was pastor there before the mutiny, but was ejected by the mutineers because he would not perjure himself against his king. I visited him a fortnight ago, and he said: "Neither a Dane nor a German can sufficiently understand the dissensions which tear in pieces our unhappy country, and the question of the languages, if he does not live for some time in the midst of the agitation. The population of the mixed districts feel shame that they are Danes; they conceal that they understand and speak Danish, and a foreigner may thus be easily deceived." For two centuries at least German pastors and officials, and our Government (our kings were almost all German-speaking), have endeavoured to make the people believe that their Danish was a low, rude, and coarse idiom, and that all civilisation, all higher ideas, were to be expected from Germany and the German language. The people resisted for many years; now the agitation has borne its fruits. Danish is despised by many; the richer peasants despise the Danish, and suppress every one who will attend the Danish services, and the people feel ashamed of speaking Danish. The Government allowed this year that the confirmation of the mixed districts should be held in the language which each should prefer; the result has been, that the other German-minded peasants and agitators persuaded, indeed forced, the Danish-speaking parents to let the children be confirmed in the German language, which most of them do not understand, for the German dialect which is spoken in Schleswig, especially in the mixed districts, is very different from the German book language.

Such are the facts which your correspondent has produced. I dare believe that he believes himself that they are trustworthy, but he would act wiser if he did not write on Danish questions; certainly he would deem me very unwise if I should write on the language spoken in Posen, East Prussia, Lausitz, and Rhenish Prussia. Does he wish to have exact knowledge on the question, let him study not only the German, but also the Danish literature on this question; then he will certainly judge otherwise than at present.

V.

AUSTRIA.

THE PROTESTANTS OF AUSTRIA.

The dominant thought with thoughtful Protestants in Austria is the new Church organization—a labour in which, as I need not say, our excellent superintendent (Franz) has now been long and most anxiously engaged for the Reformed Church, as also the best men of the Lutheran Confession for theirs.

Promises so many have been made and neglected, that new ones, even though they seem confirmed by the signature of the Emperor, are yet scarcely depended upon. Equality in religious rights and Church government, is what, to the eye of distant observers, we appear to have received; but how can we be satisfied?—how can we avoid suspecting, when the head of our ecclesiastical machinery—the ultimate appeal—the supreme control, is the Oberkirchenrath (supreme Church Council)?—Protestants it is true, but nominated by the Emperor, and that without any previous presentation or election from among ourselves. The Emperor has no such power in his own Church, where each dignitary is first elected from his own body, then approved by the Pope, and lastly sanctioned by the monarch. So long as such a body is the governing and controlling head, we are not, we cannot be free; we have not, we cannot have, what the new treaty professes to give us—equality.

The sketch prepared for the new government of our Church affairs, and which awaits its ratification by the approaching Synod at Vienna, is thus arranged: All matters belonging to the Protestant Church shall be considered and governed by means of four different classes of synods: 1st, that of each community, called by its presbytery when required. . . . 2nd, that of the seniorat, or the district belonging to a senior; which shall be held yearly under the presidency of the senior, assisted by a layman as curator. To this synod must belong the pfarrer of each mother-community, also attended by a layman, who must be chosen by themselves from among his presbyters. If any seniorat includes a college, a gymnasium, or a school for the training of school-masters, then from each of these, from the body of its professors, one deputy is to be elected by them. At each meeting the place shall be decided upon for the next assembly.

3rd. The Superintendent Synod, the members of which are—the superintendent, with one layman as curator; all the seniors in his diocese, with also each a layman as curator; two pastors, with each a presbyter from each seniorat, elected in each senior's synod. If in the town where this synod is held, there shall be a college, &c., &c., the same rule is to be observed as at the senior's synod. This superintendent synod is to be held every third year, and at the close of its proceedings, it shall decide where it shall next assemble.

4th. The General Synod: its members must consist of all the superintendents of the two Protestant Confessions, with each a lay presbyter as curator; every senior, with also an elected lay presbyter as curator, and a deputy from the theological university in Vienna, elected by that body. The two Confessions will hold almost all their sittings and discussions separate. This synod is to be held every sixth year. This new organization concerns only the German provinces, Upper and Lower Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Trieste, and Gorizia, and the Slavonian provinces, Bohemia, Moravia, Galicia, and Silesia.

Perhaps one of the most valuable results of this new code is, that before the eyes of a mass of uneducated people, the Protestant now legally possesses a position of which he was till now, judged by the trammels in which he was held, unfitted. These unworthy fetters are now fallen, and the appeal so long made "Am I not a man and a brother?" is slowly but surely gaining belief; and we may hope that at the end of this century, there will be none living who can say, as there are those living now who declare, "I knew a woman, who, at her desire, was buried in the bloodstained garment, which many years ago was thus stained from the wounds she had received when suffering, from the hand of authority, stripes for her faith in Him alone, who was first stricken for us."

It is natural that the zeal and vehement anger of the Roman Catholic clergy makes itself remarked through the length and breadth of the land; but this is no disadvantage—quite the contrary—for it will awake inquiry; it will stimulate our own drowsy clergy, and awake our sleeping people. A chronic despair or apathy has too long pervaded the Protestant Church in Austria, for her to be able at once boldly to claim in full the rights the crown offers. And who can wonder! In how many parishes are there, probably, aged pastors, who, no doubt, when youth and strength were theirs, added hope thereto—that golden-winged spirit which so seldom accompanies a man even to the meridian of life—and inspired by these three working gifts, who can tell us what has been attempted? It is known only to Him who so graciously and lovingly said of her who had only served her Master by anointing His feet, "She hath done what she could." That these men have prayed with tears, and worked with zeal, and tried to rouse others, we may well believe; and if they now appear not in the heat of the day, we must not be severe. Are not their treasured prayers now bringing down blessings for us? The new wide field for labour belongs more to our younger clergy, who will be compelled, outwardly at least, to acquit themselves as men, for their congregations will require it of them. A meek and mean acquiescence in all that was exacted or inflicted from the outward party, and a still more mean and cringing pandering to the caprices of those within their own Church, and a worldly flattering conduct, in order to get on smoothly, will now, we will hope, pass out of fashion, when there is no longer an excuse for the egoist and the slothful.

An event for which we have great cause to be grateful, is the arrangement for the increase in the number of Protestant military chaplains. Previously to 1848, there were two—one for the Reformed, and one for the Lutheran soldiers—(think of all our scattered garrisons!); but the Reformed pastor having been mixed up in the affairs of the Hungarian Revolution, he was removed from his post, and had no successor until 1859, just as the war in Italy closed! The Austrian Government then decided, that of each Confession—the Reformed and the Lutheran—there should be six chaplains appointed, and attached one to each of the six garrisoned cities in the empire. These Protestant ecclesiastics are solely under the command and care of the Roman Catholic Bishop and the Minister of War. It is, however, expected that they will shortly receive a Protestant military superintendent, and how necessary this is, may be judged from the following fact: One of the newly-appointed chaplains, who was stationed at Verona, was removed to Prague, and the Minister of War advertised for a successor. A candidate appeared, and was appointed. A few weeks later, it was discovered that the new Protestant chaplain was a Roman Catholic!

The garrison at Vienna contains at present about a thousand Protestants. Of these 300 are Germans, 400 Hungarians, and 300 Solaves. The whole Austrian army contains 25,000 Protestants, Lutheran and Reformed included.

In all ages it has been lamented that disbanded troops were a public scourge, and how the continued agitations in that distracted land, Hungary, have given a stamp to its people, may be gathered from the following lamentable statistics: In the years 1858, 1859, and 1860 together, 31,228 criminal cases were judged. Among the condemned, 777 received the sentence of death, and 712 were executed. From the whole, 816 were condemned for crimen læsæ majestatis; 185 for insurrection; 1,843 for robbery and assault; and 21,446 for other crimes! Oh! has not the soldier need of some spiritual care, that while he is scientifically taught how to kill, he may, at the same time, learn something of justice, mercy, and righteousness? Allow me to add, can happy Englishmen, weaving theories by their peaceful firesides, and right and left communing only with an educated and self-respecting people, enjoying religious liberty fully and really—can they judge how such a land must be ruled? Alas! our poor Emperor has to deal with a people who are not taught from their cradle, and reminded to their grave, to love, honour, and obey their lawful sovereign, as are the happy subjects of Queen Victoria: God the Almighty bless her!

One of the peculiar features of the times in many provinces of the empire is, the attempt to excite the national hate for all that is German. To appreciate this evil, we must know that morals, literature, science, everything which tends to the good and the great, has been planted among these races by the Germans from the time of Charlemagne's conquest in the eighth century, and Luther's Reformation in the sixteenth—the one giving political formations, the latter religious and scientific, and thus gradually changing these people from barbarous to civilised men. But now a small party of half-educated professors, owing what they are only to the influence of German literature, philosophy, and science (some in order to make a noise, and others, no doubt, honestly-minded), clamour loudly for the enthroning of their own language—a language, be it remembered, which can never be admitted into fellowship with polished ones, old or new, because it has never been spoken by a great or educated nation, nor been even so developed as to possess a literature of any importance—poets, dramatists, historians, or scientific authors, being almost unknown. The great Carniolian reformers—Primus Trüber, Georg Dalmatin, and Adam Bohoritsch (all three laboured in Laybach)—by translating the Bible and some religious works of the Reformation, rendered, in a certain degree, that service to their own language, the Slovene, which Luther rendered to the German, and Wickliffe to the English. The imperfect literature, if such it can be called, of the South Slaves, as the Servians, Dalmatians, Slovenes, and Croats, may perhaps be thus sketched; and I think it must be interesting, even if perhaps a little tedious, to every Christian, since it bears so much upon that intensely interesting subject—the influence of the Reformation upon the mind and manners of all tribes where it has in the slightest degree penetrated. 1. The Servians have old epic songs of great beauty—probably nothing more. 2. The Dalmatians, who are perhaps equally poor, for being principally under the Venetian Government, Italian language and manners prevailed in the towns. 3. The Slovenes, who are spread over Carniola, part of Carinthia, Styria, and Croatia, received from their reformers—principally from the great Trüber, and afterwards from Dalmatin, aided by Bohoritsch—a better and more extensive literature of a religious character. Trüber translated a great part of the Bible, Luther's "Postils," a hymnbook, a catechism, the Augsburg Confession, and Melancthon's famous "Loci Communis." Dalmatin gave an excellent translation of the whole Bible, in which labour Bohoritsch, who was a famed grammarian, helped him. About a century ago, a new Roman Catholic translation of the Scriptures appeared, Roman Catholic prayer-books and almanacks, and within the last years a few quite elementary school-books, and two tiny newspapers. 4. The Croats: Primus Trüber did not think of his countrymen only, for at the same time that his own valuable translations appeared in Slovene, he prepared for their publishing in Croatian also. Thus he presented in this dialect the New Testament, Melancthon's "Loci Communis," Luther's "Postils," a hymnbook, and the Augsburg Confession. But the most remarkable of his translations was that of the famous work of Aonio Paleario, the renowned Italian martyr, "De Beneficio Christi." Before the Italian copy of this book was found at Cambridge, there was known to exist an example in Croatian, in Glagolitic letters (Tübingen, 1663, 8vo), in the Stuttgart University, and another at Laybach. All these Croatian works were printed not only in the Latin character, but even in the old Glagolitic, and in the Cyrillic; so that, as Traber himself says, they could be read by almost all the south Slavacs as far as Constantinople. All the works I have named till now were printed and published in Wurtemberg, at Urach, and Tübingen; but in 1570, Count Georg Zrinj (the son of the immortal hero of Szigeth, a fortress which he defended with rare intrepidity against the scourge of all these lands—the infidel Turks) established a printing-press in Nedelisce, in Croatia, where the New Testament in Croatian, and a translation of the Hungarian laws, were published; so that (of which they are to this day exceedingly proud) the Croats had earlier a translation of this code as written in Latin, in their own language, than the Hungarians in theirs—the Magyar tongue. Here also were published the Protestant writings of the famous Pfarrer Butschitsch and other pastors. From Nedelisce this press was removed to Warasdin, also in Croatia, where the mystic book “The Lamb of God,” by Blasius Bohkrinjaritsch, and the translation of the letters and conversations of Erasmus, by Evan Pergoschitsch, were printed. After these fruits of Protestant life in Croatia, came a long epoch of barrenness; and only within the last few years have they recommenced to write and print—alas! under how different impulses! What has appeared are Roman Catholic prayer-books, almanacs, national songs, and at least one small newspaper.

Under pretence of patriotism, the priests, I need hardly say, fondly foster the movement for the settling of these dialects in the schools. The peasants and parents in general are far from satisfied with this, for they wish their children to improve and to advance in life; but the clergy desire to remain their rulers and teachers from first to last, and, therefore, are no way friendly to the people having the means of a constant intellectual as well as personal contact with the notions of more advanced minds. Thus, while giant Russia is awaking as a giant from the sleep of serfdom, we are distilling opiates. To give you an idea of the zeal with which this Slave party acts, I will quote a few lines from the Brunn paper of May 27, 1861: “The Czechish-minded religious teachers in our schools have arranged that the Church hymns also shall be sung in the Slave tongue. Last Friday, in consequence, broke out in St. Jacob's Church, an universal Babylonish confusion of languages; one division of the students sung the Stabat Mater in Bohemian, another in German, and a third in Latin!”

Not to think, not to be able to think, and, where the impulse to think is irresistible, then only to dare to think what they are told to think—this is the Alpha and Omega of the teaching. This is why the parrot style is adopted, in place of the clear, progressive, and deeply-ingrafted intellectual training of the German schools, and only words are learned and fluently repeated. To plant an idea, to raise an effort of reflection in the children who have received their first education in these Roman Catholic schools, is a labour indeed. THOUGHT—that great gift of God, which is the golden link between the creature and the Creator—the king's highway between earth and heaven—this is destroyed. A darkness as of chaos broods over this deep, and the command of Divine love, “Let there be light,” awaits yet that we can say, there is light. Thus the people are reared in a mental stultification, the result of which is a half-brutal and a pigmy-minded population, requiring a government which is despotic, but—if such an expression can be understood in glorious old England—a liberal and indulgent despotism. Is it not clear that men dare not be trusted with the freedom to act where they have not the freedom to think? and so long as the Roman Catholic clergy possess the minds of men, the civil government must possess their persons? Those on the spot have but too many opportunities of observing how true this is, and the result is the most pitiful want of self-respect—the almost utter absence of truth. It is the same if you are in a shop; it is the same with the workmen you employ—the same with your servants. If you act with candour, justice, and kindness, you not only fail to do them good, but you ensure for yourself that you are despised and cheated. The Wallachian peasant, after he has received a good beating from his master, will remark, “That is a perfect gentleman!” while he would only have mocked had he been corrected by words alone. That the peoples, as also all things in the Austrian Empire, are in a state of transition, is undeniable; but the great agent of a wholesome change in the treatment of the people, is wanting—that is, the free and open teaching of God's Holy Word and will—the setting forth of the one sole Saviour, or, i other words, the bestowing of what a Roman Catholic sovereign cannot bestow. I write not to apologise for absolutism; I write a prayer—a fervent, humble prayer—to England, and to one of her noblest representatives—the Evangelical Alliance. I pray them to slack not their hand, neither to grow weary, in fostering, here and there, in these dark lands, sparks of light, which with God's help shall—oh! we trust—shall one day become burning and shining lights, giving the life of true liberty to the broad lands here over which one sceptre reigns—a sceptre swayed by a hand which is, alas! often sadly calumniated.

In conclusion, I should so like to take this opportunity to express to the numerous members and friends of your Alliance, who so kindly helped our little Church just seven years ago, that these seven years have in no degree obliterated from my grateful memory that kindness and help. I cannot specify all, or even a tenth, so let me name only the happy dead—Chevalier Bunsen and Mr. Farmer; and I name them with the prayer that their places may be filled by men equally worthy.

Protestant Parsonage.

THE PROTESTANT COMMUNITY AT NEUNKIRCHEN.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Dear Sirs,—I have been requested to appeal to the liberality of British Christians in behalf of an interesting Protestant community at Neunkirchen, in the district of Neunstadt, near Vienna, which is about to avail itself of the religious liberty recently granted to the Austrian Empire, by building a church.

Neunkirchen is a little manufacturing town of about 10,000 inhabitants. Some three hundred years ago, like most other places in Southern Germany, this little town contained a Protestant community, but under the stifling, vigilant, unintermitting persecution of the House of Hapsburg, it was disorganised, dispersed, or gradually melted away into the Roman Catholic population.

During the liberal reign of Joseph II., some Protestant families settled there, but they remained as sheep without a shepherd for nearly half a century. The few who were in easy circumstances could sometimes attend Divine service at Vienna; the aged, the infirm, the poor, were wholly neglected, and the greater part of the young grew up Roman Catholics.

In 1824 they petitioned the Emperor Francis to be allowed to worship God according to their conscience. After two years of negotiation, the Protestant superintendent, Justin Hausknecht, obtained leave, as a signal mark of imperial favour, to preach two sermons annually at Neunkirchen, in presence of a Government commissioner, and with the most severe precautions against proselytism of any kind—none but those who could prove themselves hereditary Protestants being allowed to attend! This permission was strictly limited to Mr. Hausknecht personally, and upon his death, in 1834, the two sermons a-year departed with him.

Things remained in this state until 1850, when various restrictive edicts were successively abolished, and Protestants were at last allowed to organise their communities freely. Those of Neunkirchen felt that they ought to lose no time in taking advantage of concessions that might be too speedily recalled if not acted upon. They have arranged with their co-religionists of Neunstadt, the chief town of the district, that Mr. Kollatschek, a thoroughly Evangelical preacher, should, for the present, be the common pastor of the two communities; but they hope to have, one day, a minister for themselves. They find themselves to be about 150 in number, which is much more than was thought previous to inquiry, and there is reason to hope that many descendants of families once Protestant will embrace once more the faith of their fathers.

Between themselves and their friends in Vienna, they have succeeded in raising 12,000 florins (about 1,200*l.*): of this sum 550*l.* has been already disposed of to purchase a house, that will serve at once as a school and as a residence for the schoolmaster. They require about 600*l.* more to enable them to erect a modest church, upon a scale suited to the congregation which they hope to see meeting within its walls.

What with the fratricidal war in America, and with the prospect of distress at home, and with the additional responsibility of the missions in the Levant, about to be thrown, in a great measure, upon our liberality, I know that the burdens to be borne by British Christians for the ensuing year will be heavy indeed. But let us trust that the more the great Head of the Church asks at the hands of His servants, the more they will be ready to give; and most assuredly every effort of Austrian Protestantism, to rise out of the dust into which Jesuits and despots have trampled it for ages, should meet with our warmest sympathies, and our practical help.

It is this feeling that has emboldened me, my dear Sir, to make the appeal that I submit to you and to your readers.

R. W. MONSELL.

ITALY.

EVANGELICAL OPERATIONS OF THE VAUDOIS CHURCH.

It is now about a year ago that the Vaudois of Piedmont, seemingly a handful of people, almost unanimously decided on taking a very bold and resolute step. It was, as one of their friends said, not a step, but a stride. They resolved, though few in number and poor, to transplant their theological institution for training young ministers from their own valleys to the very heart of Italy—to Florence. They felt that as Italy was now open to the Gospel, every hand ought to be set to the plough, to use the opportunity of turning up the fallow ground and of sowing the good seed. They felt that their own young men would, in Tuscany, become more acquainted with the peculiarities of the other Italians, and that if some of the latter should be touched by the Word of God, and wish to become nearer acquainted with the truth, and, perhaps, themselves proclaim it as missionaries to their countrymen, the college at Florence would give them facilities of doing so, which would be very desirable.

Accordingly, last autumn, the little band set out from La Tour, in the valleys, and proceeded to Florence. Two professors, MM. Revel and Geymonat, with their families, and eight students, thus left their homes, and went to settle in the midst of the Popish strongholds. Before us now lies the first report of the Commission of Evangelization, which was nominated on the same occasion when the removal of the college was resolved. This commission consisted of three professors, one pastor, and one merchant, with the wellknown banker, Mr. Malun, of Turin, as treasurer. The commission was to take in hand all the affairs of the work of evangelization, as carried on by Vaudois or any other agency that wished to stand in connexion with them in Italy, at once relieving the Vaudois table of this constantly accumulating work, and better calculated to enter into it, as being most of them on the spot. To the synod, as it was now assembled on the 21st of May, 1861, it gives its report:—

First, regarding the stations that have already been in existence some years.

Secondly, incidental missions, or temporary ones confided to some individuals.

Thirdly, new stations; and Fourthly, the theological school, and so on, through the various heads of correspondence, accounts, and buildings.

THE OLD STATIONS.

1. Pignerol, where a new church was opened on the 29th of June last year, and two young ministers ordained. The number of hearers varies from 80 to 150; Sunday-scholars from 30 to 45; and the day-school has about 20 pupils. The evangelist stationed here being absent, the preaching is at present carried on by two professors from La Tour, who come down alternately.

2. Turin.—It has been found necessary to take away one of the ministers, whose presence was required in Central Italy. The remaining pastor, the same who has been there from the commencement, seems to have found out the secret of multiplying his own powers, so as to supply all that has been most needed. During the last month an ex-priest has been on trial as a supply for evangelization. Another ex-priest is schoolmaster. The congregation consists of 400 persons—180 adults, and 140 children, all come out of Roman Catholicism, and about 100 Protestants of different nationalities. About 150 to 200 persons come to the Sunday-school, of whom 70 are children. Altogether the three day-schools have 129 children. Besides these institutions, there is at Turin a Bible and tract dépôt, a printing press, an auxiliary committee for evangelization, a provident society, a society to give work to poor women, and a young ladies' society for taking care of children, 120 of whom are under such patronage. All these institutions are in connexion with the Vaudois Church.

Alessandria, Casale, and Voghesa have for a time been left, on account of the scarcity of labourers, but since July one has been placed at Casale, who generally has from 40 to 50 hearers, of whom 25 are communicants. He also goes to Alessandria, where there always are soldiers glad to hear the Word of God.

Besides this, he goes about preaching in the surrounding villages, where there are little knots of people who love to listen to the Gospel message.

3. Courmayeur has been a station since 1856. The first awakening there was raised by a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, whose preaching made a great impression, and occasioned a desire for a regular ministry. This little Church has grown up in the midst of struggles and troubles of various sort*, and it has about 50 faithful and persevering members. With grateful emotion we hear of 1,000 New Testaments and 500 Bibles being distributed among these simple mountaineers, who, in their turn, evangelize in their neighbourhood, and in their own houses establish family worship.

4. Genoa has two evangelists, schools, and a book dépôt; about 100 communicants, and 35 children in the Sunday-school. The girls' day-school has suffered a great loss in the death of its excellent schoolmistress.

5. Nice has during the last year entered on a new phase in consequence of the annexation. The Church has given itself a constitution of its own. The pastor continues, pro tem., in that office, though he has not broken off his relations with the Commission of Evangelization, having yet many important business matters to settle. The commission, faithful to its mandate, and the mission of the Church, receives all brethren, and gives the hand to all who will walk and work cordially with it. It never takes the initiative, or severs them, but it leaves every one at liberty to join it or to quit it. This is the position which it holds in regard to Nice. "We have not called for a separation," so the commission writes, "but when the Council of the Church communicated it to us, a little while ago, we recalled to our minds the principle which is the basis of our work of evangelization. Preach Christ to souls who are willing to hear the good news of salvation, and when the moment arrives, leave to those brethren who have been brought to the knowledge of the truth which can save us, the care of constituting themselves as best suits their views and wants."

INCIDENTAL AND TEMPORARY MISSIONS.

1. The president of the commission was sent as a deputy to the meeting of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society at Ulm, where he was most cordially received.

2. An evangelist made a preaching tour to Lyons, Marseilles, Toulon, and other places, where he tried to assemble the Vaudois employed there, and to hold reunions with them.

3. One of the members of the commission visited Milan, for the purpose of seeing whether it would be desirable to fix an evangelist in that place.

4. One of the professors of the college at La Tour went, during the vacations, on a preaching tour to the Vale of Aosta, visited various places; and the results were so encouraging, that the same professor and a neighbouring pastor were requested, by turns, to visit these places once a month, which they have done regularly all the winter.

5. The evangelist of Pignerol, with the leave of the commission, left his post, which would be otherwise supplied, and went to Naples, where it had been written that a Vaudois evangelist was a desideratum. Finding, however, that at Naples there were already two men engaged in evangelization, he went on to Palermo, where there was not a single labourer, either among Romanists or even Protestants. He has there collected some hearers, who may become the nucleus of a future congregation.

RECENT STATIONS.

According to the circumstances mentioned in the last lines of the preceding section, Palermo has been fixed upon as a new station, the evangelist who is at work there having succeeded in gathering around him a small knot of twenty-five to thirty Sicilians, who regularly attend his ministry, seeking the way of salvation.

2. At Aosta another new station has been opened. For some time nearly 190 persons attended, but in consequence of some troubles consequent on the death and burial of a Protestant colporteur, Doro,* the number diminished. These matters being settled, and a place of burial assigned to non-Catholics, the number of persons attending on the Evangelical services has again mounted up to eighty in the morning, and in several villages in the neighbourhood there is a good attendance.

3. The vast field of Lombardy could not be left wholly unoccupied, and Milan was naturally fixed upon as a suitable place for an Evangelical station. It has now been so for some months. The evangelist who is there employed goes to preach at Bergamo every evening, visits the soldiers at Pavia, and goes once a month to Brescia.

* He was clandestinely at night thrown into a grave, not only on unhallowed ground, but where only criminals were buried.

4. The last-mentioned town, Brescia, has also been fixed upon as a station. One of the colporteurs sent out from Turin not only sold a great number of Bibles there, but formed small reunions. A room was hired for the purpose, and about fifty people attended regularly. The enmity of the priests raised an uproar against the evangelicals, which even caused the effusion of blood when persons were found suspected of Protestantism. They would have killed the colporteur if they could have got hold of him, but happily they did not. Representations were made to Government, energetic measures were taken, and the said colporteur is now assistant to the evangelist of Milan at this interesting station, which he may be said to have created.

5. Leghorn is one of the most promising of the new stations, the number of auditors being so great that the meeting-room, holding 200 persons, has been found too small, and a larger one bought. Various are, however, the difficulties thrown in the way of the Vaudois as to using it.

6. Pisa for some time was a very promising station; the number of auditors rose to seventy, but a spirit of dissension unhappily arose, which caused a split in the congregation and the closing of the school. The evangelist will probably be sent to some other field of labour, where his zeal and his love for the salvation of souls can be better appreciated.

7. Florence is naturally the place where the Evangelical labourers of Tuscanry have a rallying point. All contributes to make it so—the higher cultivation of the people, a more liberal spirit, the enlargement of the mind which is attendant on the cultivation of the fine arts, sciences, and historical remembrances—all this seemed to prepare the way for the Gospel. Two Vaudois evangelists worked there successively during the years 1859 and 1860, but under the pressure of much difficulty. Among those who sought the Lord, there were no less than five different parties, but, happily, such elements as harmonised have united, and the state of things is now more normal.

THE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL

is closely connected with the missionary station at Florence. The removal of the former, instead of proving—as many of its more timid friends feared—a failure, has already tended to the edification of some. There are six public services in connexion with the mission. At Easter there were more than one hundred and fifty hearers, and sixty-five communicants

—a Sunday-school with twenty children, and day-schools with about twenty in each. The students have a "Young Men's Christian Association," which is a means of edification, not only to themselves, but to several young Florentines who have become their associates. It rejoiced the hearts of their teachers to find that, on giving them a serious exhortation some time ago, the young men came and opened their hearts to them, claiming their counsels and their prayers in regard to the state of their souls. This is mentioned only because it is to be hoped they may be made subjects of prayer.

COLPORTAGE.

This special work is not under the superintendence of the Commission of Evangelization, as such, but some of its members, and also some of its missionaries, have employed colporteurs, either for a short time or for the year round, and all have, with intense interest, watched the blessed work of those humble and effective ministers of the Word. It has been calculated, by one who has been specially occupied with watching the progress of this work, that 50,000 copies of the Bible and the New Testament have been sold during the course of last year. If this sowing is diligently watered by the prayers of God's children, it will certainly, one day or other, bear rich fruits. A most stirring example of the lively interest with which it is looked upon by some of them in other countries, is here detailed. A strong desire was felt by some of the commission to send one or two colporteurs into Sicily. Two young men from Liguria, already accustomed to the work, were ready to go, but where was the money to come from? Just at that moment of perplexity, a letter came from an old peasant in the south of Sweden. It was as follows:—

"May the Lord, who has begun in you a good work, be pleased to carry it on, and finish it to the day of Jesus Christ. It is now thirty-five years since I learnt to know the antiquity, the great sufferings, and the innumerable trials of your Church, and now I experience a profound joy in seeing that your Church is a city on the hill, which throws out its light afar. When, in 1825, a collection was made for your hospital, I could not give much myself, because I was very poor, but I encouraged my friends to do what they could; but to-day, when the Lord has blessed me by giving me more than what is needful for me, Christian charity constrains me to send you these 285 francs, to aid you in your mission

My very dear Vaudois, my heart is full of tenderness and affection for you, who are the descendants of thousands of Christians, who have suffered martyrdom for the maintenance of the pure Gospel. My prayer goes up to the Lord for the success of your work—yes, may the Lord maintain among you pure doctrine and Christian zeal—that sacred deposit preserved among you during so many centuries, in the midst of so many persecutions and sufferings, so much poverty and oppression! May zeal grow up and increase in faith and Christian love among the people of Italy. May the Lord hear this prayer of a feeble Christian friend!—AHE ANDERSSON.

Two months later the same old man wrote:—

"Much-loved fathers and brethren,—May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ accomplish your work in faith!

"After having sent you this summer a sum to the same amount as what I now send you—for the propagation of the Gospel among the Roman Catholics in Italy—I heard that the Bible is received and read with avidity by Romanists, which has put into my heart not to bury the talents which the Lord has given me, but to make them useful, employing them for the extension of the kingdom of Jesus Christ on the earth, and therefore I send this money to be laid out in purchasing of Bibles to be distributed among your Roman Catholic countrymen—some to be paid for by those who can, others to be given away, or sold at a low price to the poor. Go forward courageously in your work, in the strength of faith, without counting much on material resources; and be convinced that God will provide for the burnt offering. (Gen. xxii. 8.)

"Continue to be as salt on the earth in these last corrupt times of the world. May the Lord bless your work, and make it successful!—that is the wish and prayer of the soul and heart of a feeble brother in Jesus Christ.

(Signed) "OLD PEASANT FROM THE SOUTH OF SWEDEN."

With such testimonies of the goodness of the Lord before their eyes, the commission immediately sent the two colporteurs into Sicily, without concerning themselves about where the money would come from to complete their salaries. They were no sooner sent than a letter came from America, which contained money collected by the children of a Sunday-school. The children had heard of Garibaldi's expedition into Sicily, and they expressed their wish that colporteurs might be sent into Sicily, to carry the Bible to its inhabitants!

Such is the substance of the report lying before us. We cannot recount all the difficulties which they have to contend with in regard to their places of worship, for they are innumerable; we can only sympathise with them, and hope that Government will afford them the protection they need in their struggles with those who still hold to the old system of shutting them out from every house, and room, and right, as fellow-citizens. Alas for Cavour! He always lent a willing ear and an active hand to help in these matters, when they reached him. May his spirit dwell on his followers in the Italian Government! To every minister of the Gospel and every colporteur in Italy, who is doing his Master's work in sincerity and truth, we say from our hearts, God speed!

INVITATION TO THE THIRD MEETING OF THE SCANDINAVIAN CHURCH.

As the third meeting of the Scandinavian Church is fixed to be held in Christiana (Norway) on the 29th, 30th, and 31st of July, the undersigned, constituting the Swedish division of the committee for the Meeting of the Church, invite in friendliness their fellow-countrymen, without respect to rank or learning, to attend, and with equal friendliness request that all who take part in the meeting, either as members or hearers, will be pleased to send to one or other of the undersigned written notice of their intention, that the Norwegian managing committee may be informed in good time of the number of guests for whose lodging they will have to provide. They who desire to have any particular question discussed, which they will be prepared in a suitable manner to introduce, ought to apprise one of us of their intention.

AUSTRIA—TYROL.

The Provincial Diet of Tyrol, headed by the Ultramontane Bishop of Brixen, has adopted by a majority a solemn protest against the introduction of the laws in favour of the Protestants, which virtually abrogate the Concordat, which has been the bane and curse of Austria. A large number of Tyrolese residents of Vienna, indignant at this proceeding, have issued the following address to their fellow-countrymen of Tyrol: "We are grieved and ashamed at the proceedings of those zealots who have succeeded in urging the Provincial Diet of Tyrol to adopt a protest against the new laws for the Austrian Protestants. While everywhere, at home and abroad, this act of justice, so long due to our Protestant fellow-citizens, has been hailed with the utmost joy and satisfaction, a spirit of blind and persecuting fanaticism has been roused in our country, where but a very few Protestants live, and open war is declared against the fundamental law of confessional equality—a principle which is acknowledged by every constitutional government. As every liberal voice in Tyrol has been silenced by the arms of terrorism, it will be a satisfaction to the few intrepid champions of religious liberty to know that they have the moral support and sympathy of their countrymen at Vienna, who, though for many years not residing in Tyrol, have never ceased to be devotedly attached to it, and who, with the deepest sorrow, have witnessed the abuse which is carried on by a bigoted priesthood against our simple-hearted religious countrymen."

BRUSSELS.

On Sunday, April 7, the Evangelical congregation (Rue Belliard) witnessed a most impressive and touching scene. Pastor Panchaud received into his congregation eight deaf and dumb converts from Romanism, who had been brought to the knowledge of the Saviour through the instrumentality of one equally afflicted, who had preached to them through the language of signs the everlasting Gospel of Christ. This excellent Christian, by profession a painter, presented his hearers to Pastor Panchaud, and requested him to examine them in the truths of the Gospel. Out of eleven, eight were accepted as Church members. The Pastor's questions and their written answers were read to the congregation, who afterwards joined with their new brethren in the Lord's Supper. This small dumb and deaf congregation used to meet for worship in a hired room; now, at the same hour when the congregation assembles on Sunday, these afflicted brethren meet in the schoolroom below the church; and while the Pastor above preaches with loud voice the Gospel of Christ, the small silent congregation below worship God in spirit and in truth. The Bible is open before them, they read and have it expounded by signs. They sing the praise and glory of God, not in words, but with the hymnbook before them they express the words by gesticulations—an act which, though rather strange to a spectator, cannot be but highly impressive and edifying to a Christian.

BASLE—POPULAR LECTURES AGAINST INFIDELITY.

The series of popular doctrinal lectures, delivered during last winter at Basle, by six of her principal pastors and professors, has just been published. The first volume contained four lectures; the second, which has just appeared, contains the following six lectures: 1, On the Person of Jesus Christ (by Professor Riggenschach); 2, The Redemption of the World by Jesus Christ (Pastor Gess); 3, Christ, the Risen and Exalted Saviour (Professor Auberlin); 4, The Holy Spirit and the Christian Church (Pastor Preiswerk); 5, The Doctrine of Justification by Faith (Dr. Stockmeyer); 6, The Immortality of the Soul and Eternal Life (Pastor Staehelin). These different subjects are treated with remarkable talent; the form is generally simple and popular, the style easy and attractive.

BASLE—SUNDAY SCHOOLS

are in existence at Basle, and a new one is to be opened next winter; but they are principally engaged in imparting secular knowledge. The three already existing take up different classes of visitors. Not only the young men of the town of Basle, but those of the neighbourhood, frequent them, notwithstanding distance and bad weather. In the winter, from 1859 to 1860, 858 persons visited the school for artisans and workmen. From 1860 to 1861, 1,003. The total number of those who have been in the schools from 1859-60 was 4,703, of whom 2,423 came to learn to read, 1,786 to learn to write, and 490 to learn drawing. From 1860 to 1861 the total number amounted to 5,188.

GENEVA—ADOLPHUS SOCIETY.

A society has been formed at Geneva, with the above-mentioned name, borne by various other societies in French towns during the last years. They were begun at the instigation of M. Adolphé Monod, and bear his name, in memory of the kind interest he took in the works of Christian love at La Force. The aim of the society is to procure "bonuses" to support children in the establishments at La Force, thus enabling the young ladies of Geneva opportunities of assisting children not so well off as themselves. Each member of the society has to raise, in the year, at least twenty-five francs towards the support of a child. Every three months the society meets to receive the communications of Mr. John Bost, in regard to the children adopted by it, and also about asylums in general.

FRIBOURG, IN SWITZERLAND.

For some years there has been a question of enlarging the Protestant chapel of Fribourg. When it was built, in 1838, there were not more than 350 Protestants in the town; now there are more than 3,500. Of course the chapel is too small. Reasonable Roman Catholics see this as well as Protestants. The Roman Catholic journal, The Echo, has had the audacity to represent the proposed enlargement of this chapel as a provocation on the part of the Protestants towards the Roman Catholics. It is in this way they respond to the kindness of the Protestants, who always facilitate the erection of Roman Catholic places of worship wherever they are wanted. Still more at Morat, where the Prefect is a Protestant, he has ceded gratuitously to the Roman Catholic inhabitants—who are in a small minority, and had no locality where to meet—a room in his own house there to celebrate their worship.

The following are the principal passages of the article on the subject, in the Echo of Truth, as it is called. It bears the title, "A New Protestant Temple":—

"We allow ourselves to make the observation that there is an essential difference between the position of Catholicism and Protestantism. A religion which is essentially visible in its nature, a religion which holds public doctrines, and which obliges all those that are faithful to it frequently to partake of several of its sacraments, cannot logically do without priests and churches. To prevent Catholicism in the erection of temples or in the free preaching of its doctrines, is, therefore, to suppress that religion in its natural and necessary development, it is taking away its means of existence. It is renewing the tyranny of Nero and the Julians. Can the same be said of Protestantism?"

After a long tirade, with the usual puerile objections about the absence of unity in the faith among Protestants, the article goes on as follows:—

"How are we to understand that, with all their dogmatical divisions, Protestants still continue to unite in temples? A temple is the symbol of unity in the faith. Where there is no unity, there ought to be no temples. The Bible, nothing but the Bible, that is the Protestant religion. . . . A Protestant minister has always seemed to us to be a ridiculous and monstrous superfetation. . . . The Protestant minister, however learned and eloquent he may be considered, has no Divine mission in the eyes of his co-religionists. Protestantism is a purely negative religion. It is an assemblage of individuals united only by their hatred of Catholicism. . . . Therefore, when we keep on logical ground, Protestant temples seem to us to be absurd, and their erection is, to our eyes, nothing but a provocation."

It must be added that this article, as may be expected, instead of finding an echo in the Fribourg population, provoked general indignation. The Reformed congregation of Fribourg celebrated its 25th anniversary last Whitsuntide.

ITALY.—MAZZARELLA AND HIS FIRST LECTURE.

Bonaventura Mazzarella, Professor of Moral Philosophy at the University of Bologna, and Member of the Italian Parliament, was formerly an advocate in the kingdom of Naples. Condemned to death on account of his liberal tendencies in 1848, he escaped to Corfu, where he earned his livelihood by giving lessons in classics and mathematics. In 1851 he went to Turin. Poverty and misfortune had produced in his mind infidelity, and hatred against every kind of religion and Divine worship. Thus he entered into the newly-opened Church of the Vaudois at Turin (1852), for the purpose of using any weak arguments in the preaching of the pastor in a book against Christianity, which he was about to publish. He came again and again to the Church. The struggle caused in his soul by the preaching of the Gospel produced a violent brain fever, and, after his recovery, he called on the pastor, whose sermons had so deeply impressed him. After a few months he became his friend and coadjutor in instructing the young, in visiting the sick, and even in preaching, to which, though a layman, he was admitted on account of his wonderful eloquence; his livelihood he gained as clerk in a small business. When the cholera broke out in Genoa, in 1854, he appeared in the meanest cottages of the sick and dying as a helping angel; he prayed with them, rubbed their cold limbs, held them in his arms in the agony of death; he covered the sick with his coat, or gave them his own shirt, for the purpose of changing the linen of the sick. Some misunderstanding separated him from the Vaudois, whose church was then less attended than his own Bible and prayer-meetings. His ministering to the Italian Churches at Genoa, Alexandria, and Asti is well known to the friends of the Gospel. A very able book, a critique on science, attracted King Victor Emmanuel's attention, who appointed him, in 1860, Professor of Moral Philosophy at the University of Bologna. Here are notes of his first lecture, communicated to us by a friend, who was present when he delivered it. He treated of two questions: 1. Are we (the Italians) in a condition to render the study of morals as possible as it is necessary? 2. What preparation is necessary to attain to the study of the moral sciences? Upon the first question he said: "1. It is of the first importance that liberty should be enjoyed, in order to make researches into morality. In slavery the Government or the priest is everything. It is impossible to discover one's duties with freedom. Power and superstition are everything. Italy is now free in a great measure: therefore, the study of morals ought to be pursued in Italy, for, without morality, there can be no lasting liberty. 2. In order to be able to understand the science of duty, one must have suffered: it is by the sorrow caused by one's faults that the importance of morality is discovered. Italy has suffered much; she is, therefore, in a good condition for studying and comprehending moral science. 3. Another condition is activity. For the idle there is neither morality nor possibility of moral studies. Italy is active now. She no longer slumbers. She is, consequently, in one of the best conditions for the study of the moral sciences. 4. Another condition is to have a future in prospect. He who is shut up in the present has no morality, and is not fitted for moral studies. Italy has a future; she, therefore, ought to study morality, otherwise she will fail in her object." Upon the second question he said: "1. That confidence should be felt in one's personality as a moral being. 2. Duty must be earnestly loved. 3. There must be a candid mind and a right heart. 4. One must be accustomed to think for one's self, without prejudice and superstition." He concluded by showing the importance of duty for man, and, in particular, for the Italians.

TURKEY.

MISSION FIELD OF TURKEY.

(From Rev. Mr. Jessup, Missionary, Beyrout.)

The political horizon is still dark; but after all, what have we to do with the concerns of Syria, so long as God remains on the throne? He will surely govern Syria still, and govern it well, whatever men may do, or fail to do! We cannot be too careful in drawing conclusions from what has happened. It is easy to be mistaken when the whole social fabric is undergoing radical and violent changes—yet I think I can discover some very bright features in the present and prospective condition of this people. There are various tokens for good, which encourage our hearts, and which we delight to communicate to our friends at home.

A most important step towards religious liberty has just been taken in the darkest part of Mount Lebanon—that which lies between Beyrout and Tripoli. The present governor is Yusef Keram—a man born in Ehden (from which place two different American missionaries have been violently expelled)—trained under French influence, and while a rigid Romanist, yet somewhat Europeanised

He differs from the majority of the Maronites in Syria, in that he has studied the Bible for many years, and it is believed he has some regard for the Sabbath. He has been installed in office by Fuad Pasha, and is beginning to exert a wide influence.

A very gratifying fact has just come to our notice in the course of the new governor. He has issued an edict to all the Maronite clergy—from the Patriarch down to the parish priest—absolutely forbidding all future interference on their part in civil and political affairs. This undoubtedly originates in a source higher than Yusef Keram, and, savouring strongly of Napoleonic inspiration, has struck a deadly blow at priestly dominion in Syria. When the notorious Bishop Tobia, of Beyrout, read this edict, he trembled; and well he might, for there is little left to the clergy when shorn of their political strength. Their intermeddling in politics, and in suits of law among the people, has wellnigh been the ruin of the land. It has furnished them with the means of oppressing the poor, and given them resistless power in the persecution of in-quirers after the truth. Now that prerogative is gone, we pray that it may never return.

Another fact worthy of note is that the Pope, through the leading Maronite clergy, has given permission to the people to eat meat in Lent. This is a radical innovation for Syria. Ten years ago the Maronites would as soon have thought of denying the Pope as of violating the great fast. Now it is openly proclaimed that any one can eat meat who will pay 2d. a day for the privilege! This proclamation has opened the eyes of multitudes. They argue the point with the clergy and say, "If the violation of the fast be wrong, 2d. cannot make it right; and if it be right, why pay for the privilege of doing right?" and thus refuse the money.

The Sabbath congregations in Beyrout and vicinity are larger than usual. A similar state of things exists at the Aheih and Sidon stations. The Beyrout Sunday-school numbers 150 scholars, and the interest is increasing. The youth and children now under Protestant instruction is larger than ever before. In our day-school are 115 boys and 115 girls—230 in all. In the Orphans' Home of the Prussian Protestant Deaconesses there are 122 girls; and in the school of Mrs. Bowen Thompson, 100 girls and 65 women. In addition to these Miss Watson has about 20 girls under instruction, making the whole number daily receiving Protestant instruction to exceed 500. Would that we had means to enlarge still more in this department, now that the Providence of God seems opening the way to the entrance of light among the people! but alas! the financial circumstances of our board warn us to retrench, and we fear lest our two most important schools—the male seminary and the female boarding-school—should continue suspended for an indefinite period.

THE RESULTS OF SIX YEARS' MISSIONARY LABOUR IN MARASH.

(From a Private Letter.)

Marash, Turkey, April 17, 1861.

Marash is a city of 30,000 inhabitants (one-third of whom are Christians), and is situated at the foot of the southern slope of the Taurus Range. The houses are mostly of sundried brick, and very poor—mud walls, mud floor, mud roof—and usually are destitute of all furniture, except a few pieces of bedding and a few cooking utensils.

It was a long time before our helpers could gain a foothold here. At least ten, and some say thirteen, helpers, one after the other, were either banished or imprisoned; and even Dr. Schneider was forbidden by the Pasha to preach. A foothold, however, was at last obtained, and the church was organised December, 1854. In these six years, what hath God wrought? We have now a substantial stone church, capable of seating from 1,200 to 1,500 persons, a regular Sabbath congregation of from 700 to 1,000, a church of 225 members, six schools, containing 350 scholars; and from this point as a centre, light and truth are being irradiated through all the region around. Would that you could come and see the grace of God as manifested in this place!

This winter we have had a blessed work of grace. It began in December, when an unusual spirit of prayer was manifested, and many little meetings for prayer sprang up over the whole city. Then followed the week of prayer, and since then some hundred or more individuals have joined our community, and I think at least fifty have become new creatures in Christ Jesus. I think, could you know them, and see them in their homes, you would feel they do, indeed, bear the image and character of Christ. They are all poor, earning usually but from five to ten pence a day, and some so poor they have scarce even dry bread enough to satisfy hunger; still every member of the Church feels it to be his duty to give monthly for some benevolent object: even those who have to sit in the dark for want of a light, give their five or ten paras.

One of our most profitable, delightful, and cheapest labours, is the teaching the women to read. Before the Gospel came to Marash, not two women—i.e., Armenian women—could be found able to read; now 200 Protestant women, and 50 Armenian and Catholic women, have already learned, or are learning, to read God's holy Word. Our school boys and girls go morning and evening to the houses, receiving one penny for every twenty lessons, and in this way the good seed of the Word is being scattered over the whole city. Three years ago not three persons in the whole city were acquainted with arithmetic, geography, and grammar. Now we have large, interesting schools in these branches. May I not ask that you will often pray for God's people in Marash, and for us, that as our day is, so our strength may be?

[Such is the testimony of one who has lived and laboured among the people he describes. From another pen we give the impression made upon an experienced missionary brother, visiting the place:]

This town is the place where an English Government agent and his family were murdered by the Turks, during the war. The people have ever had the reputation of being exceedingly barbarous and fanatic. Twelve years ago there was not an openly avowed Protestant in the place; and again and again native preachers, who were sent here from Aintab, were driven out, beaten, stoned, &c.

[The writer gives the present number of the converts, as mentioned above, and goes on to say:]

Last Sunday, forty new members were added, and I was present, and addressed a congregation of about 1,500 persons. It was a most soul-inspiring sight, and I felt almost like saying, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace."

The year before last, by the aid of our Church-building Fund at Constantinople, the people here erected a house of worship, which is now filled with hearers. Last Sunday it was crammed full, and ordinarily there are somewhat over a thousand hearers, and the number is constantly increasing. The people, generally, are poor. I have visited several of the Protestant families since I came. Their houses are built of earth, or sundried brick, and usually consist of only one low room, with the ground for floor, and every appearance of deep poverty. In many of these houses there are handlooms for weaving cotton cloth, which seems to be the principal business of the place, and they are very industrious. Still, the utmost that a man can earn in this way, in a day, is from six to ninepence. They generally live upon coarse bread and cheap fruit, which is here very abundant. And yet this people, in their deep poverty, show a spirit of self-denial that would be a worthy example for their fellow-Christians in other and more favoured lands.

They contributed to their utmost ability towards building their church, the women sometimes selling some article from their already scanty wardrobe, to aid in the work. The aid we gave them from Constantinople was by way of loan, and they were to pay back 8,000 piastres a-year. Last year they exceeded their promise, and paid 7,000 piastres of the debt to our treasurer. They have also formed a Home Missionary Society among themselves, and with its funds they send men to the neighbouring villages, to preach the Gospel. They also regularly contribute for the relief of the poor among them, and for other good objects. During the last year the aggregate amount of money contributed by this poor people, for various religious and benevolent objects, was 12,000 piastres, or about 100*l.* sterling. This is really a very large sum, considering the worldly condition of the people from whom it came.

It has become quite evident that a new place of worship ought at once to be erected in another part of this town, to accommodate all who desire to come. From all present appearances a new congregation, as large as the first, could be gathered soon, if a new house were erected. The present church has not yet been completed for want of funds. The walls are yet unplastered, and the ground is the only floor; and evidently the people are too poor to undertake to build another house with their own unaided means.

ALGERIA.

PROGRESS OF THE BIBLE AND BOOK DEPOT AT ORAN.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.
Oran, Algeria, May 7, 1861.

Dear Sirs,—Through your kind courtesy, my first report, relative to the Bible and Book Depot I have established in this city, appeared in Evangelical Christendom of January last. I shall feel obliged if you will likewise insert the following lines on the same subject.

Among the many important offices which your valuable periodical performs, not the least useful is that of supplying a medium of communication between those engaged in individual efforts for the spread of truth, and the friends and supporters of Christ's cause throughout the world. I include myself in that category; for, though I am here as the accredited missionary of "The British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews," I have embarked in this enterprise for the dissemination of the sacred Scriptures and religious books, among all classes of the mixed population of this province of Algeria, entirely on my own responsibility. I am happy to add that the Committee of my Society have not only approved it, but contributed very liberally to its support.

It is my firm conviction that a missionary—without in the least neglecting the duties of his special mission—may, and should, do something towards promoting the spiritual welfare of other classes, not immediately under his charge, whenever these are not attended to by other labourers. As far as the mission to the Jews in these parts is concerned, such a course is highly beneficial. It reacts most favourably on their minds. The unpleasantness of being singled out as the particular objects of a missionary's operations is considerably removed when they see him unhesitatingly addressing the same message, and offering salvation on the very same terms, to others besides themselves; and their astonishment is great to witness his efforts to lead to the foot of the Cross those whom they are wont to regard as Christians. This circumstance arrests their attention. For the first time, perhaps, they become aware that Christianity is something different and superior to what they see in the life and practices of its professed followers. Curiosity is excited. They eagerly enquire into the distinction between profession and reality; and the occasion presents itself for forcibly pointing out the source of error in Popery and Judaism—the attempts of fallible men to improve what is Divine—in short, human traditions. Besides, all earnest missionaries must feel it a primary duty to promote the circulation of the Word of God among the objects of their solicitude, and the efforts put forth to accomplish this may as well embrace all classes of the population. This being a work of common interest, co-operation among the several missionaries and ministers in the same locality is most desirable. In other stations I endeavoured to bring it about, and in some instances with success. Since the Dépôt was established here, I have been trying to prevail on my fellow-labourers to share unitedly in the work; but, hitherto, each has preferred to give separately whatever countenance and assistance he could. Now, however, I am in hopes of seeing my wish accomplished. To-morrow the two ministers and two missionaries in this neighbourhood will meet me, to form themselves into a committee for the management of this enterprise.

The following is a statement of results for the second six months of the Dépôt's existence. For comparison, and to show that the circulation continues to increase, I put down the totals of the two epochs:—

	Books and Scriptures, Pamphlets, Tracts, realised.	Amount £ s. d.
April to Sept: 314	120	294 23 11 2½
Oct. to March: 466	513	60 28 11 2½
Totals: 780	633	354 52 2 5
Avg. per Month: 65	53	30 4 6 10

The gratuitous distribution from the Dépôt has been: Scriptures, 81; Books and Pamphlets, 49; Tracts, 285.

	£ s. d.
The expenditure during the first six months was:	83 6 10
During the second:	48 11 3½

Total: 131 18 1½

Upwards of 30*l.* has been invested in the purchase of Scriptures, books, and tracts, mostly of those issued by the various continental societies.

So far all is encouraging. The last six months show an increase in the sales of 152 Scriptures and 393 books, &c. On the other hand, there is a decrease in the expenditure of nearly 35*l.* But there is another decrease, that is not at all satisfactory. It is in the income from grants and donations, for, whereas 7*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* were received during the first half-year, only 2*l.* 19*s.* 3½*d.* have been received during the last. There is, therefore, a deficiency of income of no less than 32*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* It must be evident, then, that unless liberal assistance is forthcoming, the Dépôt will have to be closed. This would be a sad disappointment, not only to myself, but to all the friends of the Bible in these parts, and a sort of exultation to priests, Jesuits, and bigots of all descriptions. Surely the readers of Evangelical Christendom, among the foremost in aiding every good work, will respond promptly to this appeal for help, and enable me to maintain this enterprise, and to extend its operations all over this province, by the employment of a colporteur! And I have now the satisfaction to state that a suitable individual has at last been found—an elderly French Protestant, who seems to have had some experience of the work in France, and who wishes to engage in it more from a desire to promote truth, than for the sake of the remuneration he may receive. He has already entered on his duties, and he is now preparing to proceed on an extensive tour. He will be instrumental in supplying the Protestants scattered through the towns, villages, and farms in the interior—many of whom are rarely visited by either minister or missionary—with the Word of God and religious books (at present so far beyond their reach), that may keep alive their attachment to the truth, and fortify them against the constant, and frequently, alas! too successful assaults of the Popish priesthood; and by the dissemination of the sacred oracles and good books, he will do there what the Dépôt is doing in this city—create a taste for religious literature among all classes.

It is no exaggeration, I assure you, when I say that the Dépôt is creating a taste for religious literature. The fact that nearly one thousand Scriptures, books, and pamphlets, have been sold during the last six months, should be sufficient proof of this. And when I add that, according to the last census, there were only 519 Protestants in the whole province, no one will think they could have been purchased by them. No; they were sold to Roman Catholics, Jews, and Mohammedans; and it is this that constitutes the great value of the Dépôt. Perhaps five per cent. may have been bought by Protestants. I can fancy with what pleasure the Rev. Mr. Puaux, of Mulhouse, will learn that his "Anatomy of Popery," and "The True Question," have been extensively read in Oran, and created quite a sensation; that they went from hand to hand among the employés of the Prefecture and other Government offices, both civil and military. I can also imagine the gratification it would have afforded to many of your readers, to have, a few days since, witnessed a crowd of Spaniards, lately arrived from Barcelona—after an interesting conversation, on the religious movement going on in Spain, and their connexion with it, and observing with a smile that possibly some of them may go to prison for reading the Bible and talking of Jesus—issuing forth from the Dépôt each with a packet of books under his arm, consisting altogether of twenty-two Scriptures and twenty-six books and pamphlets, such as Monod's "Lucilla," the "Pilgrim's Progress," and the like, besides a good number of tracts; and to have seen with what readiness they paid the prices asked. They bought those books, not for themselves only, but also for their friends in Spain. To-day a Spaniard from the same locality purchased a Bible, a Testament, and ten or twelve volumes.

I could mention many instances in which the perusal of the books purchased at the Dépôt has been blessed to immortal souls. But, not to occupy too much of your space, I will relate only one case. It is that of a retired French military officer, a man of superior intelligence, formerly a Roman Catholic, but who now professes himself a Protestant, and attributes his enlightenment to intercourse with me, or, as I would say, to the study of the Bible and other books he bought at the Dépôt. He must have read the Bible with very close attention, for he was able to detect several errors, of which he informed the Bible Society. This gentleman is full of zeal for the spread of truth. He has removed his sons from the Jesuit into the Protestant school, and thereby exposed himself to great annoyance. He is constantly bringing people to the Dépôt, and persuading them to buy the Scriptures, &c. He corresponds with his former comrades on religious topics, and in more than one instance he has bought Bibles and other books to send to them as presents, having previously obtained promises that they will read them attentively. He is a frequent writer in the local newspaper, and, no matter on what subject he writes, he contrives to put in something that may excite inquiry. I remember several of his papers headed with a passage from the Scriptures, sometimes one of the commandments. His last contribution was an article on "Héliu's History of Protestants in France," published by the Religious Tract Society. He indicated where the book could be got, and the result is that several copies have been sold since. His energy and zeal are indeed worthy of imitation. So soon as he heard of Garibaldi's arrival in Naples, he came to consult me about his going thither, without loss of time, to disseminate the sacred Scriptures among the emancipated Neapolitans. For the sake of his wife and children, I dissuaded him from a course that would have been ruinous to his temporal interests, assuring him that the Bible Society would not fail to improve the opportunity at once. I could speak of others in positions of trust and honour, some of them European Jews, who, from professed atheists, are now students of the Divine oracles; but, for obvious reasons, it would not be prudent to say anything by which they could be identified.

Without claiming any higher interest for the work going on here than belongs to the same work in other missionary stations, I shall hope that the figures and facts stated above will not fail to produce the desired effect. One thing is certain, that without prompt and liberal help, this enterprise, so full of promise, cannot be much longer maintained. What say you, friends of the Bible?

I am, dear Sirs, yours very sincerely,

A. BENOLIEZ.

BIBLE DEPOT AND COLPORTAGE AT ALGIERS.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Dear Sirs,—Those Christian friends who are in the habit of reading the missionary record of the United Presbyterian Church in Scotland had often the occasion to hear that there exists at Algiers a missionary, a chapel connected with that mission, wherein the Gospel is regularly preached, two schools for boys and girls, wherein secular and religious instruction is daily given; moreover, that there are employed two colporteurs, and that, for nearly three years, there has existed an open Bible dépôt for the sale of the Scriptures and religious books. The Bible dépôt was, about a year and a-half ago, enlarged and converted into a Protestant bookseller's shop, by which means hundreds of copies of the Holy Scriptures, and thousands of religious books and tracts, are yearly disseminated, not only in the town of Algiers and its vicinity, but also through the whole province; and often orders are received and attended to, and Scriptures, books, and tracts are sent to places of the other provinces. It would, therefore, have been with surprise that some of these Christian friends met with the following statement in a letter from the Rev. A. Benoliel, Oran, and which appears in the Evangelical Christendom of this month: "It is now my happiness, also, to establish the first dépôt for the sale of Scriptures and religious books in Algeria." Now I beg to assure you that it is by no means the honour of being the first to establish such a Bible dépôt in Algeria that I intend to claim for myself by these remarks, nor do I in the least depreciate the good work of Mr. Benoliel, or cast the least doubt on the great necessity and services of such a Bible dépôt at Oran. But I considered it my duty—and for reasons which you will easily understand and appreciate—to correct a mistake in a statement of a brother missionary who is placed so near to my station, and which statement may therefore startle friends in a far-off country, and seem to them a contradiction to what they have hitherto read in my letters with reference to this mission at Algiers. Trusting that you will have the kindness to insert these few lines in your next periodical, and praying that the Lord may greatly bless your labours for the noble purpose of advancing Christian unity, love, and harmony among the followers of Christ, I am, my dear Sirs, yours truly,

BENJAMIN WEISS,
Missionary at Algiers, from the United Presbyterian Church in Scotland.

UNION OF CHURCHES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Hanley, May 16, 1861.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

I forward for your perusal, and (should you feel so inclined) insertion in Evangelical Christendom, the following account of a Union recently formed among certain Churches in South Africa. But before I make any remarks upon this Union, allow me, on my own behalf and on behalf of a number of my brethren in the missionary work, to thank the friends who so kindly send us Evangelical Christendom. I suspect we have most of us been very negligent in making due acknowledgment, but we all hail its appearance monthly with great delight, and should be happy to furnish any similar information respecting the Lord's work in South Africa.

This Union has arisen from the desire for Christian sympathy, and the want of concert, felt by a number of Churches in the colony. A majority of these Churches have either been planted by the London Missionary Society, or been intimately connected with it; and therefore, in seeking after some principles which they all held in common as a basis of union, have been able to comprise some other Churches which have never had connexion with that society. The very catholicity of that society becomes a bar to a union among its Churches on any recognised denominational principles, for many of its agents are Presbyterians and many are Congregationalists, and some are Lutherans, and others do not in theory object to State endowments; and this is the case with European as well as native Churches that have sprung up more or less under its auspices.

A few years ago the London Missionary Society intimated to the native Churches within the colony, their opinion that the time had arrived for those Churches to undertake the charge of all gospel ordinances, and to cease to be dependent for pecuniary support on the Churches in Great Britain. Considering their poverty, those Churches have done remarkably well, and in a number of instances have, from that time, fully sustained the ordinances of religion, whilst in other cases the deficiency has been greater or less. For such deficiencies the Churches at present apply for aid to the London Missionary Society. The European Churches are able fully to sustain their own charges, and have shown a disposition to be liberal, which only needs to find a channel, in some organised association like the present, to effect much good. There are many small communities in the towns and villages rapidly springing up in the colony and neighbouring settlements, who, if assisted for a few years, would soon be able to acquire stability enough to maintain their religious privileges unaided; and, as you will perceive, these are among the principal objects proposed by the Union. As an instance, I may mention that an application has been made for aid from such a community in King William's-town, where there are a number of Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists, who have united, and are now expecting a minister from the Free Church of Scotland. These people acknowledge with gratitude that they have hitherto enjoyed the ministry and pastorate of the Wesleyan ministers of that town; but still, much as they value those services, they have a preference for the forms of worship, &c., which their own Churches have distinctively from the Wesleyan, and in common with each other. In the same manner it is not at all improbable that when this same Church has multiplied, and needs to send forth its colonies of believers, these may again go forth according to their distinct denominational principles, and that without bigotry or illwill, but maintaining "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." It is to be hoped that the Church of Christ is becoming wiser in these matters, and among the agencies which have tended to promote this better spirit, the Evangelical Alliance is the foremost.

The Churches here labour under a disadvantage, which is probably a greater obstacle to thorough union than sectarianism, and that is the diversity of languages spoken among them. The Union comprises those who speak the English, Dutch, and Kaffir languages; and although its general meetings will comprise delegates from all these Churches, very many will, from this diversity, be virtually excluded from taking any part in the deliberations. The proceedings will, of course, be conducted in the English language, and it is to be hoped that this will furnish the native Churches with an additional motive for acquiring the knowledge of that language. Still, we are in hopes that while intercourse must for this reason be small among the various Churches, the bond of their common Christianity will surmount these obstacles, and enable them to act in combination, and to furnish each other mutual aid.

Another serious obstacle to the efficiency of the Union, is the great distance that many of these Churches are separated from each other—about 100 miles, in several instances, lying between a Church and its nearest neighbour. The Cape Colony, with British Kaffraria, is about 800 miles long and 400 broad; and over this vast space is scattered a population of about 800,000 souls. A general meeting of the Churches scattered over this space is impracticable; but in the eastern provinces, the Churches are near enough to hold such meetings about once in the twelvemonth, and it is, therefore, in that part the activity of the Union must be put forth. It was formed in October, 1859, but the basis has since been modified, and it is hoped that its efficiency will be increased by the changes.

I do not know whether you will find this communication of sufficient interest to warrant publication, but I leave it to your judgment to make any extracts from it which may seem sufficiently interesting.

Believe me to be, yours very sincerely,

T. DURANT PHILIP.

EVANGELICAL LABOURS AMONG THE GABOON CANNIBALS.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.
Baraka, Gaboon, Equatorial West Africa,
April 23, 1861.

Dear Sirs,—In the January number of Evangelical Christendom I gave your readers some of the general characteristics of this country and its inhabitants; and intended ere this to have added some account of our Christianising efforts, and the success with which they have been attended. The American Board commenced missionary operations here nineteen years ago, at which time there was, I believe, no point of Gospel light, from the Gold Coast to South Africa, a distance of three thousand miles; and to the eastward all was unexplored Ethiopia.

We found the banks of the river and the adjacent country occupied by three different tribes, and soon after we became acquainted with a fourth, a cannibal tribe residing upon the sources of the Gaboon and upon the highlands beyond. To the spiritual welfare of these four tribes our labours have been principally directed, with the hope of gradually extending our operations into the interior, and ultimately of establishing a line of stations across the continent, from which might radiate light and saving influences, to bless the benighted millions who are there dwelling in the region of the shadow of death.

In our work many difficulties have been encountered, and our most sanguine hopes have not been fully realised; still, much preparatory work has been accomplished; and much seed of Gospel truth has been sown, the firstfruits of which have appeared, as sure earnest of an abundant harvest that is to be gathered. Two of the most important languages have been acquired, reduced to grammatical rules, and into them school-books and considerable portions of the Bible have been translated; and the third language, spoken by the numerous cannibal people, has been studied, and partially reduced to writing. Some four or five hundred native children have received more or less instruction in our schools, many of whom can read the Scriptures both in their own and the English language. The mass of the people have listened to the story of the Cross, and heard the invitations of the Gospel; and a few, from time to time, have given evidence of being born again, though the number of the truly regenerated has never been large. God has smiled upon our efforts to establish His kingdom in this dark part of the dominions of the Prince of Darkness, and we believe it is destined to extend, until all Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands unto God, and acknowledge Messiah as their King.

The Gaboon is now a French colony, and a Catholic mission has been in existence here for a number of years; but free toleration is enjoyed, and no obstacles are interposed to the progress of the Gospel, excepting such as naturally flow from the increase of foreign commerce and its attendants—intoxicating drinks. These have, perhaps, a more destroying influence upon the African than upon any other people; and here, under the scourge of intemperance, they are wasting away. I know of no people better prepared to receive the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, or more in need of His gracious influences, than these among whom we have so long lived, and for whose salvation we have toiled and prayed. Will not Christians everywhere remember especially Ethiopia in their petitions at a throne of grace?

Fraternally yours in Christ,

A. BUSHNELL.

PROCEEDINGS OF CONVOCATION UPON "ESSAYS AND REVIEWS."

Convocation sat four days during the past month. The principal object for which it met was to receive the report of a sub-committee of the Lower House, appointed to examine the "Essays and Reviews," and to report thereon, with a view, if necessary, to further proceedings. The importance of this document induces us to give it (the schedules excepted) entire:—

"The committee of the Lower House of Convocation of the province of Canterbury, appointed by direction of his Grace the President and their lordships of the Upper House, to examine a book entitled 'Essays and Reviews,' and to report thereon to the Lower House, 'in order that the Lower House may communicate to the Upper House whether there are sufficient grounds for proceeding to a synodical judgment upon the book,' report as follows:—

"The book committed to our examination consists of seven essays and reviews, six of which were written by clergymen of the United Church of England and Ireland.

"We have carefully examined the book, and we consider the following to be its leading principles:—

"1. That the present advanced knowledge possessed by the world in its 'manhood' is the standard whereby the educated intellect of the individual man, guided and governed by conscience, is to measure and determine the truth of the Bible.

"2. That where the Bible is assumed to be at variance with the conclusions of such educated intellect, the Bible must be taken in such cases to have no Divine authority, but to be only 'a human utterance.'

"3. That the principles of interpretation of the Bible hitherto universally received in the Christian Church are untenable, and that new principles of interpretation must now be substituted, if the credit and authority of the Holy Scriptures are to be maintained.

"We find that—

"1. In many parts of the volume statements and doctrines of the Holy Scriptures are denied, called into question, or disparaged; for example:—

"(a). The reality of miracles; including the idea of creation as presented to us in the Bible.

"(b). Predictive prophecy; especially predictions concerning the incarnation, person, and offices of Our Lord.

"(c). The descent of all mankind from Adam.

"(d). The fall of man, and original sin.

"(e). The Divine command to sacrifice Isaac.

"(f). The incarnation of Our Lord.

"(g). Salvation through the blood of Christ.

"(h). The personality of the Holy Spirit.

"(i). Special or supernatural inspiration.

"(k). Historical facts of the Old Testament, including some referred to by Our Blessed Lord Himself.

"2. It is urged that many passages of the Holy Scriptures may be understood and explained upon the principle called 'Ideology,' by which is mean that the reader is at liberty to accept the idea of characters and facts described in the Holy Scriptures, instead of believing in the reality of those characters and facts.

"3. It is maintained that the creeds of the Church, whether regarded as confessions of faith or as instruments for the interpretation of Scripture, may now be put aside as no longer suitable to the present advanced intellectual condition of the world.

"4. Liberty is claimed for the clergy and candidates for holy orders to subscribe articles of religion and to use formularies in public worship without believing them according to their plain and natural meaning.

"5. Attempts are made to separate Christian holiness of life from Christian doctrine.

"We notice in many parts of the volume the absence of that spirit of humility and reverence with which human reason ought ever to approach the study of Divine truth; we notice, also, a confusion of the dictates of the natural conscience with Divine grace, and in some places a substitution of those dictates for Divine grace.

"It appears to us that while the professed intention of the volume is the 'free handling in a becoming spirit' of religious subjects, the general tendency and effect of the volume is unduly to exalt the authority of human reason, to lower the authority of revelation in regard to things Divine and spiritual, to unsettle faith, and to consign the reader to a hopeless scepticism.

"We have appended two schedules, A and B, Schedule A, containing the advertisement, 'To the reader,' as prefixed to all the editions of the book, and referred to in the preceding paragraph of our report; Schedule B, containing passages denying, calling in question, or disparaging, statements and doctrines of the Holy Scriptures, with citations from and references to those parts of the Holy Scriptures, and of the formularies and articles of the United Church of England and Ireland, to which such passages are contrariant.

"Signed on behalf of the Committee,

"GEORGE ANTHONY DENISON,

"Archdeacon of Taunton, Chairman."

[The schedules giving extracts from the seven Essays, occupy many closely-printed pages, the Scripture references and extracts from the formularies of the Church being in parallel columns.]

Such is the solemn indictment which a committee of divines, selected from the élite of the clergy of the Church of England, have, within the last few days, drawn up and presented to their brethren! The presentation of the report was followed by a motion by Archdeacon Denison, seconded by Dr. McCaul, "That, in the opinion of this House, there are sufficient grounds for proceeding to a synodical judgment upon the book entitled 'Essays and Reviews.'" To this motion no fewer than five amendments were proposed. They were all lost, however, and the original motion was carried by a majority of thirty-one to eight. Thus was answered the inquiry, transmitted by the Upper to the Lower House, and which formed the basis of the proceedings of the latter, whether there exist grounds for a synodical judgment upon the volume. This deliverance—that such grounds do exist—is now before the Archbishop and Bishops. To them belongs the next step of the procedure, which will show how repugnant is the teaching of the "Essays" to the sentiments of the clergy and members of the English Church, as it already obviously is to the meaning of her articles and formularies. It will, we doubt not, be neither tardy nor hesitating.

NOTICE.

The Official Report of the proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance will, in future, be inserted in this journal quarterly, instead of monthly.

We are requested also to state that the Monthly Intelligencer of the Alliance will, for the future, be published quarterly, as the Evangelical Alliance Intelligencer. The first number of the quarterly series will appear in October next.

Travels in the Holy Land. (Voyage en Terre Sainte.) By FELIX BOVET. Paris: Grossart, 1861.

TRAVELS in Palestine have been so multiplied that one opens a new work upon such a subject with a sort of hesitation. However, the very first pages of the book before us are enough to dispel all fear of repetitions and commonplaces, and as the reader advances he finds himself in the society of a highly cultivated and pious mind, rich in classical and biblical lore, and peculiarly happy in many new and striking illustrations of Scripture from all sources, local associations, the flora and fauna of the Holy Land, eastern manners, and the costumes of the population—thus opening fresh veins in a mine we had thought nearly exhausted. M. Bovet is distinguished by great cordiality, originality, and simplicity of character. Without being over credulous with respect to most of the monastic traditions about the various holy places and things, real and supposed, shown to pilgrims, he is a believer in the authenticity of Calvary and the holy sepulchre; and though we cannot say that he has convinced us, he certainly has made out a far better case for the ecclesiastical tradition than we had conceived possible, and one which will make a re-considering and re-statement of the whole argument necessary.

The Influence of the Septuagint Version of the Old Testament upon the Progress of Christianity. By the Rev. RALPH CHURTON, B.A., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. Macmillan. 1861.

In our number of November, 1859, we gave a brief review of a new edition of the Septuagint, arranged according to the order of the Hebrew text, by which that ancient Greek version was restored to its natural correspondence with the original. We have now the pleasure of introducing our readers to a work, which not only exhibits its influence on the progress of Christianity, but which demonstrates its essential influence in the doctrinal language of the New Testament. All such terms as faith, repentance, conversion, justification, sanctification, salvation, &c., are the very same in the New Testament as they are in the Greek version. The titles of Christ as Lord, Redeemer, Mediator, Judge, and the sacrificial terms of atonement, sin-offering, &c., are all identical. The language of the New Testament is not a strange Babylonish dialect, but the very same as that which had been used by the Jews of the Dispersion for nearly 300 years before the Christian era. When Peter addressed these many-tongued foreigners on the Day of Pentecost, they instantly recognised his quotations from Joel and the Psalms, for they had often heard them read in their native synagogues. It is thus that a verbal harmony is secured between the Old and New Testament, which is essential to a written Revelation. It is thus that the faith of Patriarchs and the predictions of Prophets are blended with the words and doctrines of Evangelists and Apostles. Had there been no such Greek versions known and received amongst the Jews long before the era of Christianity, these appeals to the old covenants would have been very dubious and obscure. How could Jesus have authenticated His claims as the promised Messiah, unless He had cited these predictions in the same language in which they were preached and proclaimed at His advent? "It is well known," says Mr. Churton, "that the want of words in the language of a nation in a state of heathenism, to express the doctrines of Revelation, is one of the greatest difficulties which the missionary has to overcome; he has, in many cases, to introduce a new soil before the seed can be sown with any hope of success. In the case of the Apostles, the miraculous powers conferred on them were, no doubt, sufficient to enable them to overcome the difficulties without the aid of other men's labours. But it pleased the Almighty that the soil should be already prepared for receiving the seed of the Gospel, and the language in great measure provided for those who were to instruct the most intellectual nation of the world in the truths of Revelation. Besides forwarding the advance of the truth, the use of these forms of language by the inspired teachers of the religion was a confirmation of the doctrine that the Old Testament was not contrary to the New, because the teaching of the first preachers of the Gospel was founded upon the language of the Law and the Prophets. In their forms of confession of faith, they introduced words which had their origin in the translation of the Septuagint, and even when the ideas were only dimly declared in the Old Testament, the forms of words employed in enunciating them were taken from the same source. Moreover, by adopting terms which had been known to the writers of the Alexandrian school, and other philosophers before, the inspired writers corrected the errors and false notions into which man's unaided reason had fallen. Whilst in other ways they made it appear, that those who strove to make use of the faculties and opportunities which they had received, in order to arrive at a knowledge of the truth, were often providentially brought near to a discernment of Divine things." (Pp. 91, 92.) We can recommend this essay as the most effective antidote which has yet appeared to Mr. Jowett's sceptical treatment of the New Testament, and we rejoice to know that an Etonian Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, may now be contrasted with the Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford.

THE GOSPEL IN SPAIN.

"A LITTLE leaven leaveneth the whole lump." Slowly, but surely, the infusion of a right principle works its way, even through the inmost depths of the most corrupt and infidel society. Deeper than any inquisitor of the faith can search, the salutary influences penetrate, until even Spain begins to give signs of becoming a Protestant country. The writer of this article cannot help asking the forbearance of the reader while he glances back to the day, more than five and thirty years ago, when, if he mistakes not, he witnessed the dropping of this leaven amidst a little congregation stealthily assembled in a small, mean room, in an obscure nook on the hill-side at Gibraltar. The language employed on those occasions was Anglo-Spanish of the humblest. The congregation consisted of beggars, decayed refugees, and smugglers. Their teacher was a worthy missionary, whose voice was soon afterwards hushed in death when an epidemic swept the rock. But other voices were quickly heard to inculcate the same truths, and before many years had passed away it became customary for the most intelligent Spaniards, when visiting Gibraltar, to go to hear the missionary preach, visit his crowded schools, chat with him in his library, get the gift of a Bible, with a selection of tracts, and a few good hints about Gospel truth, and carry back the whole with them, to be food for conversation among their friends, or even to be caught up as a stirring novelty and reproduced from the Bible or the tract in the pulpit of a whitewashed country church, or of a grand cathedral. He recollects how Graydon and Borrow, each ardent in pursuit of the same object, but in his own peculiar fashion, used to scatter Bibles—morning, noon, and night—in the chief seaport and inland cities, the latter of those two men setting up as printer and seller of Bibles in Madrid itself. He recalls the memory of groups—nay, congregations—to whom it was his own happiness to deliver the glad tidings of salvation, sometimes at the hotel, sometimes in the solemn gloom of a cloister, oftentimes in a pulpit of his own. To speak in brief, he can mark the rapid crumbling away of prejudices, while, within the space of a very few years, the Bible became a coveted book, because in many points it had grown familiar, and because the name of Protestant began to be regarded as honourable, just as much as for ages it had been despised. He remembers how the press in Gibraltar, set free from governmental restrictions, used to pour into Spain a constant strain of religious information, while the tract societies of England and America found means to do the same at every seaport on the Atlantic and Mediterranean coasts.

When Lord John Russell told us—and he has since repeated the same statement in the House of Commons—that the Spanish people do not desire religious liberty, he betrayed an ignorance, perhaps excusable, of the proceedings of the Spanish Legislature, from the death of Ferdinand VII. until now. Intent as his lordship has been on affairs which demanded more urgently the immediate consideration of a Foreign Secretary of State, he forgot the great revolution which marked the regency of Christina, when the monasteries were all suppressed, and the monks turned out, and license given to the nuns to cast off their habits and quit the cells, and correspondence with Rome declared to be treason, and ordinations to the priesthood forbidden for several years. He forgot the sweeping confiscation of ecclesiastical property, which made that period in the history of Spain nothing less remarkable—so far as the temporalities of a once dominant priesthood were concerned—than is the history of our own country in the reign of Henry VIII. He had not noted, as we have, the unanimity with which the Spanish press, during the time of its own liberty, declared for liberty of worship, wisely rejecting the doubtful boon of "liberty of conscience," because conscience cannot but be free; and to offer conscience liberty conveyed no assurance of that freedom of action which the Spaniard had learned well to consider as his inalienable right, without which "liberty of conscience" would be but a mockery. His lordship had been too busily occupied in other matters to count, in Cortes after Cortes, the large minorities which voted for articles in successive Constitutions, which, if adopted, would have opened wide the door of liberty to Protestants. The cries of indignation against the modern Inquisition, which, but six years ago, resounded in "the Palace of the Laws" at Madrid, did not seem to reach the Court and Parliament of England, but were heard distinctly enough by ourselves; and we also knew how it came to pass that those genuine expressions of the abhorrence of persecution, felt by every true Spaniard, had not resulted in some correspondent act of legislation. We understood how the Queen and Court, the corrupt officers of State, and a miserable army, were combined with the Court of Rome, and with Bourbons and Jesuits, to put down every effort after truth, and to quench every aspiration after liberty, both among the people and among the priests themselves. Our Foreign Minister did not know, nor would he suffer himself to be persuaded of the fact, that the best men in Spain, whenever they could dare to speak, were loud in their admiration of the religion of England, chiefly because it guards the liberties of England—liberties which first it gave. Nay, his lordship had not even had the advantage, as some of us have had, of witnessing persecution in Spain. But we have observed that persecution there—except when it is carried on by an ecclesiastic in the genuine spirit of his party, which makes every true persecutor earnest, whether he be going down from Jerusalem to Damascus, or presiding in Santa Maria at Rome, or expatiating at large within the bounds of some remote parish—official persecution in Spain is always cool. It cannot burn. We have often grasped the very hand that had signed an officio against ourselves, and then carefully warded off its execution. Not many years ago, when a very earnest bigot had imprisoned the agent of the American Bible Society in Madrid—and no one durst openly interpose for his deliverance, except one or two personages who were out of favour at the Palace—members of Government and municipal authorities were the men who gladly connived at his escape, and probably felt proud in the knowledge that their connivance would be regarded favourably by the Government of "Her Britannic Majesty." So powerfully has the leaven of right principle been working in the minds of Spanish people, priests, and statesmen.

"But if they cannot set free their own country, how can they deliver Protestants out of bondage?" Why they are so powerless in their endeavours to emancipate themselves, it is not the purpose of this brief article to explain, beyond repeating the often-repeated observation, that no Popish country, however it may long for freedom, can possibly be free.

It is rather our purpose to draw attention to the fact that the leaven of truth has done very much more than raise the standard of public opinion in Spain. It has resulted in the spread of personal religion. In the province of Andalusia, more especially, where, for a few years, Protestant worship was conducted openly, and where, ever since, meetings for prayer and Bible-reading have been held in secret, the power of God has attended His blessed Word, and the influence of the Holy Spirit has descended with so great energy, in answer to the prayers offered up in secret, that it is impossible any longer to hide the sacred flame under a bushel. This bushel of official persecution, cracked amidst successive revolutions, often tossed aside, and only needed for occasional service, when the state of political parties will allow, does not any longer exclude the air of social communication, and the unquenchable flame of Divine truth burns within it, barely shaded over, and scarce concealed. Soon it will matter little whether the useless instrument of repression continues where it is, to be consumed by the fire it is meant to smother, while the flame spreads everywhere, or whether it is visibly broken up by some bolder and more effectual revolution. Meanwhile it is instructive to observe how timidly inquisitorial vengeance lingers. The Spanish Protestant prisoners—half prisoners, half at large—are not yet sentenced to undergo the extreme penalty, the ultimo suplicio which we have often and again heard threatened against English heretics in Spain. No. It is true that the British Consul in Cadiz displayed neither energy nor English sympathy in his correspondence on the subject, and that the British Government modestly doubts its right to interfere, even in the way of amicable remonstrance. The laws of Spain, too, are just now far worse than they have been at any time since the Carlist war, when they were merely the old laws kept in check by a liberal constitution, and impracticable to all intents and purposes. Those old laws are now revived so far as possible, unchecked by anything in the articles of the present Constitution; and it would require no ingenuity whatever for a Spanish lawyer to demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the clergy, that the Laws of the Partidas are again in full force, for confiscation, death, and infamy. Yet there is something that hinders. Our brethren are persecuted, yet not destroyed; they are cast down, but not forsaken. Is it the force of public opinion in England? is it the pressure of a new sentiment of piety in Spain? is it a secret remonstrance arising in the bosom of the judges? or is it the sovereign hand of God, who—now that the day of a great deliverance is near—holds back the arm of priestly vengeance, and bids the sacerdotal gaolers and the resplendent prisoners stand meekly face to face, waiting—neither party knows wherefore—but waiting that the praying Church may persevere in supplication until the gaolers themselves shall tremble, and the wondering culprits, having passed out at the iron gates, find themselves abroad in the streets, there to proclaim openly the truths which had been too long—far too long—whispered by themselves in secrecy? It certainly does look as if it would be so. Escalante has escaped, and even when his case was at the worst, Spain could not find a dungeon in which to bury him. How unlike the time when Isaac Martin (1714) was writhing in the torture-chamber at Granada, though he was an Englishman, and when the Quaker, Rissole (1826), was hanged in Valencia! Yet the very laws under which this last of Spanish martyrs suffered are still extant and are still quoted. The work of persecution was never more sincerely done by the heads of Church and State than at this day; but, notwithstanding all their wishes to the contrary, judgment lingers timorously. The penal code of Spain, as it is now framed, prohibits every public manifestation of any religion different from that of the State, and it seems that now the public prosecutor demands against our imprisoned brethren sentences of imprisonment with hard labour for periods varying from six years to ten. But, after all, the sentence is not formally pronounced, and the Protestant Alliance encourages us to think that “it is not improbable that the prisoners in Spain will soon be set at liberty.”

If they are set at liberty, what is to follow? We may not imagine that, with this year 1861, the story of Christianity in Spain is ended, for its position in the country demonstrates that it has but fairly begun. So long as Protestantism was heard of as a pardonable aberration from Catholic orthodoxy, it would be regarded with curiosity. When public writers and statesmen marked it as the source of our national prosperity, it became the subject of inquiry and admiration, and these phases of public sentiment were but preparatory to a more intimate acquaintance. But now that men are suffering for Christ's sake, and a nearly powerless Inquisition, no longer daring to exist under its original name, is only able to vex, and utterly unable to burn, its victims, a far different train of thought must occupy the Spanish mind. The victims live, but they live to pray. Their vexations, their temporal ruin, their sickening suspense, compel them to take refuge from the cruelty of men at the mercy-seat of God. From them, and from their friends, an incessant cry of prayer ascends to heaven day and night, and the case of Spain is brought up in the arms of faith before the Father of Mercy, as it never has been since the time when the spirit of prayer was poured out so signally, as of late it has been, upon the universal Church.

Thus we mark the working of the heaven. Never was there in Spain so much of it, and not in Old Spain only. Some few of the earlier converts have resided for years in Spanish America. The agent of the American Bible Society, who suffered imprisonment in Madrid in 1856, is working diligently for Spain at his desk in New York. An earlier convert has laboured in Chili and Peru. Another presides over an extensive educational establishment in one of the comparatively free Republics. Others less conspicuously live in freedom in South America, who would have shared the fate of Matamoros and his friends if they had remained in Spain, but now can use the liberty which Providence has given them. Spanish congregations multiply in the Western hemisphere; and if, just now, converted Spaniards are driven from their country, there are wide fields before them where they may, without hindrance, sow the imperishable seed, and watch its growth. One such exile, at least, has come to London within the last month, and although we are not yet in possession of sufficient information to do more than mention this fact, we cherish the hope that in this case also the sovereign goodness of God will be made manifest, and that, however numerous may be the wanderers from the land of Torquemada and the Ferdinands, every one of them will help to consecrate the language of his fathers to the propagation of the Gospel, either in the Old World or in the New. Then the hymns which were so often sung in Andalusia, while Protestant congregations were permitted to assemble there, and which are now repeated in the lands of their exile, shall sound high from the lips of thousands upon thousands, wherever the Spanish language is spoken. At any rate, Matamoros is not to be burnt; probably he will not be even chained with convicts; most probably he will be set at liberty; and we must hope that, either in Spain or elsewhere, he will openly preach Christ, openly unite with Christian worshippers, and never submit, after bearing so signal a confession, to propagate in secret places that precious Gospel which has been spoken to his heart, and glorified in his sufferings, and which He who gave it commands to be published upon the housetops. Be it noted that Spain is not yet settled. Even the Bourbon Queen of Spain has just now acknowledged, in a diplomatic letter to Louis Napoleon, that the change of times requires a change of policy in matters relating to religion; and a desire to retain her throne, not to speak of other equally probable causes, may lead to the establishment of religious liberty in Spain sooner than civilised Europe might expect.

SANSKRIT AND MISSIONARY WORK IN INDIA.*

THERE is a conservative tendency in the administration of all institutions—political, social, religious, and benevolent—which is frequently too impatient of criticism, and of new adaptation to circumstances, or to the lessons of experience. Praiseworthy, and even necessary, within certain limits, this spirit of conservatism needs counteraction from time to time, lest it become conservative of weakness and error as well as of better things. And, moreover, it is true wisdom in the conductors of institutions, especially of religious institutions, to cease from the puerility of regarding as enemies, those who moot opinions somewhat at variance with the tenor of their own, or who offer suggestions of which they do not see the force. We have, for instance, on one or two occasions, expressed our conviction that not alone piety, humility, and zeal, but certain intellectual qualifications also, and some acquirements of a linguistic kind, and acquaintance with the philosophies of the races of India, would be highly desirable for a considerable number, if not for all, missionaries sent to so peculiar a field as Hindostan. We have reason to know, that very many experienced missionaries, both English and American, concur with us in this opinion. We are supported also by the judgment of others, who, though not missionaries, have yet had abundant means of forming a just conclusion upon such a question. We may be mistaken. We are well aware that some able and pious men adopt a somewhat different estimate, and adhere to what may be termed the older and more English view. Let such men, by all means, say all that can be said upon the paramount importance of piety, humility, devotedness, and so forth, which are topics sure to be popular with the existing religious public, and which we should be the last to disparage. But let us not be accounted "enemies," as we have sometimes petulantly been, because we press occasionally the other side of this question. As the foolishness of preaching, mentioned by St. Paul, does not mean foolish preaching, so the humility, piety, and zeal of a missionary, may very well co-exist with well-trained intellectual powers, and extensive literary attainments. Nor need a perfect knowledge of Arabic, Hebrew, and Sanskrit necessitate—as sometimes appears to be imagined—either intellectual pride, or German Rationalism, in their possessor. The grace of God is as needful to the weak and illiterate, as it is to the learned and strongminded; and it is, moreover, as adequate to the emergency of the latter, as it is to that of the former class of labourers in the great vineyard of the Lord.

We have been much interested in the perusal of the recent inaugural lecture of the new Boden Professor of Sanskrit, Monier Williams, in relation to this important subject; and it is a matter of gratification to us, of course, to perceive that our views are, in the main, amply borne out by the judgment of a man whose proclaimed Evangelical orthodoxy formed his stronghold in the recent contest with so distinguished an antagonist as Max Müller. But far more gratifying to us than any vindication of our own opinions, is the consideration that these views of Professor Monier Williams are likely to effect what no mere literary criticisms could expect to do. We trust that suggestions coming from such a character, now in a post of such influence, may lead those concerned to what we consider a more just estimate of the importance of this subject. For, independently of the more general question of missionary fitness, India has specialities of her own, as well as a special interest for us, which urgently presses on us the conviction, that efforts of a far more extensive and powerful kind are required, if we would rise to a just sense of the responsibilities now entailed upon England, and of the gigantic character of the work to be attempted.

Professor Monier Williams first fixes our attention upon the fact that, in India, the missionary has to deal with "no common country or people—no ordinary religion. He is not there brought in contact with savage tribes, who melt away before the superior force and intelligence of Europeans. He is placed in the midst of a great and ancient people, who, many of them, tracing back their origin to the same stock as ourselves, attained a high degree of civilisation when our forefathers were barbarians, and had a polished language and literature when English was unknown." The population of India, variously reckoned at 150 and 200 millions, he says, may be estimated at 180 millions, without fear of serious exaggeration. He then next notes that these people differ as much as the various continental races of Europe do, and speak languages equally distinct. A sketch of these various races and their tongues, leads to the "standpoint" before us. Even the Moslem conquerors of India, we are told, received more of an impression from the Hindus than they imparted to them. And notwithstanding the accession and intermixture of European ingredients, the Sanskrit-speaking element has not lost its ascendancy. Though the political supremacy of the English is at this moment greater everywhere than that which once belonged to the Mussulmans, the moral influence of the Sanskrit race is still paramount. "Were they a nation at unity among themselves, no foreign power could withstand their united will. But they are not one people. The Hindus differ as much as English, French, and Italians." The causes of these distinctions are various, and some of them contribute mainly to the existing disunion referred to. Chief amongst these causes is the connexion between religion and caste; which makes the true caste of India a very different thing from that social distinction which is loosely termed caste here. While we hold that our religion permits of differences of social rank, we know that in God's sight all men are equal, and that in religious worship our differences are before Him to be laid aside. But reversing this, "The Hindu believes that the Deity regards men as unequal; that He created distinct kinds of men, as He created varieties of birds or beasts; that Brahmins and Sudras are as naturally distinct as eagles and crows, or as lions and dogs; and that to force any Hindu to break the rules of caste, is to force him to sin against God and against nature." The enormous consequences of these fundamental axioms are truly tremendous, and are tolerably well known. But it is not so generally known that for the awful severity of the rules of caste it cannot be proved that there is any religious sanction in the Veda or so-called canon of Hindu revelation. Even in Menu, which is not (śruti) revelation, but only (smṛiti) tradition, there is not to be found the extreme strictness of caste rules which later law books contain. At the date of the early hymns of the Rīgveda (1,200 or 1,300 years B.C.) it is presumed there was no hereditary order of priests. But in course of time Sacerdotalism grew to its monstrous Indian degree of development, which far surpasses the utmost attainments of Popery. Not only was the distinction between the sacred and the laic classes established, but in order to preserve the Brahmanical ascendancy from the foreseen peril of combined opposition, the laity was again subdivided into distinct classes marked off by impassable lines. Professor Williams explains these divisions, and shows that the aim of the Brahmins involved a general conspiracy on their part "to monopolise temporal and spiritual power without personal risk or labour." He then refers to the rise and progress of long and severe struggles between the sacerdotal and military classes, the most important of which was that excited by Buddha against the Brahmins, resulting in the overthrow of their political supremacy. And though afterwards they partially recovered their lost ascendancy, the Brahmins themselves lost much of their sacerdotal character, and became, in the end, subdivided also, thus increasing the general disunion.

Another source of disunion is the vagueness and uncertainty of Hindu religious belief—of which the Professor gives an interesting account. Depending fundamentally upon oral tradition, rather than on writing, even though subsequently written in part, this quality of uncertainty is necessarily inherent in the system, as in every other of a traditional character. The Brahmins are "the mouth of God;" revelation is an "eternal sound," only to be received and transmitted orally by Brahmins; "a Brahmin, therefore, may enunciate almost any doctrine, and declare it to be a part of the revelation of which he is the depository." No wonder, accordingly, that from such a standpoint Hinduism should become many-sided. "It has its spiritual and its material aspect, its esoteric and exoteric, its subjective and objective, its pure and its impure. It is at once rigidly monotheistic, grossly polytheistic, and coldly atheistic. It has a side for the practical, another for the devotional, and another for the speculative. Those who rest in ceremonial observances find it all-satisfying; those who deny the efficacy of works, and make faith their all in all, need not wander from its pale; those who delight in philosophising on religious subjects may here indulge their tastes. . . . The higher classes are supposed capable of a higher form of religion than the lower; the educated than the uneducated; men than women. . . . In point of fact, the Hindu religion, as it presents itself in operation, is best expressed by the word caste; and the actual worship of the Hindus at the present day is as multiform, variable, and elastic as caste itself."

The sketch which Professor Williams gives of this almost infinite ramification of caste belief—brief as it is, and necessarily condensed—is yet sufficient to indicate that, in order to deal successfully with minds divided and subdivided in opinion upon every branch of the most important of subjects, a considerable acquaintance with their actual prepossessions is of prime importance; and this acquaintance can only be satisfactorily attained through a knowledge of the Sanskrit tongue, and of the sacred books written in that tongue. It is "the sacred and learned language of India; the repository of the Veda in its widest sense; the vehicle of Hindu theology, philosophy, and mythology; the source of all the spoken dialects; the only safe guide to the intricacies and contradictions of Hinduism; the one bond of sympathy, which, like an electric chain, connects Hindus of opposite characters in every district of India. There can be little doubt that a more correct knowledge of the religious opinions and practices of the Sanskritic Hindus—or, as we may call them, the Hindus proper—is essential to extensive progress in our Indian missions. This knowledge is best gained, at first hand, from Sanskrit books. The Christian missionary who attempts to have discussions with educated natives without an acquaintance with the Sanskrit language, may be strong in intellect and faith, but resembles a man shod in iron walking on ice."

It is satisfactory to find these views, which are precisely similar to what we have advocated formerly in this journal, put forward by a man whose religious sentiments will not be so readily questioned as might be those of certain other learned men, and whose own learning and practical acquaintance with the matter in hand cannot be denied. It is not, however, meant that the missionary will have to encounter many native Sanskrit scholars. Real Pandits are rare, except in the great seats of learning; and the ignorance of the masses is notorious. This, indeed, we have heard triumphantly alleged as a reason why the ordinary missionary need not at all trouble himself with Sanskrit; but these premises are admitted, and yet the conclusion is denied by the Professor. Because, as he says truly, "the national character is cast in a Sanskrit mould; and the Sanskrit language and literature is not only the key to a vast and apparently confused and unmeaning religious system, but is also the one medium of approach to the hearts of the Hindus, however unlearned, or however disinclined by the various circumstances of country, caste, and creed. It is, in truth, even more to India than classical and patristic literature was to Europe at the time of the Reformation. It gives a deeper impress to the Hindu mind than the latter ever did to the European; so that a missionary at home in Sanskrit will be at home in every corner of our vast Indian territories."

These emphatic statements, and the arguments and illustrations by which they are supported, will surely attract the attention of our great societies, and lead to a sounder appreciation of intellectual acquirements, in addition to spiritual gifts, than has heretofore prevailed in some quarters. It seems that a very small minority only of the Christian converts in India belongs to the Hindu race properly so called. In Tinnevely, where the greatest success has been attained, the converts are not Hindus, either by race or religion. Out of 91,000 converts obtained in the South, not more than 3,000 belong to the true Sanskritic or Hindu race proper. Yet these last are stated to be the true masses of the population. So that "low castes" of India do not at all correspond with what we call the "poorer classes," or "the masses," at home. High caste reigns amongst the masses there; and these masses are of the true Sanskritic race.

Into the very interesting and detailed discussion, by the Professor, about the use of the Sanskrit, as the root and source of the spoken languages, and as a key to the literature and the opinions and usages of the Hindus, we need not enter here. An unpromising subject is clothed by him with much attractiveness, and he very clearly establishes his case. There is no vernacular Hindu literature worthy of mention. Sanskrit is the language of poetry, the drama, religion and philosophy, and the original laws. Hence, if a missionary desire to understand the system he seeks to overthrow, to gain an insight into the native mind, or a real hold on the native heart, and conciliate respect or regard for himself and his office, he ought to know Sanskrit. Previously to this he ought to know, of course, Hebrew, Greek, and something of Arabic, as well as be a skilled divine, and versed in biblical knowledge. He ought also to be perfect master of at least one vernacular, and well-trained in logical disputation, to cope with acute and argumentative Pandits. Such are some of the ideas of Professor Monier Williams, as to the proper "equipment" of an Indian missionary. As revolutions are not made with rose-water, so some 200,000,000 of people, hedged around with difficulties, like our Indian population, are not to be Evangelised by slipshod. Great things have been, indeed, already done in some directions; and it is satisfactory to learn from several quotations in the notes, that sagacious and able men are beginning to see why more has not been accomplished, and how more may be accomplished, in other important spheres. Pious scholarship is what ought for the future to be aimed at more than it was aforesaid. And when learned men of piety are laid hold of, their gifts ought to be more highly appreciated and more wisely utilised, also, than they have sometimes been. We are aware of one instance of a learned and pious Pandit, whose usefulness is great, and who is now labouring after his own mind and heart. But, if we are rightly informed, his great gifts were for some time neutralised and lost, because they not being appreciated, he was directed to other spheres, which inferior men might have occupied. In fact, he was a right man in a wrong place.

As to the difficulty supposed to be connected with the acquisition of Sanskrit, and as to the various modes of lessening that difficulty proposed by Professor Williams, we refer our readers to the address itself. He inclines, in some sort, to favour the Romanising method—at least partially; on which topic we are compelled to differ from him; and we know that many learned men and missionaries differ too. Not, however, that he goes the whole length of some Romanisers; and he certainly proposes some good mechanical improvements in Sanskrit typography, which we think valuable. But these are minor details. The main tenor of his thesis is most interesting and satisfactory, and calculated to stir up to fresh effort in a most important sphere. Without such knowledge as has been indicated, he well says, "the truths of Christianity may be powerfully preached, translations of the Bible lavishly distributed, but no permanent influence will be gained, no mutual confidence enjoyed, no real sympathy felt or inspired. Imbued with such knowledge, all Englishmen resident in India, whether clergymen or laymen, might aid the missionary cause more than by controversial discussions, or cold donations of rupees." We say, AMEN.

WORK AMONG THE FALLEN.*

THERE are sins which modern delicacy almost refuses to mention, and sinners whom refined society will not recognise. Yet those sins are among the most loudly condemned in the Word of God, and those sinners are in the most forlorn condition both for time and eternity. Licentiousness, nevertheless, prevails to a terrific extent, and is followed as a profession in all the chief towns. Houses are open day and night, whose proprietors, men or women, have under their control unhappy young females, the victims of sensuality and the slaves of sin. The existence of so many thousands of wretched creatures, supported by the wages of iniquity, reveals a fearful amount of immorality, because every one of these represents a certain number of the opposite sex. It is impossible, indeed, to calculate the extent to which society is infected by this vice; but its prevalence is such that, by common consent, prostitution is designated the Social Evil. This profligacy is universally attended by a throng of concomitant sins and miseries, including drunkenness, idleness, and dishonesty, suffering, discord, and every hateful practice and passion. Could we see the woes which follow in its train, in all their giant proportions and countless numbers, we should stand appalled. Even in a worldly point of view, it is an unmitigated curse. Its personal effects upon its victims are of the most dire and diversified kind, and by it myriads are sunk in lifelong degradation, hurried on to shameful crimes, or carried to an untimely grave. Its action on the moral nature of its slaves is fatal, because virtue is at once plucked up by the roots, and unholy passions are cultivated in its stead; and hence the tongue of the licentious is profane and deceitful, their heart goes after all the intoxicating pleasures of the world, and their soul is full of unholy and impure ideas. Hence, in a religious aspect, the state of such is awful to contemplate. God is banished from their thoughts; prayer, the Bible, the sanctuary, and the Sabbath are treated with contempt; and there is impenitence, unbelief, and hardness of heart. Strange that such a monster of iniquity should so flourish in a land where Christian privileges so abound, where so many are devoted to the service of God, and where so much is done for the salvation of the world! It is, perhaps, not strange that a vice so loathsome and so repugnant to pure feeling should be thought of in silence, or that there should be so powerful a feeling against the bare mention of it. But it is, after all, strange that, until of late, no systematic and well-directed endeavours have been made to rescue its prey, to bring back the fallen to the paths of virtue, and to lead them to Him who hath opened the kingdom of heaven, even to the penitent harlot and adulterer.

Happily, however, Christian purity and pity have now found a tongue, and, triumphing over the restraints of politeness and the rules of a false delicacy, they have courageously advocated the cause of the abandoned. The abandoned! Yes, it is only recently that these unfortunates could be called by any other name. Society had abandoned them, they had abandoned themselves, the Church had abandoned them, and it seemed almost as if God had abandoned them. Here and there was one sought and reclaimed; but, as a class, they were the abandoned. Had some decree of eternal reprobation gone forth, or had it been revealed that their's was the sin against the Holy Ghost, they could scarcely have been more utterly forsaken. Where were the godly men who spoke to them on the streets for the good of their souls, or who did not do so with fear and shame? Who followed them to their dens of wickedness, in courts, alleys, and garrets, where dirt and dissipation divided the domain with vice? What godly woman felt that it was pre-eminently her mission to track the wandering footsteps of her lost sisters, and try to bring them home again to virtue and to Christ? Yet there were some who, at distant intervals, felt an inward monition to do something. The greyheaded sire and the venerable matron alone were believed to have any interest in the work, and they only, with safety to their reputation, could speak to a woman that was a sinner! The younger men and women—above all, the unmarried—beheld these frail daughters of Eve with mingled awe and disgust; but were silent. Like the Priest and the Levite, in the parable, when they saw them they looked at them, and passed by on the other side. This was not to go on for ever. Statistics were obtained which revealed a state of things simply horrible, and brought to light so many dreadful facts, and suggested so many solemn reflections, that it began to be a matter of conversation. The question was often asked—what can be done? These women, in their dark holes, are not alone in sin and misery: if we could observe, we should find there our sons, our servants, and our brothers, or our neighbours. We should find there those who were lately in the Sunday-school, who may even now sometimes go to the house of God, who live next door, or sit at our tables. We should find that the moral and religious condition of these women is the mirror which reflects that of many who make a fair show in society, but who are led captive by the devil at his will. And so, prayer went up to God for the seducers and the seduced, earnest purposes were formed in many a bosom, and anxious deliberation was had recourse to in hope to find out some plan of action.

Mere worldly politicians either laughed at the idea of doing anything against this huge evil, or only required that its public movements should be regulated by law. They would have been content if the curse had been taken out of their sight, or its most disgusting features hidden. They did not consider that this would be no remedy—that it would rather aggravate the evil by legalising prostitution, and making it a national institution. To have imitated Continental nations in this matter would have been fraught with direful consequences. We do not want to be assimilated to those nations in this matter. If we are to have this iniquity, we will cast it out of the social circle, and, like professional gambling, it shall either walk our streets, or it shall lurk in the holes and corners of our towns. The stews will never again be recognised among our domestic establishments. The moment vice is made respectable, that moment it loses its remaining shreds of shame, it throws off the last remnants of disguise, and it is no longer regarded by the unreflecting as vice at all. It may at once take a position in society, may dwell in a prominent house and in a respectable street. On the whole, and in every respect, we believe the principle of the British law to be the true one, and the only one in harmony with the law of God. We advocate the suppression of brothels so far as it can be done, and we are quite sure that the Christian feeling of this empire would never submit to their being licensed, like theatres and other places of amusement.

It is not on the labours of politicians and policemen that we rely. Our hope is in moral means, and the author of the deeply interesting book which has suggested these observations, has touched the right chord, when he speaks of the "omnipotence of loving-kindness." We have more faith in this than in all the proclamations that ever were made against vice and immorality. To this, therefore, let us turn for a little, and see how it has been developed, how it has been applied, and what it has accomplished during seven months' work, by a lady, among the fallen in Glasgow. We may observe that the narrative of this work has not been written by the lady herself, but by some one to whom she regularly furnished the materials. We also beg to call attention to an introductory chapter of much importance, by another hand, although, on one or two points, we do not quite agree with the writer. It may be necessary, too, to notice that while the labours recorded in this book very much originated in personal feeling, and were unofficial, it is not intended for a moment to depreciate the work accomplished by refuges and asylums on the old plan. On this subject the writer of the introductory chapter expresses himself thus:—

The increase of this deadly sin, and of the numbers who were engaged in it, at last called forth public notice and comment; and the lady whose exertions are here recorded felt herself called to engage in the crusade which was proclaimed against it. She entered upon her work, however, without the aid of great men's names on her committee—indeed, without any committee at all—but merely with the very present help of Him who is mighty to save. Her strenuous endeavours and unwearied zeal, the difficulties she encountered, and the success to which she has attained, need not here be mentioned. These are set forth in the following pages. But the peculiarity of the system she adopted in treating those whom, by God's blessing, she had been the means of reclaiming, after they had been taken from their infamous life, and were placed under her care and supervision, deserves to be noticed. To that system, doubtless, much of her success is to be attributed. The girls are provided with comfortable and respectable lodgings, work is provided for them such as they can do, and they are made to feel that their return to society, as respectable members of it, from that period depends upon themselves. They are subjected to no curious examination as to the cause of their fall, their previous habits and history, and they are exempted from what those girls are, beyond all else, most anxious to avoid—the prying curiosity of visiting committees. In every difficulty they have a sympathising friend and adviser in her who rescued them, and a willing hand to help them in case of need. They are not put in ward, and forced into morality by lock and key; the only restraints laid upon them are those inspired by the love and gratitude which they feel they owe to one who has done so much for them. These, and the godly instruction which they daily receive, along with the family influences brought to bear upon them in the houses where they are placed, have been found most effectual in attaining the desired end; and it must be acknowledged that girls so treated are more likely, when removed from any surveillance, to remain steadfast in their resolutions to lead a new and pure life, than those who have been confined where immorality was impossible, and where the thought that they were not free took possession of the mind, to the exclusion almost entirely of other and higher matters.

The difficulty of the work is one of its chief drawbacks; for after Christian charity has overcome the repugnance which it used to feel, the objects of that charity have views and emotions peculiar to themselves, and when they are brought under holy influences, they naturally enough wish to wear no badge, and to be treated rather as repenting sinners than as guilty criminals. They have pleaded guilty—why should they be subject to an inquisitorial examination? They have yielded to the appeals of truth and goodness—why should they not hear the words, “go and sin no more”? We earnestly commend the foregoing extract to the reflections of our readers, who will find, by the next paragraph, that this new mode of preaching the Gospel has been most extensively blessed:—

The results of this system have proved it a good one. During the twelve months over which this lady's exertions have extended, no fewer than 250 girls have been reclaimed. Of these, so far as it is known, only twenty have relapsed, and of this number several have returned in bitter penitence, and are now doing well. Eighty-five of these girls have been restored to their parents, upwards of forty are engaged as domestic servants in different capacities, and the remainder are engaged in miscellaneous employments, of whom about sixty are at present under the care and supervision of this lady.

Of course such a mission cannot be carried on without material resources, and, therefore, some attention must be paid to ways and means. We give another paragraph from the same chapter, which will inform the reader to what extent money has been needed and forthcoming, and what may be the probable requirements for the future. It may seem as if 150*l.* per month, or 35*l.*, at least, per week, is a large sum for an effort conducted on such principles. It is, actually, a large sum, but no doubt, if details were furnished, we should soon find that it has been well expended:—

The object of giving the following narrative to the public is twofold. First, by laying before the public an account of what has been done, to show what can and might be done among that unfortunate class which many thought beyond the power of reclamation and improvement; that many might be induced to enter themselves as hearty and zealous labourers in that field which is “white already to harvest;” and that those who are already engaged on the Lord's side, fighting His battle against the Prince of this world on this particular battlefield, may be encouraged to go on in faith, nothing doubting but that in due time they shall see the fruit of their labour if they faint not. Second, it was desired, by this means, to lay before its readers the claims which this disinterested and zealous lady's work has upon the Christian and benevolent public. Such a work could not be carried out without involving a very considerable expenditure. During the past year about 1100*l.* has been collected by the lady and her friends, from voluntary subscribers, 1000*l.* of which has already been expended, leaving about 100*l.* on hand; and as the average monthly expenditure for the last four or five months has been 150*l.*, this great work threatens to be brought to a stand from want of the necessary means with which to carry it on. We cannot doubt that there are many who, unable to give time and personal exertion in the furtherance of a work so charitable and patriotic, would be glad to assist it with their pecuniary means; and to make known to such the existence of this work, and of its claims, is, as we have stated, one of the objects which the following narrative is intended to accomplish. We appeal earnestly and confidently to the Christian and benevolent public on behalf of this mission, and trust that such a laudable endeavour as the reclamation of fallen woman will not be allowed to fail from want of those means which so many in our country can well afford.

It will be observed that the number of girls actually reclaimed, inclusive of the very few relapses, is about five per week, which every one must admit is a very encouraging result. And it is this success which creates the expenditure, because it appears that while eighty-five had been restored to their parents, about sixty remained, either under the care or the supervision of their benefactor. In any similar endeavour, a similar demand would be made upon popular benevolence. These poor creatures are mostly, perhaps all of them, in such a position that they require some assistance on renouncing a life of sin. Many of them are orphans, or from distant places, or would not be received by their parents, and few of them would be able at once to procure an honourable living. Then, again, they must have counsel and instruction, some discipline is required by many of them, and it needs both time and effort to qualify them to fill their place in society again. However we view the case, we see plainly enough that money is an essential to the successful working of such a mission. If a girl is taken from the streets, she must be taken somewhere, and provided for by Christian benevolence, until she is otherwise properly provided for, or can support herself.

There is a spiritual, as well as a social and moral, side to the question. These poor creatures have souls to be cared for, and to be brought to Christ. Constant intimations occur, in the narration under our eyes, that the salvation of their souls was as much a matter of contemplation as the salvation of their bodies; and, in this department, the most encouraging results appeared. It can readily be imagined that fallen women will renounce their vicious course from different motives. One will give up her sins from disgust, another from shame and a desire to return to virtue, another during a fit of remorse, and others from different considerations, unconnected with true repentance. But, whatever the direct motive, the fact that she has repudiated the ways of sin may be taken advantage of by the spiritual adviser, and at such a time conscience is commonly tender, and "the words of the wise heard in quiet" produce a deep impression. Hence, in reference to the Glasgow work, we read: "That many of the poor, unhappy girls coming under her care have been turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, the lady at the head of this mission most unquestionably believes." This is very gratifying, and equally in harmony with our wishes and our hopes. Indeed, when a girl is reclaimed on worldly principles, and from worldly motives, she is never safe. There is no class of whom it may be more truly said, facilis descensus Avernus; and only when their hearts are imbued with Divine grace, only when they have been led to seek for pardon at the Cross, only when they have consecrated themselves unto God, are they really safe. Therefore it is that so great a prominence must ever be given to their conversion to God, as well as to morality and virtue.

The work before us consists of a series of chapters, giving ample details of the course pursued, and of the scenes visited, of the difficulties encountered, and of the successes achieved. It is written in a truthful and most interesting style, and will not fail deeply to interest and greatly to instruct the reader. We have risen from the perusal more than ever convinced that to save fallen women is pre-eminently woman's mission. Man may do well in this field, but woman alone has the qualification required for the extensive and successful prosecution of the enterprise. To such especially we earnestly commend this volume, and in the strong language of its author we exclaim:—

But perhaps some Christian lady, who has never realised her responsibility till these words have met her eye, and sent to her heart a pang of remorse for neglected opportunities, may try to stifle the warning voice by saying—"I see not how I can do a great work, like this lady." Let us ask—Might not she have calmed her anxiety about the souls of these lost ones by the same reasoning? "Where there is a will there is a way!" The beginning and the end of this work is love. It is not great means or great talents that are requisite. It is simply a pure, generous, Christlike love—a love which will go down to the lowest depths and seek the most degraded; a love which will take no denial, but will "compel them to come in;" a love which will forget self in absorbing solicitude for the salvation of others; a love which will think no labour too heavy, no waiting too long, no anxiety too exhausting, no trial of long-suffering patience too severe, if, in the end, it can see one soul torn out of the meshes of the destroyer, and safely on the way to heaven. This is what is wanted; and this every Christian woman can obtain at the fountain of love—Jesus, who is Love itself.

We should have liked to say a word about the procurer, the seducer, and the patron of infamy, but we refrain, because it would introduce us to subjects too extensive to be discussed in this paper. We hope, however, that the whole question will be not lost sight of, and that the blessing of God will crown the endeavours made in this enterprise, to the promotion of virtue and religion. No one can pass, after sunset, through the main streets of our chief towns without thinking of the peril which besets young men, the temptations to which they are exposed by the allurements of vice, and the need there is that they should be well grounded in the principles of morality and of piety. Many of them may meet the syren as innocent as Joseph, but without his holy resolution and tenderness of conscience. They may and they do fall, and become ministers to the iniquity of which they have been the victims. How needful it is that Christian pastors should be faithful and fearless in the denunciation of this crime against God and man! How needful that every form of licentiousness should be frowned upon by society, and that all who follow it should be avoided as the leper! We should then have no disgusting apologies for vice in the newspapers, and the efforts of God's people for the salvation of such sinners would be both helped and encouraged.

DR. BOEHL'S DISSERTATION ON ISAIAH XXIV.-XXVII.*

THERE is an inexpressible charm about the Book of the Prophet Isaiah. Independently of the fact that nowhere else in the Old Testament is the Gospel of the New Testament so fully set forth, there is a grandeur of diction, and a magnificence of style, which, when we take into consideration its frequency, is not to be found in any other of the sacred books. We do not wonder that it was, in the Old Testament, the favourite book of "the beloved Martyn;" and that by McCheyne it is coupled with John's Gospel† as though they two were the most attractive books in the Bible.

Yet, notwithstanding that it is so generally read and meditated upon, the Book of Isaiah is not always understood. The references that are made in it to the historical events of the prophet's own day, and to the histories of the nations bordering on, or coming in contact with, the land of Israel, require a considerable amount of study to be now intelligible; and are, in some instances, for want of contemporaneous records, covered with obscurity. There are, however, so many passages that can comfort, cheer, and edify the believer, that the perusal of the book is always, under any circumstances, highly useful. There is, indeed, one theory which, though somewhat popular in the present day, tends to darken and obscure the meaning of this as well as other portions of Scripture. We mean the theory that the greater portion of the prophecies of Isaiah have a reference to the events of our day, and to the time of the millennium. This opinion has been held from time to time. Luther saw, as he imagined, the Pope and the Church of Rome in nearly every chapter, though he had the sense and the wisdom to see that such could not have been at least the primary meaning of the prophet. But our Gill, no mean commentator, has fallen into the greater extravagance of supposing the

† In the verse of his hymn on Jehovah Tsidkenu, which runs thus:—

"I oft read with pleasure, to sooth or engage,
Isaiah's wild measure and John's simple page;
Yet e'en when pictured the blood-sprinkled tree Jehovah Tsidkenu seem'd nothing to me."

greater portion of the chapters (vis., xxiv.-xxvii.), which we mean briefly to consider, to have their primary and complete fulfilment with reference to the apostasy of Rome; while a greater number of commentators would point us to the millennial period as the time when all the events here recorded shall have their definite fulfilment.

We are glad to say that Dr. Boehl is not to be ranked among such interpreters. His work is short but able, and gives indications that its author will one day, if he pursues his researches, win for himself a high place among the Biblical scholars of Germany. We regret to say that it is to Germany we have to look for nearly all the most useful works on the Old Testament, as the study of Hebrew and the Shemitic dialects, which is absolutely necessary at least for an Old Testament commentator, is at a miserable discount in this country. Our readers will remember that last year we reviewed another work of Dr. Boehl, entitled De Aramaisms Libri Koholeth. We rejoice to meet with him again on the field of Biblical criticism.

Dr. Boehl considers that the chapters of Isaiah, from the 24th to the 27th inclusive, contain a prophecy concerning the calamities which were then about to come on the land of Israel from the side of Babylon, the restoration of Israel after those troubles, and the punishment and overthrow of Babylon. This, he argues, and we think conclusively, is the primary meaning of this portion of Scripture. The kingdom of Babylon, at the time when the prophecy was delivered, was rising into power. Long before that period, it had been renowned for its progress in literature, in agriculture, in astronomy, and astrology, throughout the Eastern world. Sennacherib had, however, reduced it to the condition of a province of the Assyrian Empire. But Sennacherib, glorying in his power and might, marched triumphantly against the land of Judæa, and after an easy conquest, as it appears, of the fortified cities on the borders, sat down before Jerusalem. From thence he was, however, obliged ignominiously to retreat—almost his entire army having been destroyed by a Divinely-sent pestilence. His want of success appears to have been fatal. The Babylonians recovered partially their power, and very probably—as Dr. Boehl conjectures (in which he is partly supported by Niebuhr)—the embassy of Merodach-baladan, King of Babylon, was sent to Hezekiah to inquire concerning the miraculous change in the dial (Isaiah xxxviii.), and to seek an alliance with him against the King of Assyria, enfeebled by his recent disaster.

Nowhere it must, however, be noted, does Isaiah expressly name Babylon in these chapters, nor have we a plain declaration that the judgments announced in the commencement of chap. xxiv., pertain to the nation of Israel, until we arrive almost at the close of the prophecy. Yet the nation of Babylon are alluded to distinctly enough by the use of words and phrases, to be met with in other clear prophecies concerning that people (compare, for instance, chap. xxiv. 16 with chap. xxi. 2); and the overthrow of that kingdom is set forth (chap. xxiv. 19—21) as the destruction of the world, under which imagery it had been alluded to in chap. xiii., which treats by name of "the burden of Babylon."

These chapters have not escaped being ruthlessly handled by those scholars, who have dissected the Book of Isaiah, in order to show that a great portion of what is handed down under his name, did not really come from the pen of that prophet. Internal evidence, however, is very strongly in favour of their genuineness. There are, elsewhere in Isaiah, frequent instances of paronomasia in the original Hebrew, and such are found in the chapters before us. The idea of a small remnant being left, after the judgments of God shall have taken their course, is found in this portion, as well as in other parts of the book. The phrase, so peculiar to Isaiah, of נִאֲזָן יי ("the majesty of Jehovah") occurs in chap. xxiv. 14, and the cognate נִאֲזַר יי in chap. xxvi. 10. The word נִאֲזַר—used by Isaiah, generally, to express the anger of God towards His own people (vid. Ges. Thes. p. 425)—occurs in chap. xxvi. 20, and in several undisputed passages of Isaiah. Under the similitude of a vineyard, the people of God are described in chap. xxvii. 2, 3, and in chap. v. 1—7. The same description of the desolation coming on the land is found in chap. xxvii. 10, as occurs in chap. v. 17, and in chap. xxxii. 13, &c. Many other instances are given by Dr. Boehl as evidences of Isaiah having been the author, for which we would refer our reader to his dissertation.

In the opening of the 24th chapter, Isaiah declares the lamentable state of the land of Israel, the land utterly emptied, the inhabitants thereof scattered abroad. The phrase "the earth" (אֶרֶץ), when used absolutely, as Dr. Boehl remarks, signifies the land of the people of God, in which dwelt the true priests of God, and which, in v. 5, is alluded to as having been formerly sacred to God. So J. H. Michaelis, Gesenius, Knobel, Maurer understand the passage. The fifth verse is decisive on this point. The devastators of the land are the Babylonians, alluded to in the sixteenth and following verses. The second verse is remarkable, beginning with: "And it shall be, as with the people, so with the priest," as twelve classes are mentioned, thereby indicating, as Dr. Boehl conjectures, that "no tribe should be free from the calamity which was at hand." "Gesenius," remarks Boehl, "argues unfairly that this verse is an indication of a later date than Isaiah, because 'the priests,' instead of 'the king,' are contrasted with 'the people.' But very rarely among the prophets (Comp. Isaiah 3, 2; 5, 13), calamity and punishment are announced to the King of Judah, and to private individuals at the same time; because he was looked upon as a sacred person, and one on whom the entire hopes of the faithful were deservedly placed from the time of David."

As in the first verse of the chapter, "the earth" is narrowed in its signification to the land of Israel, so in the fourth verse the designation of "the world" (הָעוֹלָם) is used as a synonyme to express the same idea. In Isaiah xlii. 5, the same expression is used with reference to the Babylonian world, and in chap. xxvi. 18, the phrase, "neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen," to intimate that the enemies who oppressed the land of Judaea were not then cast down from their victorious state. (Boehl.)

In these days, when unsound views of the atonement are everywhere rife, it is satisfactory to meet with the following clear statement in Dr. Boehl's pamphlet, which we translate somewhat freely for the benefit of our readers: "The word בְּרִית (covenant), he remarks, "is rightly derived from the idea of cutting, because it was the custom, in solemnising a covenant, to pass through victims divided in two pieces. Winer and Knobel rightly consider that the slaughtered victims signified that whichever of the contracting parties violated the covenant, should be liable to a similar death. This being so, let us briefly examine Genesis xv., where, for the first time, a covenant was solemnly made with Abram, by which the ancient covenant, which God had made with Noah, was renewed. What comfort could such animals cut in sunder give to the sinner Abram, if only by them the future fate of him, who was clearly a covenant-breaker, was indicated? But it is necessary that we should insist on verse 17, where it is said that God alone passed through the bloody victims, by which act is shadowed forth (unless I am mistaken) the mystery of Christ's passion; or, to use words accommodated to the old dispensation, that God, the covenant having been broken on the part of man, would endure Himself the punishment of the perjury, which He had set forth to Abram under the symbol of a calf cut in twain. (Comp. on this symbol, Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19.) Such a covenant could bring joy and security to miserable sinners, and is often set forth as the support of believers."

We shall now point out some passages on which Dr. Boehl has given remarks worthy of note.

The calamities, mentioned in the beginning of chap. xxiv., having run their course, a morning of joy succeeds to the night of sadness. The remnant left in the land, "as the gleanings when the vintage is done," acknowledge the majesty of Jehovah and His justice in the devastation of the land. They lift up their voices and sing even from the Mediterranean Sea, along which, in the land of Israel, a scattered few are left. The concert having been heard in the middle land of Canaan, the Prophet exhorts the east and the west to join in the ascription of praise: "Wherefore magnify ye Jehovah in the east, even the name of Jehovah, the God of Israel, in the maritime coasts." The translation of our authorised version, "Glorify ye the Lord God in the fires," is quite unsuited to the context, as is that of Vulgate, ideo in doctrinis laudate Dominum, though both are grammatically admissible. The LXX. appear to have inverted the clauses, and, probably, to have considered בְּיָמָיו as merely employed to strengthen the verb כָּבֵד, and have paraphrased the verse thus: διὰ τοῦτο ἡ δόξα Κυρίου ἐν ταῖς νήσοις ἵσται τῆς θαλάσσης· τὸ ὄνομα Κυρίου ἐνδοξον ἔσται: "on account of this the glory of the Lord shall be in the islands; the name of the Lord shall be glorious." Lowth, however, supposes there is some omission. Dr. Boehl has no remark on this translation of the LXX. The passage may have a secondary reference to Christ, in which case it refers to the conversion of the Gentiles. Luther considers that the whole is an allegory, the vineyard being the land of Judæa; the clusters, the nobles and the people; the remnant left, the apostles, "who lifted up their voice—that is, preached the Gospel—and praised the mercy and the grace of Christ, and rejoiced in the majesty of the Lord, not in their own works, or in the righteousness of the law. But the majesty of the Lord is the victory of Christ, by which He is made Lord of all, and has trodden down the devil, sin, death, and the world, as Paul, in the Epistle to the Colossians, understands this place [?]. This rejoicing is heard, not in a corner of Judæa, but from the sea—that is, it is scattered everywhere among the nations, and goes through the whole world" (Lutheri Schol.)

The scene, according to Dr. Boehl, changes at the 16th verse. The prophet seems to himself to hear the songs from the corner of the earth, even "Glory to the Righteous One"—i.e., God (as Boehl and Knobel; or Christ, as others. Luther incorrectly: "gloriam justi, id est justorum, quod et Christus sit justus et Christiani per eum justificentur"); but suddenly he is terrified by new sights, and is again hurried into visions of slaughter: "But I said, My leanness, my leanness, woe unto me! The treacherous dealers have dealt treacherously: yea, the treacherous dealers have dealt very treacherously." The following is Dr. Boehl's note: "In chap. xxi. 2, the destruction of Babylon is plainly set forth in the same words. In the same place we see the prophet trembling, dreading a fearful vision (v. 34), as Ferer and Hitzig also rightly maintain; but the prophet becomes feeble, as happens to some when a sudden terror comes upon them: because, now, the heaviest judgment of Jehovah is coming on the earth, and Jehovah, as it were, appears in judgment, at whose sight even Habakkuk (chap. iii. 16), John (Rev. x. 10), and Isaiah himself, in the sixth chapter of his book, trembled."

That henceforward to the end of the chapter, the earth signifies the land of Babylon, is evident from the 20th, where the destruction of that empire, without any hope of recovery, is mentioned as about to happen.

Even Grotius acknowledges that, in the twenty-first verse, there is a change in the prophecy, from treating of the land of Israel trodden down by the Assyrians (whom he supposes to have been the enemies referred to) to the punishment of the latter people. In that verse we have a declaration that the Lord will "punish the host of heaven in the heaven (A. V. incorrectly "the host of the high ones that are on high") and the kings of the earth upon the earth"—i.e., as Dr. Boehl rightly explains it, the gods of Babylon as well as the princes thereof—(compare Ex. xii. 12; Num. xxxiii. 4; Isaiah xix. 1)—Luther, badly, whom Lowth follows, the civil and ecclesiastical polity of the Jews. The idea is more plainly developed in the 23rd verse: "Then the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, &c.," for the worship of the host of heaven prevailed at Babylon. It is worthy of notice that the LXX. in this passage—probably, as Grotius supposes, on account of the Egyptian kings—have absurdly rendered the passage: "And the brick (collective, reading לִבְנֵי instead of לִבְנֵי) shall melt away, and the wall (evidently an intentional alteration, for חֲמֹר could not be mistaken for חֲמֵר, which would be the nearest Hebrew word) shall fall!!" The reference in the 22nd verse is to the oriental custom of captives being shut up in prison for a long time ere judgment is pronounced on them; Dr. Boehl considers the shutting up in prison to be literal or corporeal as respects the kings, and spiritual as respects the gods, referring to Jude 6. Luther remarks that the passage can be referred either to the dead or the living, but "I prefer," he says, "to understand it with reference to the dead, so that the sense is that all men shall be gathered together, as in a bundle, and shall be reserved for future judgment, when God will at the same time punish and judge the iniquity of all."

The feast of fat things—which the Lord, in chap. xxv., is said to make unto all nations—Dr. Boehl understands with reference to the manifestation of Jesus, the bread of life and the water of life, in Jerusalem. This was a feast of fat things to all nations. Some, however, consider that the allusion is rather to the custom that kings, after victory, were wont to regale their people at a feast. Luther, badly, says: "The Lord will gather the entire people in Jerusalem, and there suffer them to be slaughtered by the Romans. The fat are the rich, for marrow signifies whatever is most delicate."

Dr. Boehl explains "the vail spread over all nations," as indicating the ignorance and darkness of the mind; and refers, for the true explanation of the seventh verse, to 2 Cor. iii. 15, 16; Eph. iv. 17, 18; Isaiah ix. 1; lx. 2 (see also 2 Cor. iv. 4); but we are unable to see why he should remark: "Cum Chald. Syr. Symm. Hieronym. conservamus 'faciem,' et de Diabolo intelligimus, qui caput quasi velaminis est, quod velut regnum ejus totum ab eo pendet, cum eoque perit"—for the simple explanation is that "the face of the covering" is poetically the same as "the covering;" and though the mental darkness is caused by Satan, we are at a loss to see the importance of retaining the word "face" in the translation, and how it can be understood with reference to the Devil. The vail began to be removed at the preaching of the Gospel, and the entire removal will be effected at the end of the world.

Our authorised version's translation of the 8th verse, "He will swallow up death in victory," ought rather to be "He will swallow up (i.e. destroy) death forever"—i.e., death is swallowed up in the death of Jesus Christ (comp. John v., 24, &c.). The promise has begun to be accomplished; its full realisation will be in that day when "the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body," shall be manifested. St. Paul, in 1 Cor. xv., quotes this passage, but not exactly in accordance with the Hebrew, and widely differing from the LXX. It ought to be noted that the rendering of Theodotion agrees verbatim with that of St. Paul.

There is some difficulty with regard to the translation of chap. xxvi. 3. The reading of our authorised version, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee," is substantially the same as that adopted by Gesenius (Thes. p. 907), "animus firmus—i.e., animi firmi homo—huic servas salutem, salutem. Intellige לו'." Dr. Boehl, however, with Ewald, Hendewerk, and Drechaler, regard it as an exclamation of admiration by the prophet: "O decretum suffulsum! custodies pacem, pacem; quia in te innititur (decretum)." "O well-supported decree! Thou wilt keep peace, peace; because it (the decree) rests upon Thee."

We would linger upon other passages, but we must be drawing our remarks to a close. Chap. xxvi. 14 is thus rendered by our critic: "The dead do not revive; the Rephaim (what our authorised version quite admissibly renders "deceased," but there was also a nation of that name, Gen. xiv. 5) do not arise : therefore thou hast visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." The meaning is : the spiritually dead will not care for God—they desire not to be quickened. The enemies of Israel are represented under the name of the Rephaim, a nation which ever was an object of fear to Israel.

The contrast between Israel and their foes is drawn very forcibly in the 19th verse, which Dr. Boehl translates, "May thy dead live again ; may my dead arise. Awake and sing, O ye dwellers in dust, for the dew of herbs is thy dew ; but the earth shall cast forth the Rephaim." The word נבלי must be taken collectively ; our authorised version, "together with my dead body," is not correct. The prophet, in the first sentence, directly addresses Israel, and then describes the enemies as belonging to his own people : "my dead"—i.e., the dead of my people. The supposed reference here to Christ's resurrection, so frequently dwelt on in the pages of our evangelical commentators, cannot be proven. The sense of the passage, according to Boehl, is : Israel, moistened by the dew of God's favour, shall revive, while her enemies shall be cast forth, as an untimely birth, even as it were by the earth. It may refer to the general resurrection of the just as well as the unjust ; and the use of the word רפאים does not necessarily convey a bad sense. The allusion to the dew is thus explained by Gesenius : The dew of God shall refresh those that rise from the dead, in the same way as dew refreshes plants. Some understand the Hebrew to mean "the dew of light"—i.e., of life, the life-giving dew—but the former is preferable.

We regret that, for want of space, we must entirely pass by Dr. Boehl's notes on chapter xxvii. We hope, however, that those of our readers who are interested in Biblical criticism, will procure this little pamphlet for themselves. The grammatical notes are of service to the Hebrew student ; and, on the whole, we consider the subject ably handled. We hope Dr. Boehl may soon present us with a work of larger dimensions, on some topic connected with Old Testament criticism.

Foreign Intelligence.

WHAT might France not have become but for the Papacy ! The malefic influence of the Man of Sin upon that great country is written in every page of its past and contemporary history. In our French correspondence, the genius of this dark system is seen laying one hand upon the occupant of the seat of empire, and dictating the Imperial policy, while the other presses down the masses of the people, and retains them in the grossest ignorance. The suspicion of holding Gallican views is rendered, by the Ultramontanes, a disqualification for the episcopate, and this they are powerful enough to enforce, learning, piety, and the Emperor's approval notwithstanding ! Yet their final catastrophe is but delayed : avert it they cannot. What has hitherto been the fruit of their most cherished schemes ? The Massacre of St. Bartholomew was to extirpate heresy from the soil of France, and when that failed the work was to be done by the Dragonnades and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Louis Philippe's men-of-war were to crush Protestantism in Tahiti. Both communions survive and flourish ; the cry addressed from one to the other is wafted across the Pacific, "Come over and help us !" and the tree planted by British missionaries is destined to be watered by the sons of the Huguenots. The French capital, too, is visited by English evangelists, who are instrumental in kindling a flame of devotion, which, as will be seen from M. Frederic Monod's testimony, survives their departure, and promises to be permanent.

A trustworthy account of the schools and churches in Nice will suggest, to those whom they concern, some lessons of universal application. The Mariolatry which prevails in Sicily is graphically portrayed in another article, which will, we imagine, create surprise even in the minds of those who are no strangers to the more ordinary and guarded developments of Romish superstition.

Two articles from Germany will prove of special interest to different classes of readers. German theology is not in high repute among British Protestants, but it will be seen from the letter of our Frankfort correspondent that its most accomplished professors are achieving a work which none but Germans could accomplish, and which must make all Christendom their debtors. In the second article is contained probably the fullest and most authentic account of the Elberfeld revival which has yet appeared in England.

The Jamaica revival forms the subject of a letter which we shall be glad to see followed up by other communications from the same impartial pen. The writer considers that there has been exaggeration both among some who have commended and some who have distrusted the revival. He gives his own impression as to the good that has been done, and informs us what he desiderates in the converts generally.

The importance of native agency in China is forcibly presented in a letter from a missionary in that country, with a request that the subject may be made matter of prayer. We cannot doubt that that request will meet a cordial response. There must be other missionaries, who have their sense of special wants to be met in the supplications of multitudes whom they can never see in this life, but who can read their printed wish. We thank our brother for making us the medium of his hallowed desire, and we commend his example to fellow-missionaries.

We solicit an attentive perusal for the communication from America. The information which it conveys is most gratifying as to the spirit which, in spite of the war, is animating Christian men at the North. There are currents of thought and feeling, most influential, though not most prominent, of which we must expect political prints to take little or no account. How beneficently these are operating, under the hand of the All-wise Disposer of events, will be seen from the letter of our correspondent.

The invitation to special prayer, in the second week in 1862, has been issued. We are sure we have but to mention that it will be found in a subsequent page, to obtain for it the notice it deserves.

FRANCE.

Paris, July, 1861.

IMPORTANT DISCUSSIONS ON THE ROMAN QUESTION IN THE FRENCH JOURNALS.

The principal topic of the day continues to be the quarrel as to the preservation or the extinction of the temporal power of the Papacy. On the one hand, the Ultramontane press persists in maintaining that the spiritual independence of Pius IX. is contingent upon the possession of the pretended domain of St. Peter; and it adds that not only the Sovereign Pontificate, but the crowns of princes and all the laws of human societies, will be lost on the day that Pius IX. shall cease to be a king. To this dismal array of sinister predictions the writers of the clerical faction join violent threats. "The faithful Roman Catholics will arise like one man, if their common father is in peril. They will give to this holy cause their money and their blood! It will be a universal crusade, the most necessary, the most generous of crusades! And woe to those who shall have laid a sacrilegious hand upon the possessions of the Vicar of Jesus Christ! They and their accomplices will miserably perish!" Such is the daily language of the Ultramontanes; they repeat it in the pulpits, in the confessionals, and even in the schools, in the form of prayers, which the little children must learn by heart.

On the other hand, the liberal papers of all shades of opinion, from the Journal des Débats, which is very moderate, to the Opinion Nationale, which represents democracy, allows no opportunity to pass of impressing upon Government that it is its duty to recall the French troops. "Rome," say these organs of modern sentiment, "belongs to the Italians, and must be restored to them without delay. The recognition of the kingdom of Italy has rendered this obligation still more pressing. The Pope and the cardinals are become the mortal enemies of the Napoleon dynasty. The city of the Vatican is a hotbed of conspiracy against France and Italy. Why, then, be so careful of keeping up appearances and displaying courtesy towards such adversaries? Why resist the force of things? Leave Rome to its own destiny. Allow the Romans to manage their own business, and everything will soon be settled. Half measures are worth nothing."

Hitherto Louis Napoleon has remained undecided between these opposite opinions. He takes two steps forward and then one backwards. He is evidently brought to a pause by the violent clamour of the clerical party. His personal sentiments would lead him to free all Italy; but he hesitates in view of the consequence of such a proceeding. It seems that the Empress Eugenie, who, as you are aware, is of Spanish birth, who is very bigoted, and is governed by priests, employs her immediate personal influence to maintain the Pope's temporal power. Domestic storms have accompanied this rather unconstitutional interference of the Empress.

Nevertheless, things cannot remain long in statu quo. Our officers and soldiers at Rome are in perpetual conflict with the Pontifical troops. It is with difficulty that the French general preserves an appearance of order and tranquillity. It is no longer possible to constitute a regular government in the Papal city, except with the Ministers appointed by the King of Italy. The great majority of the citizens are continually making demonstrations in favour of Victor Emmanuel. The most worthy of them are imprisoned or in exile. The schools are closed; commerce and industry are at their last gasp; social life is suspended. Decidedly, the Pope's Government must fall. His hour is come, as in the case of all Popish bishops who formerly united the temporal authority with the spiritual.

The true solution has been indicated by the illustrious and lamented Count Cavour: the Free Church in the Free State. No one will dispute with Pius IX., or his successors, the rights of the Pontificate in matters of doctrine or discipline. There lies their domain, and perhaps the Popes will have more independence just because they will have ceased to be temporal princes. The Roman Catholic clergy of France are more respected in our day than they were in the eighteenth century, because they no longer take a prominent part in politics. Who knows but that the Pope's experience may be similar?

APPOINTMENTS TO EPISCOPAL SEES.

I have several times spoken of episcopal sees which continue vacant in this country. Cardinal Antonelli apparently thought that this afforded an excellent means of vexing the French Government. The dioceses which waited in vain for a new bishop were in a state of agitation; the priests raised their hands towards heaven as a sign of their mental distress; the fanatics murmured; the female devotees wept tears of grief at home, and disturbed the repose of their husbands; the ignorant peasantry impatiently asked why their spiritual head did not make his appearance. All this entered into the plans of the Roman Court. By agitating men's minds in France, Antonelli and his subordinates hoped to gain time and derive some advantage.

But these studied delays could not be indefinitely prolonged. The French Ambassador at Rome was instructed to speak in firm and decided language. He made the Vatican understand that the patience of Napoleon III. was exhausted, and that, in a moment of bad humour, the French soldiers might be ordered to withdraw. At length the Pope yielded, and the dioceses so long deprived of their chief pastors were consoled by new bishops.

I must note an exception, however. The Abbé Maret, who was appointed by the Emperor to the episcopal see of Vannes, in the province of Brittany, has not been confirmed by the Pope. It would form a sad history, were I to relate all the intrigues and calumnies which there have been in connexion with this matter. The Abbé Maret is, undoubtedly, one of the most eminent and worthy of the French clergy. He has occupied the post of Dean of the Romish Theological College of Paris. His writings are full of learning and piety. He has dealt a powerful blow at Pantheism. But what matters that? M. Maret is comparatively liberal; he is suspected of holding Gallican sentiments; perhaps he even thinks that the Pope's temporal power is not founded in Divine right. That is enough! The learned and estimable Abbé Maret has been pursued with every imaginable accusation. Some reproach him with being deaf—deafness being a physical infirmity which constitutes a canonical impediment. Others have dared to allege that he has not the religious and moral qualities necessary for the exercise of the episcopate. The bigots have signed denunciations against him, and the Jesuits have moved heaven and earth, as the proverbial saying is, to raise up enemies against him. The priests of his diocese have even addressed an impertinent letter to him, requesting him to retire. The Abbé Maret addressed memorials to Rome, justifying himself; but it was useless. His case was decided without the trouble of hearing. The clerical faction had resolved not to accept a semi-liberal bishop at any price. At length, the Abbé Maret, convinced that to obtain the confirmation of his appointment was an impossibility, renounced his bishop's title, and placed his resignation in the hands of the Emperor. Such is the condition in which we are now placed. To occupy an episcopal see, it is indispensable to hold the opinions, and to belong, body and soul, to the school of the Jesuits!

INADEQUACY OF ELEMENTARY EDUCATION IN THIS COUNTRY.

Among the other questions which have obtained, for some weeks past, a large share of attention from the press of Paris, I must mention the education of the humbler classes. The French are beginning to acknowledge that they do not take precedence of all other nations in this respect. We have soldiers of undoubted bravery in great numbers; we are in no want of cannons and bombs; our country can figure with honour, and in the first rank, amid military Powers. But do the labouring men—the French peasants—receive sufficient education? That is another matter. Statistical inquiries, the result of very careful research, prove that a third of our male population can neither read nor write. As to the females, more than half are strangers to the first rudiments of education. Our schools, in country places, are little frequented. In short, England, Prussia, Switzerland, Sweden, and even some of the provinces of Italy, stand above us in the matter of elementary education.

This subject is closely connected with the religious question. The priests have done all that was in their power to hinder the development and prosperity of schools. Thus, in 1850 and 1852, when they had a preponderating voice in the councils of the Government, they secured the passing of laws which prohibited the elementary schoolmasters from teaching history, and even music! The education of the people is strictly confined to reading, writing, a little arithmetic, together with the catechism. Most of our poor schoolmasters receive but the mere mockery of a salary; they scarcely earn two francs a-day—that is to say, much less than a working-man. Besides this, the priests, seeing that they were unable completely to prevent the opening of schools, got the idea of creating a formidable competition against the lay schoolmasters by means of their Brethren of the Christian Doctrine—vulgar, illiterate, sometimes very immoral persons—who consume the time of their pupils in singing litanies and making genuflexions before the image of the Virgin. As they teach gratuitously, and are seconded by the clergy, in the confessionals, these brethren have gained thousands of scholars in all directions. I say nothing of the sisters, or nuns, whose duty it is to teach little girls. Their teaching is a mockery. The sisters have no other care than to lead these girls to mass and inspire them with profound veneration for the curé of the village.

It is clear that, with such institutions and precautions as these, the French people are obliged to remain shamefully ignorant. The Jesuitical party entirely approve of this. The more individuals are deprived of a solid education, the better are they fitted to become credulous and superstitious. With peasants who never read anything, and women who are unable to read, the false miracles of Salette and other places are readily believed. There is a multitude perfectly willing to make pilgrimages, follow processions, to listen to the voice of the priest as an oracle of God, and to give their money to enrich the sacerdotal body.

But intelligent men are not at all alive to advantages of this kind. They say that the great ignorance of the people is at once a disgrace and a danger to our country, especially under the system of universal suffrage. How can people deprived of all elementary education acquire sufficient knowledge to decide accurately in political matters? There is a demand, therefore, for the extension of primary teaching, higher salaries for schoolmasters, and more complete independence in their relations with the clergy; for in the present state of things, the unfortunate schoolmasters are the servants and almost the slaves of the priests. Some of the journals announce that the Minister and Superior Council of Public Instruction are ready to enter upon this new course. It would be an immense progress for France.

DISSATISFACTION OF THE ULTRAMONTANES WITH THE MEASURE RELATIVE TO AFRICAN COOLIES.

You will have read in our journals, or in the Times, a letter of the Emperor, in which he declares that, in virtue of a treaty recently signed with the Queen of Great Britain, it will be forbidden to seek for coolies, or labourers, upon the coast of Africa. The motives indicated by Napoleon III. are perfectly just. It is an undoubted fact that the way in which these African labourers were procured was simply a disguised slave-trade. The chiefs of the barbarous tribes carried off men and women, as before, in order to sell them to the captains of European ships; and when these Africans arrived in the colonies, their enslaved condition, for at least five or seven years, was notorious.

The organs of the clerical party ought, one would have thought, to have expressed a lively satisfaction at this humane and charitable act, for nothing can be more in harmony with the spirit of Christianity. But their language is just the reverse, and they have displayed as much opposition as they could to the Emperor's letter. Upon what ground? Firstly, the ministers of Romanism have never manifested much sympathy for the lot of the negroes; they have left this, as a matter of solicitude, to heretical England. France has been very slow in abolishing the African slave-trade and slavery. Then that which has particularly shocked the Jesuitical press, is that the Imperial letter affords a proof of a more cordial alliance with Great Britain. Here is the unpardonable sin! The Ultramontanes cannot endure the idea of a close union between the two countries. Their most ardent wish is that war—a furious war—may take place between France and England; for they hope that the cause of the Papacy would gain in the terrible struggle; and the interests of caste are, with the clerical faction, superior to those of their native land. But, thank God! the Jesuits have not the supremacy in affairs of State, and Napoleon III. will never forget that, if he should yield to their perfidious counsels, he would speedily endanger his crown.

ENCROACHMENTS OF THE NEW THEOLOGY RESISTED.

I mentioned, in my previous letter (Evangelical Christendom, p. 427), the formation of a Liberal Protestant Union, which, while calling to their aid the great words toleration, free examination, mutual support, progressive development of the Christian life, &c., attacked the fundamental doctrines of the faith. The movement is similar to that which has been excited in England by the "Essays and Reviews"—only the members of the French Liberal Union go still farther in their negations, and do not even possess theological learning. They wish to introduce into the pulpits and consistories of French Protestantism some indescribable semi-pantheistic philosophy, as cold as it is vague. All that belongs to the idea of a positive revelation of God in the Gospel, all supernatural influence, even the resurrection of Jesus Christ, are, in their eyes, legends or superstitious traditions. They consider the son of Mary simply as a human being, scarcely superior to Socrates or Confucius. They resemble those Lichtfreunde, who appeared in Germany a few years since, under the influence of Strauss's book, and who soon abandoned religion altogether, and precipitated themselves into the arena of political agitation.

These infidel demonstrations have excited energetic resistance. One of our most pious laymen, M. Frédéric de Contack, has published a pamphlet, in which, with as much good sense as piety, he refutes the views put forth in the programme of the Liberal Union. He proves these two things: that the truth contained in Holy Scripture is the foundation of the French Reformation, and that every Church must necessarily have the same essential doctrines, since it has one and the same worship, the same liturgy, and prayer and preaching in common. Is it, in fact, possible to imagine the existence of a religious society, in which the most heterogeneous ideas, the most irreconcilable contradictions, should wage perpetual warfare? This would be disorder, chaos, and, speedily, death.

The friends of the Gospel do not content themselves with writing pamphlets and articles in the periodicals against these adversaries of the Christian Revelation. They are about to organise committees, or associations, for the purpose of cautioning our congregations, enlightening their consciences, and obtaining their votes for men of truly Evangelical principles, in the elections for the Presbyterial councils and consistories. The members of the Protestant Church of France will show, we hope, that they have not forsaken the sacred truths believed by their fathers—the immutable teaching of the Bible. Some of them may be drawn aside for a moment by the misty phraseology of the new school; but the majority will declare, with unshaken fidelity, that their faith rests—and ever will rest—upon the Word of God: so that this controversy, however deplorable, may, by the Lord's blessing, serve to show how much remains of the old piety of the French Protestants.

THE PROTESTANTS OF TAHITI.

We have lately received some interesting intelligence from the Island of Tahiti. Your readers, I think, will not have forgotten the serious and melancholy events which took place in that distant country during the reign of Louis Philippe. The chief of a French squadron imposed the protectorate of our Government upon the Tahitians. It was, in reality, a Popish enterprise. The priests were jealous of the success obtained in Oceania by the Protestant missionaries, and they had recourse to artillery, by way of argument, for also obtaining proselytes. You may remember that there was a deal of excitement after this armed expedition, and that war was on the point of breaking out between France and England.

But the plans of the Romish clergy have not succeeded. The Popish missionaries sent to Tahiti have encountered, almost throughout the island, invincible opposition, in spite of the support of the French garrison. Native evangelists continue to celebrate the Protestant worship. The Tahitian Legislative Assembly (for a Legislative Assembly exists, composed of natives) have just expressed a wish that two French pastors may be sent to them, at the same time offering them a suitable salary. Our Government will doubtless regard it as a duty to comply with this reasonable request.

THE RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT IN PARIS.

(From the Archives du Christianisme.)

Several brethren in the faith in Paris have met to agree, if possible, on the best means of fostering, extending, and consolidating the blessed spiritual movement which appeared during the stay of Messrs. Radcliffe and Henry. As to the desire to see at Paris the Gospel kingdom advanced, and souls converted to Christ, there was but one feeling and one voice. But, as must be expected, there was not the same unanimity as to the means to be employed. Some simply asked for a continuance of the meetings of Mr. Radcliffe, retaining, as far as possible, the forms and proceedings which have already been so abundantly blessed of God; others, on the contrary, wished to break off this connexion, and set aside most of these forms, especially the conversations after the meetings. It was not possible for those who saw in these conversations a principal means, if not the principal means, which God has employed to initiate the revival in Paris, to give them up. The only way which seemed open, to meet, in a brotherly manner, views so conscientiously divergent, was to establish two kinds of public meetings:—

1. A monthly meeting attached to the Evangelical Alliance, specially for preaching the Gospel, from which shall be excluded every form and procedure which has not the assent of all.

2. Meetings more free, the frequency and form of which are left to the Churches, or to the brethren who believe they ought to call them.

A first meeting of this last kind was announced, from most of the Evangelical pulpits, on Sunday, June 30, and called by the following card, which was distributed the same day after the services, at the doors of all the places of Evangelical worship:—

"A general meeting, connected with the meetings of Mr. Radcliffe, and having for its object, under the blessing of God, to continue the movement so happily begun, will take place (D. V.) on Friday next, July 5, at eight o'clock in the evening, at the Chapel of the Reformed Evangelical Church, Rue de Chabrol, No. 29."

This attempt to continue the meetings, by God's blessing, quite succeeded. At the hour named the chapel in the Rue de Chabrol was so full that not only was no seat vacant—there was not even standing-room in the aisles. We noticed in the throng some new faces, but we knew most, as having seen them at previous meetings. They all had depicted upon their countenances the happiness they felt at finding themselves at such a meeting, and many hearts were moved, and many eyes moistened, when, with one heart and voice, the assembly sang the hymn now so known and loved, and which has been so much blessed—

"Just as I am, without one plea," &c.

M. Fred. Monod read a portion of God's Word; then several brethren briefly implored the blessing of God upon the meeting. M. Guillaume Monod, who presided, addressed to the assembly a short and fervent address, after which he read ten special requests for prayer placed upon the desk—requests which were laid in succession before the throne of grace, by brethren who felt disposed to become the organ of the assembly. MM. Pulsford, Fisch (recently returned from America), and F. Monod, spoke in the course of the meeting, and several hymns from the collection, still very small, intended for revival meetings, were sung. All this took no more than an hour and a-half, when M. F. Monod, announcing that the meeting, properly so called, was about to conclude, invited all who desired conversation on the state of their souls with experienced Christians, or to propose any questions, to remain in their places—observing that no one who staid must be surprised to be addressed personally and directly. A good number remained, and conversation followed. We were witnesses of the religious and profound emotion of some. The chapel was not quite vacated till half-past ten.

We were happy to hear M. Pulsford announce a similar meeting for Tuesday, July 16, at the Chapel in the Rue Royale, Saint Honoré, at eight p.m.

The religious movement in Paris has thus entered upon a new phase. The blessed and beloved instruments which God has used have disappeared, but the movement does not depend upon them: it is directly and exclusively upon the Lord Jesus Himself, always present among His children, with all His love and all His power, ever living to intercede for them—"The same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

FRED. MONOD, Pastor.

ITALY.

THE FRENCH CHURCH AT NICE.

In your last number is to be found a résumé of the report of the Committee for Evangelization in Italy, carried on by Vaudois agency. Nice, now no longer Italian professedly, is mentioned among the stations of Vaudois missionary efforts—but as one that has now, like a swarm of young bees, left the parent hive to shift for itself. It has not broken off its friendly connexion with the Committee of Evangelization; far from it. The Church of Nice still continues under the same pastor, M. Pilatte, whom it now holds as a loan from the Committee, but it manages its own affairs, temporal and spiritual. It has a council, consisting of pastor, elders, and deacons. The Church members resident in the place are few. Like the other Protestant churches at Nice, the French has a fluctuating congregation, but it differs from the others in being composed of all the different nationalities of Europe. According to its constitution, it chooses every year, among the strangers, some Christian men of influence and experience as assistant members of its council.

The winter that has passed was one of remarkable life and interest in this missionary Church. It was attended to overflowing, not only on Sunday morning, but also at the evening services, when the Psalms were read and expounded. People came from all the countries of Europe, and even America sent some hearers to the Word of God, as explained in this Church on the borders of the Mediterranean. There might be seen Danes, Swedes, Norwegians, Germans, Dutch, Italians, French, and English. There was even a frequent recurrence of the Russian type of countenance. Many a member of the Greek Church, deserting the costly edifice built in Longchamp, by the late Empress, with all its gorgeous ornaments and its splendid music, comes to the Vaudois Church, plain and unornamented as it is, to join in the simple hymns, and to listen to the powerful preaching of a pure Gospel. It was curious, on going out from the church, to listen to the different languages spoken by those who had all been listening to the same universal language of the Church—that which, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, reaches the understanding and the hearts of all that are to be made wise unto salvation.

There are two schools connected with this church, one for boys and one for girls; also a little hospital for Protestants. In the latter some very interesting cases have occurred during the course of last winter—persons who seem to have learned to know the Lord during days of sickness, and to have found consolation and light even in the shadowy vale of death.

THE OTHER PROTESTANT CHURCHES OF NICE.

The English Church is now of long continuance in this place, though these are different times to that when it had to hide itself behind the cypresses and high walls of the Rue de France, so as not to scandalise the orthodox believers in the only true Church, by showing its heretical face. Now above that wall, and among those cypresses, rises a beautiful church, a monument of the generosity of English visitors—but more interesting as a monument of the triumph of religious freedom in the kingdom of Sardinia. In the Carabael, a suburb of villas where visitors live, there is another little church for the benefit of those among them who are English. In both the Gospel is preached faithfully, and they have been numerous attended during the course of last winter.

The Scotch Church is in the Rue Masséna, where formerly all the Vaudois services were held. It is a seion of the Free Church of Scotland, and its minister is supported by that denomination. Partly educated at Geneva, Mr. Burn Murdoch possesses the advantage of being able to use the French tongue, if wanted, as well as his own; and in whichever language he expounds, his hearers may be sure of hearing a sound Gospel.

The less that is said of the German Church the better. It is a small place, and a very small congregation. The preaching is very strongly tinctured with High Lutheranism; the writer once heard it, and never met with such a setting forth of the Regeneration of Baptism in any Lutheran church before. Others have heard sentiments in favour of the doctrine of purgatory held forth by the same minister.

The Brethren have a meeting-room, where a congregation of hearers assembles three or four times a week. They are generally ministered to in French by a pastor, formerly of the Free Church of the Canton de Vaud, one well versed in Scripture, and a faithful preacher of the Gospel. The teaching often turns on prophetic subjects. One evening in the week there is a short exposition in Italian, when the Italian evangelist at Nice holds forth to his countrymen, of whom, however, few come to hear, except when attracted by the hope of some pecuniary advantage.

THE ADULT SCHOOLS.

What became of the schools for adults at Nice? is a question often heard from those who feel an interest in the advancement of the kingdom of God. Enjoying themselves all the advantages that have been showered on this favoured spot, they wish to see some real good result to its inhabitants in consequence of the visits of all those foreigners who come to inhale the pure air and bask in the lovely sunshine. What became of the schools for adults at Nice? The writer so often heard it asked, during the course of last winter, that it became a matter of curiosity, and a stimulus to repeat the question to all who were likely to give an answer of any value. The result of all inquiries was this: the schools were, it seems, as well as some other attempts at evangelization, set agoing by some warm-hearted English Christians, who were urged on by a sincere desire to do good to the Nizzards; but though exceedingly well-meant, and generously seconded, were not well directed, nor adapted to the character and wants of the people. Too much hope of temporal gain was held out to them, and instead of raising their views to something higher, they lowered them to a mere calculation of how many jackets and shawls, and pairs of shoes and trousers, they could get, or for how large a sum they could sell the many good books that were showered upon them. The tea-meetings, in English fashion were rather a farce to the Nizzards; but they tacitly submitted to the infliction of a few addresses, for the sake of the good things they got by listening to them; and between times they told the priests of it all, and were absolved, because of their readiness in reporting what was going on. Such is the testimony gathered from very different quarters, and which perfectly agrees with the writer's own experience.

But the adult schools? There were at the time twelve of them, and well attended. There they got no treat: what could be their inducement to go to them? Partly curiosity, partly the hope of future gain, and in some, perhaps, an awakening desire for some spiritual good; but did all this come to nothing, and how? It is to be feared that little good resulted from the effort. In this case, as in many similar ones, a great desire to be up and doing, joined to a very sanguine view of men and things, made the warm-hearted Christian people who directed the movement not guarded enough in the choice of the agency chosen to act on the Nizzards.

The twelve schools had, of course, each a schoolmaster; and some of these proved to be great rogues, who gave cause for so much scandal, and so much abuse, from the side of the Roman Catholics, that we cannot wonder if the impression, in regard to Protestantism, was rather bad than good.

Of the twelve schoolmasters—

No. 1 shot himself in the neighbourhood where is now Rue Longchamp.

No. 2 ran off to Africa, leaving his wife and children.

No. 3, after various adventures, collected money for going to America; but only went off to Genoa, where he spent all the money.

No. 4 was a gentleman of education, a chevalier of some sort, who professed to be a sincere convert, and for a time seemed to be doing well, also having a school in which he instructed forty boys. All of a sudden he took it into his head, one day, to administer the Lord's Supper to these forty boys—and was, of course, dismissed.

No. 5 was a man of the name of Toselli, who seemed very zealous; and professed so devoted an attachment to the late Mr. Carus Wilson, that he had his child christened by the name Carus Toselli. But, after some time, it was discovered that he was in league with the Bishop—had been reporting to him all that had been going on—and as soon as he found himself discovered, he had little Carus Toselli re-christened in the cathedral.

So much for five of the twelve. With few exceptions, the others on the catalogue were as bad. Such was the fate of the schools.

NIZZARD CHARACTERISTICS.

So long as we look at the population of the town, few places seem to be so discouraging as Nice. No impression whatever seems to be made, or to be possible of making, on the easy, pliable Nizzards. Unstable as water, they cannot excel. They are too polite and obliging not to receive Bibles from Dr. This, and Lord That, and Mrs. Something-else; but, at the very best, they keep them as a remembrance of personal favours, but as to looking in them—never. Servants in a Christian family will submit to be read to, unless it be too near Easter, the time for confession. Many probably tell their priests of it, who steel them against such bad influence, but allow them to continue under it for the sake of gaining their livelihood, and with the condition of reporting all that they see and hear. Last winter a poor woman, who was going to be confined, attracted the interest of some Christian people. They collected money for her, paid her lodgings, procured clothes for the baby, and supplied all her wants. One day she suddenly disappeared; Monsignor the Bishop had sent a carriage to fetch mother and child. He could no longer have his stray lambs among the wolves. The woman had all the while been reporting to him that the Protestants were trying to convert her. She had to repent of her treachery and ingratitude, for she was placed in the hospital, where she was not half so well off as among her kind Protestant friends. These disappointments are so numerous, that no wonder those who have grown used to them get somewhat discouraged.

The political ferment in which the Nizzards have been living during the last two or three years has of late also contributed to keep them out of the way of receiving any serious impressions. The annexation, with the great promises that it held out, and the great disappointments to which it has subjected the Nizzards, was enough in itself to extinguish any spark that might have been kindled. Education stands very low—few people now can read and write. It is to be hoped that at least such a minimum of instruction may be gained by means of the annexation. Schools are opened in various places where before there were none. The writer entered one near the Port of Nice. Lessons in catechism were going on. The children repeated their answers very fluently. One question was rather striking: "Why does the bishop at confirmation give a box on the ear to each of the candidates for confirmation?" The answer was: "To make him understand that he must be ready to suffer all sorts of affronts and torments for his faith in Jesus Christ."

It is hard to believe that such things are done and taught, but the writer made no mistake. The question and answer are to be found in the catechism authorised by the Bishop of Nice in 1861, for the instruction of the young. It contains, besides all the Roman Catholic errors of doctrine, much more that is absurd and objectionable in the same style as the above.

Can nothing, then, be done for the Nizzards by their fellow-creatures, who enjoy the blessing of a more scriptural faith? Must they be left to themselves? No, surely; but at present the writer can only say, "Let us pray and watch for the guidance of the Lord. May He, through His Holy Spirit, teach His people how to conduce to the advancement of His kingdom on this beautiful portion of His creation—so favoured in every other respect—and may He bless any efforts that are made to bring its inhabitants out of spiritual darkness into the light and freedom of the children of God!"

SUPERSTITION IN SICILY.

The following interesting letter first appeared in an Italian periodical. It is from the pen of a Vaudois minister of rare endowments and zeal, now labouring at Palermo. It presents a vivid picture of the spiritual destitution of Sicily, and suggests the need for earnest prayer and effort for its evangelization.]

The month of May is over, and the feast of Corpus Domini; and as the people of the South are most eager for spectacles, the past week has been, so to say, a continual procession. This evening (June 12) there is repeated the exhibition of the sacrament upon the altars constructed in different parishes. The service assumes a melancholy character through the strange custom of the "babbuni," a sort of maskers who generally precede the processions,

The sound of the bells and the music of the National Guard is constant, or rather general, and a tremendous din of little "petrieri" (swivel guns) are the regular accompaniment of the public adoration of the Host, which seems to me to differ very little from the idolatrous festivals of pagan countries. When we attack the Romish worship thus directly the priests grumble and cry out that they are calumniated. But idolatry is nothing if it is not a worship, an adoration, a "lutris," "delis," or "hyperdelia," offered to a figure because it represents a divinity. I do not believe that ever a man rendered worship to a piece of wood, of clay, or of stone, simply as such, but always because he believed there was to be found there some hidden power, some intrinsic sanctity, which was unseen. Now, when I saw, some weeks back, the Pope, with all his train of Swiss guards, chamberlains, cardinals, with the Queen of Naples and her household, entering the great cathedral of the Roman world, approach the statue of St. Peter, which is known to have been anciently a figure of Jupiter, and then, when one of the chamberlains had wiped off the dust from the foot of the statue with his handkerchief, kissing it, lifting up his little white cap—in fine, bowing down—putting his head under the feet of Peter, and muttering his prayers—when I saw all the other prelates imitate his example and salute the idol—what could I say to myself, but that those priests, with that high priest, are so many idolaters—unconscious, I wish to believe, but yet guilty of having offended the majesty of God with their idols?

In few countries of the world has the adoration of the Virgin taken a form so exaggerated as here in Sicily. It seems impossible that priests who are sincere, and who wish for the salvation of souls, should tolerate excesses so extravagant. I have already spoken of processions and images; what shall I now say of the sermons? I only hear of very few; and although there are announcements of lectures, expositions of the Gospel, and many other things, more than once it has occurred to me to find the door of the church locked at the time when I was told there was to be preaching. In the meantime, in the month of May, they broke loose; and as if to exorcise the storm of liberty which threatened to bring down the decayed edifice of superstition, they redoubled their endeavours to revive everywhere the worship of the Virgin Mary.

Dear brother, I would not be bitter nor unjust, but I cannot help feeling a profound indignation against the men who always thrust forward the pretended powers of the new goddess, instead of giving all glory, all confidence and love, to our only mediator, Jesus Christ. It was with indignation that I heard last Sunday an old preacher exhibit—with sophisms most unworthy of a sincere man, how much more of a minister of the Gospel—the Virgin Mary as the true dispenser of all graces. Never, no never, had I heard things so extravagant. I say nothing of the appearance and decoration of the choir of the church, which would have been worthy of the Theatre des Variétés at Paris, or of a concert hall. In the middle, in a cool and shady grove, lightly placed upon a rock, from which gushed a crystal stream, was represented a nymph handsome and kind, like the fairies or Undines* which in the middle ages still dwelt in the woods and streams of our ancestors, and who were probably only the growth of the ancient mythology, a memorial of the dryads and naiads who visited the happy shepherds of Trinacria (Sicily), in the days of Theocritus or of Moschus. Upon his knees before the good goddess, all resplendent with gold, was depicted a peasant—one of those ideal pastors of the eclogues—imploping peace for Italy, and the end of pestilence and dearth. We learned from the discourse that that good nymph was the Virgin Mary, and the peasant a Piedmontese of Savona, named Antonio Botto, who had the fortune to see that mysterious being, and to hear from her mouth the following words: "Non volo justitiam sed misericordiam." (I require not justice, but mercy.)

Perhaps some one will here say that this is harmless, and at most ridiculous, and nothing here merits my indignation; but consider, and hear a piece of the discourse—"Misericordia ejus a progenie in progeniem." (His mercy is from generation to generation.) On hearing this text I supposed we should have a discourse about the grace of God, and that the preacher would have truly edified us in the faith, as I am sure many members of the Sicilian clergy would have been able and anxious for; but notice what were the two parts of the dissertation:—

I. Mary was the dispenser of grace when she was on earth.

II. And still the treasurer of mercy after she ascended to heaven.

* Properly spirits who were supposed to inhabit the waters.—Tr.

To prove the first part, the preacher put together nearly all the occasions on which the blessed mother of the Saviour is found with her Son, prudently leaving out such as John ii. 4; Mark iii. 35; and Luke xi. 28. The exegesis of the Mariolaters is known, but I had not yet heard it pretended that Mary had part in the institution of the Eucharist. Mark how the preacher proved it. The first miracle, at Cana, represents the new wine of grace which changes fallen nature, and more specially (represents) the dogma of Transubstantiation. Now that miracle was wrought after the prayer of Mary, that all might know she had part in the institution of the Eucharist. I had followed the preacher's reasoning with some surprise, when he undertook to demonstrate the dignity of Mary from the fact that she carried the child into the Temple, and that elsewhere the prophet says, "Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary," or something of that kind. But who would not have been deeply grieved, or rather truly indignant, when he came to the mystery of the cross? "Wherefore, Sirs," said he, "did the Mother of God come to the blood-stained hill of Calvary, except herself to offer her part of the sacrifice. As she had deeked in the cradle of Bethlehem the couch where Divinity celebrated its espousals with our humanity, thus it behoved that she should make ready, so to speak, the victim for sacrifice! When the Son said, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do,' she also prayed the Father, saying, 'O Thou just God, hear and answer the prayer of your Son and of mine!' When the Divine Saviour—thirsting to see the guilty world saved and pardoned—exclaimed, 'Sitio' [I thirst], then, also, the mother—associating herself in the thirst of her Son—requested yet new torments and anguish, that the measure might be full. When the Saviour said to the good robber, 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise,' she was on the side where he was fastened up, that it might appear that, by the intercession of the mother of mercy, he had obtained pardon! When, in fine, the sacrifice was consummated, she turned to God and said, 'O God, if the sufferings of your Son and of mine are not sufficient, lo, another victim! Spare not the strokes of your wrath, in order that your mercy may more widely extend!' But a word had yet to proceed from the mouth of the Son to establish for ever the grandeur of the mother; adopting, in the person of His disciple, John, the entire Church, He left him His mother, to console her, comfort her, bless her, saying to the disciple, 'Behold thy mother; lady, behold thy son!' Thus was given to the Church and to humanity that mother whom, for so many ages, the people expected and desired. O mother of mercy, sword against the foe, shield in battle, light by night, thou who hast crushed the head of the old serpent, queen of heaven, comfort in death!"

I pass over the second part, in which it was proved that every good and every great thing, and all the real progress of modern times, was granted at the intercession of the Virgin Mary, because she is the "co-Redeemer" (corredentrice) of the human race. I dare not express my sentiments; but to alter so absolutely the truth of history, and to associate an imperfect nature in the Divine work of redemption—is not this idolatry, not to use yet stronger language?

The priests have a convenient saying, that the Virgin Mary does not set up a mediation opposed to that of her Son; which is pure falsehood, for if Jesus Christ is our Mediator before God, and the Virgin our mediatrix before Christ, as a preacher said of whom I asked, to whom should sinners apply? To the Son, terrible and holy, who sits upon a throne, and will soon come to judge the world? or to the good mother, who, as he said again, combines in herself all the attributes of woman, who was created for love, and who never lacks sympathy, even though she may want power and understanding? A proverb says that, "What you love in a man is his goodness;" God is holy, but the Virgin is the good mother, and the people prefer her. Yes, with such teachers, the people cannot but trust in the creature before the Creator, and fall into idolatry. Say what they will, it is idolatry with the multitude; and I would that at least a few sincere Italian priests would protest against such excesses. They tell me that among the Cruciferi of Italy there are some worthy of praise, who present to the dying the sacrifice and mercy of Christ in a profitable and consoling way, so as to merit their name of Cruciferi (crossbearers). Let us hope that God has in this dense darkness a sincere people, who seek and serve the Saviour; but appearances are bad, and for a generous, intelligent, and excitable people like the Sicilians, there needs a clergy that should abandon the tatters of a religion of sense, of images and processions, to move decisive war against lying, ignorance, and sloth, and lay hold on the anchor of the Gospel, that new force so needed by a people that now praises liberty; men like Girard. . . . I will not conclude without speaking of the preaching of the Dominican father, Maggio, cousin of Crispi, my deacon, who, in warm and sincere accents, recommends virtue to his fellow-citizens. . . . The preacher has a true love for his country, knows its beauty and worth, and will be able to make a deep impression on the masses. . . . Adieu, dear brother. May our Lord give to every sincere soul to find the one thing needful!—Your affectionate

GERMANY.

TWO WORKS OF APOLOGETICAL DIVINITY.

Frankfort, July 15, 1861.

It is impossible thoroughly to comprehend the state of religion and of the Church in Germany, unless we are familiarised, in some degree, with the theology of this country. It will not therefore be inappropriate, by means of these letters, to introduce, from time to time, the readers of Evangelical Christendom into this department of learning. We can do so by placing it within the reach of all cultivated men. This will be the more opportune at a time when England, like France and Holland, is agitated by the reproduction of Germanic systems which have already gone by on this side the Rhine. Let the Christians of these foreign countries be re-assured: the antidote will come to them from the same quarter as the poison—a profound apology for Christianity from the same source as the attacks upon Divine truth. The theological literature of Germany is already rich in works which have victoriously effected a breach in the fortresses of error, and every day makes this the more apparent.

I wish to-day to call your attention to two publications, which have just been added to this arsenal of spiritual arms. The first is a collective production, which has been called forth at Basle by the attacks of infidelity upon Divine revelation. Six theologians—whom we might, without fear, oppose to your seven Essayists of Oxford—have, in a series of lectures, united their learning and their talents to vindicate the profound affirmations of a sound philosophy and of faith, against those negations which are based only on Pantheism and Materialism. These six apologists are—Dr. Auberlen, Professor at the University of Basle, already favourably known by various writings—in particular, by a celebrated work upon Daniel and the Apocalypse; M. Gess, Professor at the Missionary Institute of Basle, author of a learned treatise on the person of Christ; M. Preisswerk, a distinguished Orientalist, and Chief Pastor (Antistes) of the church at Basle; M. Riggensbach, a professor at the University, who, after having been himself delivered from the abyss of Pantheism, has glorified Him, whom of old he denied, by a noble book upon the life of Jesus Christ; M. Staehelin, a licentiate in theology and a pastor, author of a life of Calvin; and M. Stookmeyer, a distinguished pastor and preacher. The first serial number of these lectures has just appeared, under the title of "Defence of the Christian Faith" (Zur Verantwortung des Christlichen Glaubens). This is not merely an erudite apology for Christianity, designed only for the professionally-learned, but, at the same time, the living word of faith, giving account of itself in the presence of a mixed public. The practical value of the work is the greater, inasmuch as the objections of unbelieving science having penetrated into the different classes of society, it becomes important that Christian science should likewise find its way thither, in order to refute them. Thus, M. Gess, in treating of nature and of God, brings under review, in a lively manner, all that is indefensible and contradictory in Pantheism and Materialism, the folly of which he lashes with a cutting irony. M. Riggensbach speaks of faith as of a deep want of the human soul, whilst refuting the objections drawn from a superficial view of our relations with the created world. M. Staehelin retraces, in striking lineaments, the fact of sin, resting his conclusions on the testimony, both of history and conscience. M. Auberlen, in investigating the principles of Paganism and of Judaism, gives a history of religious and philosophical ideas before the time of Christianity. Each thus fulfils his own task, and, according to a preconcerted plan, they draw their demonstrations, not from revelation—which they do not suppose yet to be admitted—but from experience, and from the intimate wants of our moral nature. It will be only in the succeeding numbers of their lectures that the authors will approach the great fact of positive revelation.* It is sufficient for to-day that I have pointed out to your readers this important work, and expressed the wish that an English translation may soon place it within their reach.

The other publication of which I have to speak is of a still higher character. It is a work of Dr. Auberlen, who has just published the first volume of a book entitled "Divine Revelation: an Apologetical Essay." After having, in a luminous introduction, accurately laid down and defined the question of a positive, supernatural, miraculous revelation, which pre-supposes faith in a living and personal God, the author establishes the historic fact of such a revelation, taking for his starting-point only those books of the Bible the authenticity of which is acknowledged even by the most negative critic. This historical study, based upon those biblical documents which are unassailed, constitutes the first part of the book. The fact thus established by the most irrefragable historic testimony, the author seeks, in his second part, to justify it in the eyes of reason. "Here," says he, "we must, before everything, resolve the metaphysical question of the possibility of miracles—that is, we must demonstrate that a supernatural revelation is not in contradiction with any true idea of God and of the world in their mutual relations. And not only so, for, in taking account of the nature and object of revelation, we shall become convinced of its necessity—revelation being the specific and indispensable means of bringing back humanity and the world to their original destination and the will of God. Thus, the reality of revelation will become to us clear and intelligible, in proportion as we shall acknowledge, in its developments and in its rational plan, the realisation of the Divine purpose, in regard to the world—the hidden wisdom, which God had ordained before the world to our glory."

Thus, to an historical is appended a theoretical and rational demonstration, "for," says the author, "Divine revelation does not impose itself upon us like an external authority, which we are bound blindly to believe; although given in a supernatural manner, it is not alien to our own spirits, but just as it is applicable to our practical wants, as the true life, so does it commend itself to our understandings as the true light—as the supreme truth and the supreme wisdom. (John i. 4, xiv. 6; 1 Cor. i. 30; Coloss. ii. 2, 3.)

"In recognising and proving this intimate feature of revelation, we defend it in the most effectual manner against the attacks of which it is the object in our days on the part of Rationalism. But to produce this defence, it is needful thoroughly to know the adversary. This is why, between the two parts of our work that we have just indicated, it is needful to insert such a description of Rationalism as shall enable us to comprehend its nature, unveil its errors, appreciate its signification, and show how it has been vanquished by a science which does not stop short of a living and profound knowledge of revelation.

"Thus, this work will consist of three parts, of which the first will be biblical, the second historical, the third dogmatical (or speculative)—in other words, thesis, antithesis, and synthesis."

The first volume, which is now before us, contains the first two of these parts—that is to say, the biblical demonstration, and the history of the controversy of which revelation has been the subject, especially in Germany, from the Reformation to our own times. If the one is fitted to produce the most unmovable Christian conviction in all minds which do not knowingly resist the truth, the other possesses the most special interest for foreigners, for it is the true history of German theology during the last three centuries, fully delineated by a hand eminently competent. As for men who find themselves kept at a distance from revelation by metaphysical difficulties, and Christians who feel the necessity of being able to give account, theoretically, of the principles of their faith—it is to such that the third part, of which we cannot yet judge, will be addressed.

We shall have occasion again to refer to this important work, the opportune character of which, in our days, cannot be overlooked by any one. God grant that more than one sincere spirit, experiencing the torments of doubt, may find in this book an enlightened friend, who shall lead them to the feet of Him who alone can say, "I am the light of the world."

* The second number has appeared: the subjects of it have already been indicated to your readers in the Christendom of July, p. 449.

THE ELBERFELD REVIVAL.

TESTIMONY OF EYE-WITNESSES.

[The following article contains the substance of a letter in the Christlicher Volksbote aus Basel: it includes some interesting facts respecting the Orphan House at Elberfeld, gives some new details concerning the late remarkable work of God in that institution, and adds materially to our means of judging of that gracious event. The decision of the seven pastors has been already announced in our number for June (p. 261); but the following details have not before appeared in this country.]

It was near the end of April that we conversed about the revivals at Elberfeld, but our conversation was interrupted. An interrupted and unfinished conversation about a weighty matter always leaves behind an uneasy, and even painful, feeling. If we cannot say what we have to say, our friend has an imperfect and, perhaps, false impression of our meaning, and an unpleasant misunderstanding may come of it. We both wished to pursue the subject, but did not meet with one another. Time glides away, and I must take my pen to supply what has been omitted. I therefore write to complete the conversation, and I can do it the more confidently, that since the Elberfeld Zeitung contained its report, other evidence has been adduced, which is yet more unsuspicious. I allude to the testimony of the seven pastors of Elberfeld, upon the Revival in the Orphan House, which has been confirmed by the provincial synod. These clergymen have not appeared in their official capacity, because they have no official connexion with the Church in the Orphan House, but out of a desire that this affair, so much misrepresented and misunderstood, might be made truly known.

The communication of the seven pastors—Barnes, Dr. Hassencamp, Köllner, Kraft, Künzel, Liechtenstein, and Rink—first gives us a short history of the Orphan House, which makes us better acquainted with the much-talked-of institution, so that we comprehend some circumstances more perfectly.

In 1849, after the storm of revolution had passed away, the destroying angel of cholera appeared at Elberfeld. By this many were made orphans, and the urgent need for an orphan-house became apparent. Hereupon benevolence applied both hand and heart to the work, and in a short time 42,000 dollars were freely contributed. With the exception of a few dollars, this sum was subscribed by the Evangelical community. Subsequently, certain legacies were given to the institution, chiefly with the understanding that the administration should be Evangelical. Yet these wishes were so far disregarded, that, contrary to the counsel of wise men, the institution was framed, not as an ecclesiastical and confessional one, but as one purely civic. It was therefore, like other civic institutions, under the direction of the civil authorities, and no clergyman had place or voice in it. All questions relating to the work of education, and the moral and religious training of the children, were decided without the clergy. Yet the exclusion of the Church officially, did not imply that the Christian spirit was to be shut out of the house, which, from its foundation, continued under diverse Christian influences. The direction, moreover, has included some religious laymen, as the president of the Rhenish Missionary Society, Dr. Keetmann, who held the direction with zeal, and in a Christian spirit. He has been succeeded by Mr. Grafe since 1860, who also is a man of decided Christian character, and the founder of the Elberfeld Dissenting Church, of which the minister is Kolbrügge.

The direction thus carried on, has, in accordance with the statutes, not encroached on the civic jurisdiction, but exerted its influence mostly in the employment of the masters. The most decided Christian men have been appointed to this office. Till 1856, the master was Klöpfel, who laboured with great zeal, devotion, and success. His excellent successor died after being one year in office. In 1858, Christian Klug, till now the master, was appointed. He is a man whose character as a Christian teacher stands very high, and who consecrates all his rare gifts to his important work.

Towards the end of last year the Royal Government at Düsseldorf undertook to inspect the benevolent institutions at Elberfeld, and the report passes a high encomium upon the Orphan Asylum. To the excellent position which the institution has attained, this circumstance has also contributed—that only those persons were appointed as managers or overseers of the children, who encouraged the hope that their influence would be altogether of a Christian character. Besides, the Orphan House is erected in a most favourable situation. The noble building stands a mile from the town, near a group of houses called Arrenberg.

which is distinguished for its Christian associations. The numerous believers there, of the Evangelical and Lutheran Churches, have long been intimately allied, and they unite in regular meetings, at which pastors of both Churches are present and preside.

Elberfeld has, of late years, through Divine visitations, acquired something which ministers to its religious life, and that has also extended its influence to the Orphan House. In 1859, the cholera attacked it again with violence; and while many places in the vicinity were exempt, about 1,000 persons died in the town. The Orphan House, although disease had shown itself close at hand, was wholly untouched; but it had to receive an addition of eighty children, whose parents had died of cholera—so that the number in the house rose to almost 300. The destroying angel was a messenger from God, who brought many to Him. Men felt that the Lord was nigh: and of an evening thousands crowded to the night services, which were held in the churches, and many hearts were deeply moved. Regular prayer-meetings were then begun, and many were awakened, happily without much notice from without. The week of prayer, at the beginning of last year, again awakened a prayerful spirit: especially in a remote part of the parish, where much rudeness and poverty prevailed, there was apparent a decided disposition to hear God's Word, and a prayer-room was there built to hold religious meetings in, because an ordinary room could not hold the thronging multitudes.

Another event also added to the religious life in Elberfeld in a blessed manner. The two great Evangelical communities of Elberfeld, numbering about 400,000 souls—the Lutheran and the Reformed—had, till within these few years, in accordance with the confessional tendencies of the time, been at a distance from one another, and that had led to some differences; but now their relations had become friendly, and they co-operated for the common good, although all expectation was abandoned that any should give up, or think little of, their own peculiarities of doctrine. A common hall has been purchased by members of both Churches, for promoting the unfettered combination of the Christian citizens, and for the purposes of the home mission. The most influential members of the two Churches, and their pastors, have here openly given the hand of love to one another.

In the large hall of this building, when the week of prayer was again observed this year, thousands came together; and it was, indeed, a cheering sight to see united there persons of all ranks, high and low, rich and poor, to call on God for the extension of His kingdom and the revelation of His grace. Every one was allowed to speak, and yet there was no confusion, no impropriety, no obtrusiveness; no one wished to plead for a particular church or section of Christendom, and yet the prayers were mostly for special objects.

Naturally these movements must have had some influence in the Orphan House. But it is expressly noticeable that in the house itself, in which alone now the revival makes itself known, there has been no exclusiveness in the tone and character of the education and regulations.

The ministers testify that, when they visited the house, they never encountered anything which showed the prevalence of any enforcement of a mere outward form of Christianity; on the contrary, they always received the impression that the children led a free and joyous life. Much attention was paid to their bodily welfare, as appeared by the gymnastic exercises every evening under the conduct of the superintendent. The director was also careful to promote the happiness of the children in their youthful enjoyments. In August last a railway excursion was organised for their amusement. The reproach which has fallen upon the director and superintendent, of the revivals being the result of a deeply-laid plan, and a systematic action upon their feelings, is, in the opinion of the clergy, utterly unfounded. Those who visited the house before the revival might have learned better from the happy faces of the children.

As I said: at the beginning of this year, the week of prayer was observed extensively at Elberfeld, and earnest prayer-meetings were held at Arrenberg. Petitions were offered for the Orphan House, where many of the children at the time caused much anxiety by their perverseness. And lo! the spirit of prayer entered mightily into the house—and especially after this refractoriness, and opposite disposition, showed itself in some of them. One Sunday in January the boys were forbidden to go out, which led to sundry demonstrations of disobedience. But a mightier came, and on the next day there was a deep feeling of sin, and an impulse to pray in many of the boys; and indeed already, in the week preceding, some of the girls had made known to the superintendent their souls' trouble.

As soon as many of the children exhibited unusual concern for their souls, the superintendent (Klug) informed the president of the direction (Mr. Grafe), who rejoiced from his heart at the communication, and regarded the manifestation as an answer to his prayer. He authorised Klug to hold prayer-meetings in the house, at first only for such of the elder children as felt the special need of prayer. But already the spirit of prayer was awakened among the boys, and had brought together for prayer such of them as were seized with care for their souls. About the end of January some sixteen boys desired to meet for prayer, and a room was allowed them, where, in the presence of an inspector, they might call upon the Lord. To the general prayer-meeting for the elder boys, on January 31, there came thirty boys, and as many girls who felt impelled thereto.

From February 1, however, the movement took hold of the children generally in an extraordinary way. Full of pain and sorrow for their sins, the children lingered for some one to pray for them, and prayed themselves for grace. To not a few of them came peace and joy after some days, so that they praised and blessed the Lord. But among these a powerful spirit of prayer displayed itself, so that they were impelled to pray for other and un-awakened children. In the whole house was revealed the power of an extraordinary spiritual working, so that the children collectively, and the inwardly resisting, were alike seized and bowed down by it.

But the spiritual movement was also accompanied by agitations of the body, and the frail earthly vessel felt powerfully the inward commotion. Some of the boys and girls lost for a short time the use of speech; others felt themselves only bodily weak and feeble; and others showed convulsive movements of the arms and feet; but no one of the children lost his consciousness. From the middle of February physical affections occurred less often, and the whole movement took thenceforward a stiller character.

During this time the abovenamed seven pastors often visited the Orphan House, and have now published what they saw with their own eyes, and heard with their own ears. Pastor Künzel says: "I found many children lying upon their beds in the deepest and most evident bodily agitation, and I spoke a short, simple word of evangelical comfort to them. Nor have I, so far as my memory goes, ever seen such deep, holy anxiety in any youthful countenances, as met me here. I saw no sign of extravagant over-straining, and the countenance of a repentance forgetting all that is earthly, and reaching to the inmost soul, still seems to be before my eyes.

"In the large hall of the Orphan House, I found afterwards a company of perhaps 120 children, with their guardians, collected for prayer. I remained at the entrance. A boy was engaged in prayer; after him another prayed, and then a third. They were prayers which awoke my deep wonder—simple, child-like, ardent, scriptural, in the spirit of faith, and mostly in appropriate expressions."

Pastor Rink says he visited the Orphan House on February 7, to see the awakened children, among whom he had some candidates for confirmation.

"In the dormitory which I entered there were about forty children in bed, in consequence of the feeling of weakness, but I saw very few in convulsions. One of my candidates for confirmation came to me with a beaming countenance, saying, 'I am another being, pastor; the Lord Jesus has forgiven my sins.'"

When about a-half hour later he visited a dormitory of the girls, some five were in bed. "We had scarcely been some moments in the room, when we heard in the adjoining boys' chamber one of the boys in prayer: he was sixteen or seventeen years old, and heretofore one of the most perverse in the house. He prayed with such power, calmness, and fervour for other children who had not yet found peace, that it went through me. There was nothing excited or stormy in the prayer, but I have seldom heard any so full, so well-arranged, and truly beautiful and trustful; it was like a quiet stream. We also heard another younger boy in prayer, who besought the Lord for another in a simple and childlike manner: 'Dear Saviour, behold, N— is still so hardened and bound by Satan; have mercy on him, and convert him to Thyself!' I left the house with the strong conviction, here is a noble work of God!"

"Of the four children," he observes, "who belonged to my catechumens, two were among those awakened, and I have recently often noticed them, and spoken alone with them. Both of these were physically affected, and both give good promise of constancy."

Pastor Hassencamp, as visitor, had an especial interest in the proceedings. "I cannot deny," says he, "that I entered the house with some prejudice against the movement. I feared it had been called up by a fanatical urging to repentance, which is so contrary to my in most being. The superintendent calmed me by the information that nothing special had been done to produce the movement, and assured me that the whole affair had been conducted with the utmost quietness, and, therefore, strangers were not admitted to the children."

He visited the girls' room with Rink, and was equally astonished by the prayer above-named. "We heard," he says, "a voice praying with ever-growing power, and I have scarcely heard a more simple, beautiful, and stirring prayer. I was so taken, that I involuntarily joined in it. On my asking who was praying, the superintendent's wife told me it was a boy." He was so struck with what he heard, that he went into the room to see. There he found seven boys, and on inquiring of the one named if he had been praying, was answered in the affirmative. In one of the beds lay an older boy in convulsions, and for him the prayer had been made. While he was there the convulsions continued, and the one who had been praying called upon another, "Pray for Peter." A boy about twelve years old hereupon rose from his bed, knelt down, and offered a simple, childlike prayer, wherein he inserted some passages of Scripture. "From this room," says Hassencamp, "I passed into a large hall, where thirty or forty boys lay in bed, some asleep, and some awake, many of them clearly much exhausted. I sought out one of my catechumens, and found in him so deep a conviction of sin, that I could not doubt that the Lord had wrought upon him by His Holy Spirit."

Pastor Lichtenstein says: "I visited the Orphan House on February 8th. I found in the boys' dormitory about twenty-five on their beds, and with few exceptions in convulsions. While the paroxysms lasted the children presented an appearance of great agitation, sighing and crying out with all the symptoms of strong inward anguish; but amid all these unusual circumstances, the peculiar character of the phenomenon made itself apparent. The boys, with perhaps two exceptions, were all conscious; they stretched out their hands to me; I had to go calming, comforting, and encouraging, from one bed to another. Here I cannot suppress an observation which seemed to me of great significance for the decision of the case. That which exclusively moved the children was anxiety about their salvation, and they did not seek to find peace by striving after joyful emotions, but thirsted mostly for the consolation of the Word of God, and seemed to find an alleviation of their condition when they found the same written in the Scriptures.

"Here, one child showed me the first verse of Psalm xlii., and thereby indicated himself; while yonder, others went from their beds to one another, and gave their united attention to a subject. It was nothing else than a text which a boy had found and showed to the rest as a costly pearl, to which the earnest thoughts of all were directed. Again, I was called to others, and as I exhibited to them single promises of grace, and sought to bring them nearer to their youthful comprehension, their countenances beamed with joy, and they clapped their hands to indicate the impression which the Word made upon them. As the consciousness of the children was a consciousness of sin and guilt alone, their whole desire was for pardon, on the ground of the Divine promises in the Word, and the main point in their prayers. I was witness of this, when that evening, out of the unrest of sighing and lamenting, a childish voice was raised in prayer, praying in brief words, on the ground of an anguished heart, only for the pardon of sin, the removal of guilt, and the creation of a new heart. At a second visit I found the children calm and with no excitement of joy."

Pastor Kraft also visited the Orphan House in those days, to call upon a candidate for confirmation, and came again a week later. He then went into a room where about twenty children lay upon their beds. "The boys," he says, "who mostly knew me, regarded me with a friendliness which much struck me. Instead of seeing, as I expected, a crowd of boys in extraordinary convulsions and excitement, I beheld an assemblage, some of whom had lost the use of speech, though not of eyesight, but there was manifested unmistakably an emotion of joy. I saw how some boys who could not speak, busied themselves with writing, and one such pencil correspondence was shown me. It ran thus: 'Canst thou say that the Lord Jesus has forgiven thy sins?' Answer: 'Yea, I can say it.' Among the boys who lay in bed, I found one not a resident pupil in the house, who, having come to the house to fetch something, was so overpowered by the spirit which prevailed there, that he could not leave the institution. His master a dear man well known to me, stood by his bed, and encouraged his pupil from the Word of God. He afterwards told me how much trouble this scholar had caused him, and the now a happy and unlooked-for change, it which he heartily rejoiced, had taken place. As I went round the beds, where I gave my hand to the boys without saying anything, a scrap of paper was handed me, with a request that I would engage in prayer. I could not, on several grounds, immediately manage to comply with this request. When I saw that the evening meal was brought in, I did not attend to the desire expressed. Hereupon a boy prayed, 'Dear Lord Jesus, we thank Thee for this food; grant us that we may also soon return again to our labours.' Of the girls who were indisposed I heard nothing, but soon after entered the large dining-hall, where all the girls, about 100 in number, had concluded their evening repast. There dwelt on the countenances of most of the children the expression of a joyful and earnest spirituality—a truly festival emotion. I saw no mark of any derangement of the regulations of the house; everything I saw followed the ordinary course."

Four girls of the Orphan House were catechumens of Pastor Kraft, and two attended his instructions for children. Almost two months after his previous communication, he writes to the effect that the happy effect upon these was still apparent, and had been most beneficial to the rest of his class.

The preparatory instructions of Pastor Köllner, of the Lutheran Church, had relation to twenty-three children from the Orphan House—boys and girls. Let us hear what he says in his account, written on March 5: "While I had previously almost incessant reason to lament the lack of seriousness and attention in almost all my pupils of this class, I must say that the children from the Orphan House have become remarkably more serious and attentive, and that several of them now follow the instruction with the desire for salvation. This happy change came about during the well-known movement at the Orphan institution."

Pastor Barner was, during the first four weeks of the awakening, prevented from attendance by illness and absence. On his return he found that two of his catechumens had been awakened to life. Three months before he had had to send back one of these from confirmation. From this one the following letter was received: "Dearest Pastor,—The Lord Jesus has had pity upon us in the Orphan House, and has vouchsafed unto us His Holy Spirit. I have experienced this love, and He has taken away my stony, rocky heart. O how much more excellent is life in Christ Jesus, than life in darkness! He who has experienced this can praise and give thanks. O that this grace might run through the whole Wupperthal, and this love be known in every family! Where, before, there was cursing and reviling the name of God, there is now praise; and out of many hearts now come praise and thanks, and we hear the beautiful verse:—

Ach, was hör ich? Gnade, gnade, &c.
(Oh, what hear I? Grace, grace, &c.)

I think how I have grieved Him by my unruliness, and I think how I might pray for pardon, and I will pray to God for forgiveness. I am too exhausted, and therefore could not come for instruction, but may I ask you to visit me once?" Three weeks later, Mr. Barner saw no reason to doubt the change of this boy by the grace of God.

Another of his catechumens was known to Pastor Barner, before his entrance into the Orphan House, as an abandoned boy, deadened to Divine things by sin. "His awakening," says the pastor, "is, to my mind, a special miracle of grace. His concern for his soul, expressed in conversation to me afterwards, when he was in the hospital for rheumatism, was throughout indicative of sincerity, and filled my heart with praise and joy towards the Lord, who had pitied this lost one and kept him hitherto."

Of three orphan girls who attended his catechising and had been awakened—two of them had had conversions—the said minister can testify most favourably.

Moreover, the teacher Pistor—who is placed in the Arrenberg School, which is attended by the orphan children—offers his testimony. He says that the revival among the orphans with him, called forth at the outset a joyful movement. He was often an eye and an ear witness of the great things God had done in some. "Several," he says, "whom I had often sighed over before their awakening, because of their frivolity and disobedience, are now among the most attentive, obedient, and scrupulous. What could previously only be dragged out of them by threats or rebuke, is now gained by a look or a nod. They are now very attentive to their behaviour, and exercise a good influence on their fellow-scholars. In case they notice disobedience in others, they recall it to mind in various ways. The love of Christ moves them to obedience, and to seek the welfare of their companions. This love to the Lord expresses itself in a special manner by the love of the awakened for one another, and for me. A peculiar trait of many is their integrity: lying and dissembling are held in abhorrence.

Mr. Pistor says that with one boy in the Orphan House he had a conversation of this kind: "What makes you so joyful?—I have found peace. (The boy had been in great distress.) Do you then love the Lord Jesus? The reply was in the affirmative, with a smile upon the boy's countenance. Why do you love Him?—Because He has heard my prayer. What have you prayed for?—Peace." "One evening," he adds, "I heard some children who were collected together praying. They prayed the Lord for a new heart, pardon of sin, the Holy Ghost, &c. One of the children also prayed in a childlike manner for the superintendent, and then for the teacher, and that there might be made known to them the Word of God aright and applied to their hearts. Especially lovely was the prayer of a Catholic girl, who gave thanks aloud; and said, 'Jesus is our only Mediator ;

He only can forgive our sins—Jesus alone !'"

This, dear friend, is a series of facts, from the mouth of good witnesses, affording important aid for deciding upon this orphan-house business. There lie hidden here deep Christian mysteries, and there come from childish hearts glances of light from the fullness of grace and truth, which do the heart good : but hard by lie thickly black shadows and terrible riddles. It is as if the borders of the two realms of light and darkness met here. To some it supplies only a disagreeable article for a journal, and they fancy they can decide this, unhappily, very complicated affair, set forth with misrepresentation and ill-feeling, the cause of passion and offence, but which can also supply both instruction and warning. You see I am not ready with what I wanted to say, and, therefore, for the present, I am, &c.*

CHINA.

Fuhchau, China, May, 1861.

IMPORTANCE OF PRAYER FOR NATIVE HELPERS IN THE MISSIONARY WORK.

I am led by the vast importance of the subject to send you a few thoughts on prayer in behalf of native helpers in the missionary work in China.

Prayer in behalf of foreign missionaries, of native converts to Christianity in foreign lands, of Christian schools among the heathen, and of the heathen generally, is very common among Christians in Western countries. But I fear that special prayer for the native helpers as a class, labouring for the conversion of their heathen countrymen, is rarely offered. The subject of prayer for native helpers is one of great general importance, considered with reference to the progress of the cause in every missionary field. But I shall briefly present the subject viewed from China as my standpoint. For I feel that there are some grave considerations, some special reasons, why frequent and fervent prayer on behalf of native helpers in China should be offered by the Church.

NATIVE HELPERS, UNDER GOD, THE MAIN HOPE FOR CHINA.

China is so immense and so populous, its distance from England and America (the present centres of interest in the missionary cause) so great, and the necessary expenses of foreign missionaries so large and so constant, that it is idle to expect the Evangelization of the empire by the labour of foreigners. And besides, the number of missionaries, and of candidates for the missionary work in this land, is immensely inadequate. The Church, at least in the present state of her zeal in the cause of missions, has neither the men nor the money she is willing to spare for the work in China. Can she send and support annually several scores or hundreds, not to say thousands, of her sons and daughters to labour in this empire for Jesus? No; China must be saved by the Divine blessing resting principally on the labours of her own converted sons and daughters. Native preachers, under God, are her main hope. How important, then, that suitable persons should be raised up at the right time and place, and in sufficient numbers, to meet the growing demands of the work—to respond to the loud call of Providence for more labourers in this empire! Is it reasonable and consistent to believe that the Evangelization of China will be achieved without the importunate and effectual prayers of the Church in behalf of the native agents or instruments in the work? Are the present or the future missionaries in this land, on whom will devolve the responsibility of selecting, training, and superintending the native helpers, sufficient for such a responsibility, unaided by the sympathies and the prayers of

* A subsequent paper is promised, but has not yet come to our hands.

Western Christians, poured out before God in behalf of these helpers?

PRECEDENT IN CHINA.

"As the twig is bent, the tree is inclined," is an old adage, which has a moral application of peculiar significance and force in such an empire as China, where custom and precedent are generally more powerful than law, or than right. The foundations should be properly laid if the superstructure is to be firm and durable; a low standard of piety and devotion to the work, in those who are the first, or among the first, to be employed as native helpers (including under that term catechists, readers, colporteurs, and preachers), would be a calamity to be peculiarly dreaded and deprecated in this empire. Now, may not, should not, a deep and permanent interest be taken in this matter, by those, at the least, who are co-workers in the promotion of the cause of missions in this land? Ought they not, and will they not, offer up special and frequent prayer in behalf of native helpers in China, in view of the transcendent importance of rightly beginning, as well as of rightly continuing, the work, so far as the instrumentality of Chinese Christians is concerned?

THEIR PECULIAR DIFFICULTIES.

While there is nothing like the India caste, nor anything like the animosity which prevails in Turkey, between rival sects of a spurious or degenerated Christianity, or between the Moslems and the so-called Christians, to be encountered in China by native helpers, there are several things, of a very trying and formidable character, against which these helpers have to contend, and over which they must have much grace in order to triumph. I will mention only two.

One is the opprobrium which springs from rejecting the teachings of the ancient sages. To cast aside Confucianism for Christianity, is little short of treason in the estimation of the learned Chinese. In China it is exceedingly popular to praise the ancient classics, and to profess adherence to their maxims. To exalt the doctrines of Jesus above the maxims of Confucius and Mencius, and to teach them as the only proper and sufficient rule of life on the part of the natives of this country, is regarded as almost synonymous with rebellion against the empire. A common and very odious charge against the native helpers is that they have turned their backs upon the sages of their own country, and have submitted to foreigners.

Again: To espouse the religion of Jesus involves the disuse of the ancestral tablet, which act is reckoned a crime against nature, subjecting them to the charge of filial impiety, or want of proper love for their parents and reverence for their memory. To teach men that they should by no means worship the tablet, but on every account worship Jesus, brings down upon the native helpers great and peculiar reproach. This kind of reproach—that of being undutiful and unfilial, though and when they know they are not—it is exceedingly difficult for them to bear. They are ever ready to repel the taunt, and to show the real nature of filial piety, and the compatibility of rejecting the ancestral tablet with the truest affection for their parents, and the profoundest reverence for their memory.

Those who are most acquainted with the peculiarities of Chinese mind and Chinese society, are best able to understand the opprobrium, both in kind and degree, which grows out of rejecting the doctrines of the ancient sages and the ancestral tablet. But it is believed that every reader can gain, from the brief statement here made, some adequate conception of the peculiar difficulties which native helpers must meet in the proclamation of the Gospel among their countrymen. May the pious reader forget not to lift up, often and earnestly, his heart in prayer to God on their behalf!

DANGER OF PRIDE.

I will merely refer to a temptation of great magnitude, which native helpers have to struggle against in this land—a kind of pride or self-conceit, growing out of the change in their social condition, which occurs when they begin to labour directly and publicly as assistants in the missionary work. Supported by foreign funds, and openly connected with foreigners; coming to no inconsiderable extent under the protection of foreigners, and being frequently in their society, and having their friendship, confidence, and sympathy, there is danger, very great danger, in the very nature of things, lest they fail of being as meek and humble while labouring among their countrymen as they ought to be, in order to their highest success and usefulness. They are set up by foreigners as teachers of their countrymen, reproving them for their vices, their idolatries, their superstitions, &c. This naturally begets a feeling of self-importance, especially as there is nothing similar in social life in China. They are a new and distinct class, so to speak, with certain peculiar privilege. They are not responsible to their countrymen.

for the manner in which they discharge their duties, nor do they look to them for their salaries. It is not difficult to perceive how much grace they must have to be kept humble, and to exhibit, in this change in their social condition, the spirit of the meek and lowly Saviour, as they engage in labours for the salvation of their countrymen.

But it is time to close. More might be said on this subject; enough, however, has been said to indicate the importance of special prayer for native helpers, employed in the missionary work in China. The knowledge that such prayer is often and earnestly offered by the Church, would greatly encourage the missionaries in the work of training and superintending them. It would stimulate the helpers to greater fidelity in labouring among their countrymen, in struggling against their peculiar temptations, and in hearing, with a Christlike spirit, the various peculiar reproaches heaped upon them. And, above all, who can doubt—for God is the Hearer and the Answerer of the special and importunate cries of His people—that it would result in the bestowment upon them of signal grace from the Giver of all spiritual mercies, and thus largely accelerate the spread of the Gospel among the hundreds of millions of heathen in this Empire?

AN AMERICAN MISSIONARY.

JAMAICA.

THE FULL TRUTH A DESIDERATUM—THE JAMAICA REVIVAL: ITS ORIGIN AND PROGRESS—THE DIVINE WORK AND ITS COUNTERFEIT—NATIVE SUPERSTITION AND FALSE PROPHETS—FANATICISM DYING OUT—STONY-GROUND HEARERS NUMEROUS—GOOD DONE OVER-ESTIMATED—NATIVE DEFICIENCIES.

(From a Missionary.)

Savanna-la-Mar, Jamaica, June 14, 1861.

..... Your words, "The Christians of Great Britain seek to know the trials as well as the triumphs—the dark as well as the bright spots, which are daily surveyed by the eye of the missionary," &c., are so different from the very plain hints so often received, to induce us to give the best side only, in writing home, and to leave the worst to be unknown to the unreflective, and to be inferred simply by those who know human nature in every land is fallen, debased, and polluted, that I rejoice in the improved state of right feeling they present. I believe that truth—full and stern truth, good and bad—should be wisely stated in letters from the field of action and observation, and in speeches by returned missionaries and deputations, who have been in foreign lands. Should your desire be fulfilled, it may tend to give the correct view to secretaries of missionary societies, and to such of the members of committees as have been brought into the Maelstrom of deceptive policy and misnamed charity.

After nearly nine months' experience of the late wonderful "awakening," I would say of it: We have much from it in which we can and do rejoice; much over which we watch with anxiety, and are still in doubt of its genuine character; and much respecting which we lament and mourn, as arising from the machinations of the enemy—to stay, if possible, and mar the mighty work the Spirit has begun.

In the month of October last year, the movement among the dry bones appeared, and the wonderful results reported by many, in Irish and English periodicals, began to be experienced. Every place of worship was overcrowded. Nearly all the population in this and in adjoining parishes desired to hear the Gospel proclaimed. Many felt deeply under the Word. Quarrelsome persons became quiet, drunkards abstainers, swearers feared to utter an oath, the unclean forsook licentious living, and some thousands were united in marriage. Reading the Scriptures, praise, prayer, and preaching, with other religious exercises, became the order of the first period of this awakening. Thousands gave their names to the different churches: penitents seeking salvation, and a great number gave striking evidence of what seemed to us to be a true conversion to God. But soon the unaccountable prostrations were accompanied by terrific contortions of body, insensibility, springing, shouting, madness. Next broke forth the African superstition respecting "Obeah"—i.e., witchcraft—and some daring men declared themselves prophets, appointed by God to dig up Obeah, and root it out of the land. Where this madness of "Myalism" was not quickly checked, it wrought fearful mischief among the ignorant and superstitious people.

Where no wise and influential person was present at the first, to guide, much extravagance and folly appeared, and soon we saw the enemy was busy, scattering his wildfire over the awakened districts, and sending his agents to prepare the way for the prevention of good in parts more distant. He managed, too, to set ministers to work to contend with each other, when all should have been joined in one spirit, and had contention only with the workings of the evil one. In many cases the fanaticism spread so rapidly, that ministers had very little power to control or to direct, and, instead of being heard, were denounced as "retarders of God's work," despisers of prophets, and unfit to be regarded as teachers sent by God. But enthusiasm of a fanatical kind has wellnigh passed away from most parts of the island, and is now only nestling for a short season in one or two places in Kingston, and from these we hope it will quickly be swept away.

The change in Westmoreland, in a few, is real, and likely to endure, and an increase to the number of zealous labourers has been obtained. A larger number go on quietly, and as no appearance of falling away is seen, we hope the best, though their first love and zeal are not now manifest. Another part have grown careless, and come but seldom to a place of worship; and some have gone back to the course from which it was hoped they had been rescued. In general we have found those who made the greatest outcry of the least understanding in the knowledge of Divine truth; and very seldom have any of these given a good reason for their excess of feeling manifested while stricken, or assigned any good ground of hope through Christ for the relief they obtained. Many, however, were deeply convinced of sin, and afraid of a coming judgment, and felt deeply under the fear of punishment; they had heard that the Son of God was willing to save, and were filled with joy from the belief that they had gone to Him, and had obtained mercy. Some, however, who a few months ago had those feelings, are now cold, and give painful evidence that they were never "rooted and grounded in love." The root soon came to the rock, and the stalk withered. Some of these have become more hardened in sin, and bolder in the open commission of it, than they were before.

As far as my observation goes, the number of stony-ground hearers is large, and the good produced is not of that extensive character which at first we thought we beheld. The faithful papers which the Rev. D. J. East, and others, have written respecting the "Revival," give a fair view of both sides; and even the prejudiced writers, some of whom have been bitter against the extravagances connected with those affected, and others, who, looking at good only, closed their eyes to the evil, have severely condemned those who exposed it—even these writers are valuable, for they give us truth, though not the whole truth. On the one side we have the very worst that can be told, and on the other the good, in the strongest colouring a regard to truth will bear. From neither of these parties do you get the real state of things, but from both you usually do.

I have read attentively the letters of the Rev. Josiah Cork, and of the Rev. Duncan Fletcher, of the parish of Clarendon, and judge best of the state of revivalism there by believing the things stated by both. You will see then that we have much still to do, to destroy ignorance, and extend knowledge over this island. The "Revival" has been like those in other lands—a mixture of good, with much of remaining evil; it has given to the Church some who manifest the temper and spirit of Jesus; and numbers are seeking instruction, and perceive the darkness of their former state.

We should like to see the people doing more in work for God—showing more independence of spirit—taking more care of the aged and the young—giving more liberally to carry on the worship of God—to educate their children—and showing more feeling for the sick and aged poor. While time is undervalued and wasted, and indolence is indulged in, we cannot stand forth in the beauty of intelligence, liberality, and enlightened piety. Much good has been effected, and much is being done now, and by God's blessing, we may soon see the people free from the shackles of superstition, ignorance, and sin, as they have been freed from those of slavery, oppression, and degrading temporal debasement.

I remain, yours faithfully,

JOHN CLARKE,

AMERICA.

NORTHERN VIEW OF THE WAR—PROFITIOUS PROVIDENTIAL EVENT—RELIGIOUS EFFORTS AMONG THE SOLDIERS—HAPPY RESULTS.

Albany, June 27, 1861.

Considerations of a personal character, in connexion with the hope that I might soon be able to communicate encouraging news, have, for some time, prevented my writing for your excellent, and, to me, very valued periodical; and now, though I cannot speak of the cessation of hostilities, between those who have so long lived and prospered under this benign Government, yet there are some things in connexion therewith which inspire the hope of their happy termination for the cause of freedom, truth, and religion.

Situated, as I am, in one of the great centres of intercourse, which is also a prominent military post, where several regiments have been prepared for the seat of war, I have had good opportunity to watch the expressions of the public mind in relation to this war; and, while I would not for a moment hint that there have not been dispositions displayed which were not in harmony with truth and righteousness, still I am compelled to believe that the vast uprising at the North has sprung from enlightened patriotism, and a regard to freedom and religion.

There was much, very much, on the part of the Southerners, who inaugurated this war, to provoke revenge and retaliation. It is beyond all question true that our national Government has, for many years, been so administered as to favour them, and their peculiar institution—slavery. Nothing was done directly or indirectly against them or the Constitution. "The rebellion began," says a prominent and conservative journalist, "without a shadow of aggression upon the Cotton States; there was nothing, and is nothing, out of which to construct the most worthless apology for it. These States were reposing in possession of every right, a hair of their heads had not been disturbed, they had in their own political party a majority in the Senate, cutting off the possibility of legislation unfriendly to their interests. But, strictly within the forms of the Constitution, a President had been elected in violation, not of their rights, but of their taste—yes, taste; they disliked him, his principles, and his party, and became wilful. Secession is an act of wilfulness; the Confederate States, so-called, are in mere wilfulness organised and armed, to strike down the east of the New World and the hope of the Old, and both will rebuke it." Nevertheless, the spirit which animated the people was not of retaliation and revenge, but devotion to truth, the Government, and God. They felt they had a divinely-instituted Government to sustain; a vast and noble heritage to preserve; just and benignant institutions to uphold; great principles to develop; and an illustrious destiny to fulfil; and feeling thus, they have entered on this conflict with the firm belief that their cause is the cause of God.

This is the widespread and growing conviction at the present time. The excitement incident to the first rush to arms has passed away; but the impression that this war is, on the part of the Northern people, a direful necessity, is stronger than ever, and the determination to make any sacrifice necessary for its successful termination is firmer than ever. Last week I heard the Rev. Dr. Sprague, of this city—who is distinguished alike for wisdom and moderation—say, at the raising of the national flag on his church: "That flag actually floats in homage to the Prince of Peace, inasmuch as it is the emblem of loyalty to a cause in which are pre-eminently bound up the interests of a pure Christianity. With the Government under which we have been reared has been identified the largest measure of religious liberty that any people ever enjoyed; and, under the influence of this matchless boon, has been developed an amount of Christian intelligence and activity, and, I may add, heroic self-denial and endurance, that forms one of the brightest pages of our national history. In prosecuting the contest, then, in which we are now engaged for the maintenance of our Government, we are carrying forward a struggle for peace in a twofold sense—not only to drive the demon of war into the Gulf, but to give a fresh impulse to that blessed religion whose very motto is 'Peace on earth and goodwill to men.' We confidently expect that this storm, like other storms, will purify our atmosphere, and prepare us for a higher degree of national prosperity; while we feel no less assured that the heart and the arm of the Church, instead of being paralysed in the tempest, will emerge from it nerved with fresh strength for spreading the Gospel of Peace wherever there are human beings to see its light or feel its power. We regard our country's cause as the cause of God.

and we have the fullest confidence that He will make it His own, and that we shall have the evidence of this in its being finally triumphant. To what period the final issue may be postponed, or what may be the intervening difficulties, or dangers, or reverses, no mortal wisdom may be able even to conjecture; but that the Government will stand—that the Union, in its substantial integrity, will be preserved through God's gracious interposition in our behalf—we cannot, in the light which now shines around us, so much as doubt." These are, I believe, the sentiments of the Northern people almost universally; and they are warmly expressed by men of all classes who have been distinguished for moderation of sentiment.

Another particular, which I must not omit, is that, as the war advances, we have increasing reason to believe that Providence is controlling its events in favour of the North. Allow me another brief quotation in proof of this advancing conviction. At a large meeting, held a few days since, in the city of New York, a prominent speaker said: "That man has missed the lesson of the hour who does not recognise the Providential element as overwhelming in the events now transpiring, so as almost to crush and smother the human. How can you account for the stupendous folly of those volleys fired at Sumter? How, except in one way, it occurred beneath the permitting Providence of God, which permitted the rebellion of the angels, and the grand apostasy of the race? How can you account for it, that the instant President Lincoln issued his proclamation, a dash was not made on Washington, and that it was not captured, as it might have been? It is a matter of the very smallest consequence at this hour what any civilian on this continent may think or say. The time is come when our greatest men are as straws upon the tide. The nation has united and organised itself, and is now avalanching itself without an organising brain in the civil sphere—avalanching itself upon the foes of its liberties and its peace. President Lincoln went to Washington, feeling his way as blindly as ever a man did in the midst of great historic exigencies. It was the permitting Providence of God, lighting that fuse at Charleston, which vivified the nation, and made it possible for the President to speak with effect by his proclamation. He did not speak one hour too late; he spoke the very hour Providence had given him power to speak with effect. It was God's doings; and marvellous must it be in our eyes. I look with amazement on this grand procession of events. Providence will give us a re-united land, for a new conviction has entered the universal mind within the last few weeks. It is thus that, by the decree of Providence, we are one, and that by our own stout hearts and loyal souls we shall be one."

These healthful and elevating sentiments are, I believe, becoming daily more prevalent and influential; and there is, in consequence, an almost entire absence, at the North, of a malevolent and vindictive spirit; while, on the contrary, there is indulged a tender and compassionate disposition towards those of the South, and prayer often ascends to God for them in our social and more public meetings. The national Government, moreover, is showing them unexampled forbearance and moderation. These are harmonious and hopeful indications, which assure us of a happy result.

One other particular in connexion with this contest will, I am sure, impart gratification to our distant Christian friends. It is the practical solicitude which is cherished for the spiritual welfare of our soldiers, and the religious spirit cherished by many among them. I heard a major in the United States Army, who has spent many years in actual service, say, last Sabbath evening, that he had never before known such provision made for the spiritual necessities of soldiers, or such solicitude manifested before. Never did an army go to battle so spiritually equipped, and attended by so many prayers. In this city a pocket edition of the New Testament was given to every man who needed and would accept it. Several thousands were thus distributed, though many of the companies were previously supplied. The same was done in New York and other cities. Hundreds of thousands of religious tracts have been given to them, besides hymnbooks, &c. Indeed, there has been a righteous emulation to excite among our soldiers a religious spirit. And the effort has not been in vain. Among those who have been stationed here, there have been witnessed some pleasant exhibitions of true piety; and the chaplains of the several regiments speak of the same elsewhere. One says: "We have about one thousand men in our regiment, and among them are quite a number of professing Christians. Those of our men who are not professors of religion are very anxious that prayer-meetings should be held. Last Sabbath evening the Spirit of God was wit-us to a remarkable degree. Such prayers as were then offered, I have seldom heard." Another says: "I presume there are one hundred members of the Church among us of all denominations, who are very earnest Christians. Our prayer-meetings are unusually interesting, and our Sabbath services quite affecting. I say it in grateful praise to God, that I scarcely ever had such marked and decided tokens of success." To God be all the praise, and may His kingdom be greatly extended by the contest which here prevails.

PROPOSED WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE YEAR 1862.

[The following circular is issued by the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance:]

The voice of God in providence and in grace once more loudly calls His Church to Prayer—united, universal prayer. Who can estimate the spiritual blessings bestowed, in answer to the petitions sent up, since the watchword from Leodiana first roused us to prayer? May we not gratefully connect with those petitions the effusion of the Spirit on so many parts of the world, the great number of converts gathered to Christ, and the quickened spiritual life of the Church?—"Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain, whereby Thou didst confirm Thine inheritance when it was weary."

The state of the world supplies matter for fervent intercession; and the present aspect of the Church should call forth our thanksgivings, and quicken our supplications. In view, especially, of the unhappy differences among Christians, and of the various assaults of Infidelity upon our Bible, our Sabbath, and our Christianity, it befores us, as having sworn allegiance to "one Lord," and as bound together by "one faith," to meet and cry, with one heart and voice, "It is time for Thee, O Lord, to work; for they have made void Thy law." "Arise, O Lord, and plead Thine own cause!"

Brethren beloved, we affectionately and earnestly ask you to unite with us in repeating and perpetuating the observance of the Week of Prayer. Nor shall we ask in vain. The hallowed influence of our former New-Year's services, still lingering in the hearts of thousands, will obtain to this request a quick and devout response. Let not our earnestness cease until, in answer to believing, wrestling, importunate supplication, the windows of heaven are opened, and far richer and more copious blessings descend upon the Church and the world.

The following are suggested as topics suited for a prominent place in our exhortations and prayers on the successive days: If adopted, they will serve to give unity to our services—"If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My Father which is in heaven."

Sunday, January 5.—SERMONS ON THE HOLY SPIRIT: His divinity and personality—His offices and operations. PRAYER for the Lord's blessing upon the services of the week.

Monday, 6.—HUMILIATION AND CONFESSION OF SIN: As individuals—as families—as Churches, and as a nation. THANKSGIVING AND PRAISE for recent religious awakenings.

Tuesday, 7.—HOME OBJECTS FOR PRAYER: The conversion of the ungodly—the cessation of intemperance and all immorality—and the spread of vital religion in our families and households, among our rulers, the rich and poor, our soldiers and sailors, the authors of our literature, secular and religious.

Wednesday, 8.—FOREIGN OBJECTS FOR PRAYER: The revival of pure Christianity, and the extension of religious liberty in Europe and the lands of the East—the overthrow of every form of anti-Christian error—conversion of the house of Israel—the prevalence of peace among all nations, especially in America—and a yet more abundant blessing upon our brethren and sisters engaged in the work of missions, Christian education, and literature in foreign lands.

Thursday, 9.—THE CHURCH OF GOD AND THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY: The increased spirituality of the Church, and its more decided separation from the world—brotherly love, sympathy, and union of labour among the Lord's people—a higher standard of piety and power among Christian ministers and all their fellow-labourers—the outpouring of the Spirit upon our universities and colleges, and on the rising ministry at large—the conversion of the young, and a large blessing upon Sunday and other schools.

Friday, 10.—THE WORD OF GOD: That it may be received with increased faith, reverence, and love—that its assailants may be enlightened and brought into the way of truth—that the power of the Divine Spirit may attend its private study, and its circulation throughout the world.

Saturday, 11.—THE LORD'S DAY: That its Divine institution may be recognised, and its desecration at home and abroad may cease.

Sunday, 12.—SERMONS ON THE SIGNS, DANGERS, AND DUTIES OF THE PRESENT TIMES— motives to personal holiness and Christian activity.

“Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it,” is both the Divine warrant and encouragement with which we are emboldened to make known these requests unto God. Let us, in unity of spirit and prayer, obey the precept, and God, even our own God, will fulfil His gracious promise. “God shall bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear Him.”

THE “ESSAYS AND REVIEWS.”

There must be a goodly number of worthy people to whom the announcement that the ‘Essays and Reviews’ were about to be taken into a court of law and dealt with, in the person of Dr. Rowland Williams, as to honest English judges should deem strictly right, must have afforded a feeling of positive satisfaction. It is very well to summon a culprit to “the bar of public opinion;” but the sentiment of every unperverted mind is, that there is a lamentable failure of justice, unless forms of proceeding more exact, and penalties more precise and substantial than are incident to the tribunal just referred to, be, in certain cases, forthcoming. The Bishop of Salisbury’s letter, then, in which he announced the steps he was taking with reference to the Vicar of Broad Chalke, was read with general approval. But strange to say, the first effect of these proceedings is to shut the mouth of Convocation, which seemed likely to pronounce a condemnation of the book, in its entirety. The Lower House, at the summons of the Upper House, performed the part of a grand jury, by examining the evidence. They declared that it compelled them to find a true bill. Then would come the trial—whatever its nature and result—everybody thought. But no—the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London are Privy Councillors; they may be summoned on the Judicial Committee, in case Dr. Williams should be heard by them on appeal, and hence it would be unseemly for them to take part in any further proceedings in Convocation. Whatever may be the issue of the suit against Dr. Williams, its first result is thus a clear gain to the Essayists. We, of course, are not attempting to censure anybody—we are simply recording a fact.

The resolution adopted by their lordships, on the motion of the Bishop of Chichester, on the 9th ult., was as follows:—

“That his Grace the President be requested to communicate to the Lower House that this House, having taken into consideration the communication of the Lower House, touching a book entitled ‘Essays and Reviews,’ have resolved that, whereas, since this House formerly considered this question, a suit has been commenced against one of the writers for his contribution thereto, and whereas his Grace the President, and the other bishops of this Synod, who are Privy Councillors, may, in the course of the appeal in the said suit upon it, have to decide judicially; and whereas it appears to this House inexpedient either to proceed with the consideration and discussion in the absence of his Grace the President, and such other bishops as may be members of the Privy Council, or to embarrass them hereafter sitting as judges, by their having joined in a synodical judgment of the book, it is expedient to adjourn the further consideration of the subject pending the course of the suit.”

THE NEW BISHOPRIC OF HONOLULU.

The Bishop of Oxford, at a late meeting Convocation, stated that the King of t

Sandwich Islands had written to the Queen, requesting that a bishop might be sent to his dominions, in order that he might plant there the principles of the Church of England. The King also expressed a wish that the bishop might act as tutor to his son, for which service he would make him a liberal grant. A committee was appointed to consider the best course to be adopted, and the result has been that a bishopric is to be founded at Honolulu, the first bishop being the Rev. Thomas Nettleship Staley, M.A., formerly fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, and tutor at St. Mark's College, Chelsea. More recently the bishop-designate has held the office of Principal of the Collegiate School at Wandsworth. The city of Honolulu contains, besides its native population, about 300 European and American residents. The king offers, on his own behalf, and those of his subjects and residents who desire the establishment of the English Episcopal Church, a yearly payment of 200*l.*, and to give the site for a church and parsonage. The authorities of the American Church have undertaken to select and maintain three clergymen to assist the new English bishop.

THE SACRED NAME "JEHOVAH."

Jehovah the Redeemer God: The Scriptural Interpretation of the Divine Name Jehovah.
By THOMAS TYLER, B.A., London. London: Ward and Co., 27, Paternoster-row.

THE meaning and import of the Divine name Jehovah, has been a favourable topic of investigation among Biblical critics, from the era of the revival of Hebrew literature at the time of the Reformation. But the application of the Wolfian hypothesis respecting Homer to the books of the Pentateuch, more especially to the first or Genesis, gave a new impetus to investigation in that direction, and an importance to the explanation of the name which did not exist before.

In an article in a recent number (for June of this year), we gave a brief sketch of the hypothesis we allude to, and at the same time anticipated the explanation of the name יהוה (Jehovah) advocated by Mr. Tyler. We had found that explanation in the pages of Mr. Macdonald's Introduction to the Pentateuch. Mr. Tyler, in the preface to his book, claims to have been the original propounder of it, and, as far as we know, he seems to be correct in this matter. We do not care, however, to examine, at any length, into the subject, in order to see whether other scholars may not have anticipated him in his explanation, as we do not think the explanation itself is satisfactory.

Mr. Tyler's work is of interest even to those who may, with ourselves, disagree with the conclusion he comes to. The subject is discussed by him in a popular manner, and yet he shows his acquaintance, all through, with its scientific aspect. The true pronunciation of the name he correctly regards as not יהוה (Jehovah or Yehovah), but rather יהוה or יהוה (Yahveh or Yahaveh). This form is properly a future one, and may be grammatically explained, either as equivalent in meaning to "being," "essence," or "He who shall be." The latter is the meaning advocated by Mr. Tyler. The name has reference, according to him, to the protoevangelion in Gen. iii. 15, and is used in allusion to its strict meaning in Gen. iv. 1, where he would, as Mr. Macdonald and others have similarly done, render the passage, "I possess a man, even Jehovah." We are still decidedly of opinion that in this case the article would have been used with אִישׁ (a man), notwithstanding Mr. Tyler's reference to chap. vi. 10 and xxvi. 34. The former of those passages is quite beside the point, because the word "sons" there is made definite by the numeral "three;" and we would remark, with reference to the other passage, that it is different from that in Gen. iv. 1, because in the latter, on Mr. Tyler's hypothesis, there is an allusion to the seed of the woman, the Redeemer of Gen. iii. 15, and, therefore, the word "man" ought to have had the article.

But much more indefensible is Mr. Tyler's translation of the disputed passage (Gen. iv. 26), "Then they began to call by the name of Jehovah;"—i.e., call God by that name, in consequence of "His having been pleased to reveal the fact, that He Himself would be the Deliverer of man." We are at a loss to understand how Mr. Tyler supposes that this rendering can "be defended by a reference to Isaiah xliii. 1, and xlv. 4," for we do not see what connexion can be made out between these passages. As to the supposition that the same idea can be extracted from the ordinary rendering, "Then began men to call on the name of Jehovah"—viz., "that God was in the days of Enos first known as Jehovah"—we do not see how it can be defended, unless we are disposed to consider the passage as designed to be a riddle. It is hard, indeed, with the little means we have at hand, to fully understand the meaning of such an allusion; yet we think it plain that it refers to a return to the worship of Jehovah, after an apostacy made from Him. It may have a reference to the descendants of Cain—who, excluded from the family, altar in the second generation were allowed to unite in worship together with the Sethites—and may be designed to cast some light on the obscure passage in chap. vi. 1, 2, as we consider that passage shows the ultimate result of union between the righteous Sethites and the unrighteous family of Cain:

The difficult passage in Exodus iv. 14, is explained as signifying that God Himself would act towards Israel, as He intended to act towards the world at large at a future time—i.e., as a Redeemer. Exodus vi. 3 is, on the same principle, understood to mean, that God had not manifested Himself to the Patriarchs as the Redeemer. "They were not permitted to see the deliverance from Egypt and the establishment of the Theocracy." This seems to us as an unnatural meaning. On Mr. Tyler's former suppositions, God had manifested Himself as the Redeemer, or Jehovah, first to Eve, then more widely after the birth of Enos. As to the notion that before the Flood there was a greater manifestation of God "to an elect and consecrated people" than to the Patriarchs, we think it unsupported by evidence and opposed to the analogy of God's revelations, which ever have been "as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." We look upon Hengstenberg's explanation of the sacred name as more correct, that it designates God as the Unchangeable Being. The character of God, as revealed by the name Jehovah, was not made manifest to the Patriarchs. The land of Canaan had been promised but not given to them in their lifetime. They had, it is true, been "redeemed from all evil"—they had experienced that their God was an Almighty God; but in the persons of their children, God was about to reveal Himself as faithful to His promises, by bringing them up out of the land of Egypt to the promised land of Canaan.

We have often before expressed ourselves dissatisfied with any attempt to explain, even generally, the use of the name Jehovah in one place and not in another. There are a few places where a distinction is apparent between the use of the terms Jehovah and God; but to attempt to show that the sacred writers were generally guided in their use of the names by consideration of their meaning, is, we think, vain and futile. Hengstenberg, and others, have distorted passages of Scripture by such attempts.

We ought to notice that Mr. Tyler does not look upon Jehovah as the Old Testament name of the Messiah, but rather as a designation of God in His character of Redeemer. He thus gets rid of the difficulty that the name is applied to God the Father as well as the Son; but we think he goes too far on the other side. We will let him explain himself, premising, however, that we do not coincide wholly with his views. "We may accordingly," Mr. Tyler says in reference to John i. 18, "regard the revelation of God as Jehovah, as the revelation of God through the Son, who was still, however, in the bosom of the Father. The name Jehovah may, then, denote the Revealer and the Revealed as one, or a prominence may be given to either; but in the INCARNATE WORD, the personality of the Son was more clearly manifested; and this w may regard as the objective basis for the distinction between Jehovah and Messiah in Old Testament prophecy. The assertion that Jehovah was the name of the pre-existent Word, rather than that of God revealed through the Word, appears to overlook the distinction between the revelation of God in Christ, and the revelation of God as Jehovah, which may be regarded as implied in the declaration, 'I came forth from the Father, and have come into the world'; for though, even during the time that the Word tabernacled among men, the Father was in the Son, and the Son in the Father, yet there is a deep meaning in the words, 'I came forth from the Father,' and 'I leave the world, and go to the Father.'"

Literary Correspondence.

"THE BIBLE FOR THE PANDITS."

To the Editor of Evangelical Christendom.

Dear Sir,—Among the various periodicals which have reviewed my specimen-fasciculus of the "Bible for the Pandits," there is no one that evinces a more intelligent and candid appreciation of my attempt than your own does. I venture, therefore, to request that you will spare me an occasional column in your journal, in order that I may have an opportunity to afford explanations to those who have failed to apprehend rightly my statements and arguments, as well as an opportunity to show the inapplicability of objections, which, however unworthy of attention in themselves, yet acquire a certain amount of importance in the character of possible stumblingblocks in the way of timid thinkers. In regard to the missionary work in India, and the importance of the Sanskrit language and philosophy as bearing on it, my motive in writing is purely the desire of seeing truth recognised and nonsense discarded. I am not myself a missionary, but a jealously-suspected, or ungraciously half-acknowledged, wellwisher to missions. I have no pecuniary interest in the matter; and if the jealousy displayed against my "intrusions"—(to avail myself of a Scotticism)—has been greater than the sympathy elicited by them, still, at all events, the sympathy has greatly overpaid to me the per contra jealousy, which I would now willingly, through the medium of your columns, do my best to allay, by showing that there was all along really no occasion for it.

If you consent to spare me an occasional column, I propose, first, to clear the ground by showing how my statements have been sometimes misunderstood, and sometimes (I regret to say) misrepresented; and then to give (in slender portions, not too hard for general deglutition, if not digestion) a concise account of what I believe in regard to Indian missions. This belief of mine must else be sought (by any one interested in it) through rather numerous publications, published neither by me nor for me, but by and for the Government of the North-West Provinces of India—and publications, the bulk of which was burnt in the store of the Curator of Schoolbooks at Agra, during the time when Agra was in the hands of the Sepoys.—Awaiting your reply, I remain, dear Sir, faithfully yours, India-office Library, July 22, 1861.

JAMES R. BALLANTYNE.

[We shall gladly insert in our pages any communication from Dr. Ballantyne on this subject.—EDS. EVANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM.]

Brief Literary Notices.

Tracts for Priests and People. No. V. On Terms of Communion. 1. The Boundaries of the Church. By the Rev. C. K. P. 2. The Message of the Church. By J. N. LANELEY, M.A. London: Macmillan and Co. 1861.

A PRELIMINARY notice informs us that "the clergyman who is the author of the first tract, thinks, as many excellent clergymen think, that the main characteristic of the English Church is comprehensiveness; and that it may be made still more comprehensive. The writer of the second shows in what sense he sought and found comprehensiveness in the Church; but that he also sought for distinct and permanent truth, and found that." There are many points in both with which we do not agree, and we believe that principles are advanced in them which would not be generally adopted with safety. For instance, on the subject of inspiration, Dean Milman is quoted with approbation as saying that it is "the inflexible love of truth which, being inseparable from the spirit of Christianity, would of itself be a sufficient guarantee for fidelity and honesty." Rowland Williams also is quoted as saying that inspiration is "a clear perception of those heavenly truths which the Holy Ghost reveals to man as the abiding thoughts of God, which ever repeat themselves in His eternal plan." The author calls these "brave and noble words," but he does not observe that they are widely different, and that "the inflexible love of truth" is not at all the same as "a clear perception" of truth—the one being a moral quality, and the other an intellectual faculty. We believe that the inspired penmen had both, and that they both loved and perceived the truth by the Spirit of God, and not by merely human means. So also, on the question of eternal punishment, the reasoning is vague and unsatisfactory; and the same is true of the Atonement. With regard to miracles and prophecy, it will be quite sufficient to give a brief extract:—

"In nothing is the temper and judgment of the Church of England more shown than in her absence of dogmatism on the subject of miracles and prophecy. Once, and now by many, miracles were regarded as a test of doctrine, and as interruptions of order; prophecy was mere prediction, and the moral element in the prophets' words of quite secondary importance. But there is a growing conviction that, on the contrary, doctrines are a test of miracles; and so strong a faith is there in the perfection of order, that men would first prefer in all possible cases to explain a miracle, and when that is not possible, to refer it to some as yet unknown law. Prophecy, again, is increasingly considered as the preaching of the men of old, with only such reference to the future as there must of necessity be in the words of those who, having learnt to understand God's dealings in the present, understand also by analogy what will be His dealings under like circumstances in the future. On miracles the Church of England says nothing. Neither does she define what she means by prophecy; but, as one of the hymns of her ordinary services, we find the song of Simeon, in which the predicative element of prophecy is spoken of in the vaguest terms."

On "The Message of the Church, by an ex-Dissenter," we should also have many things to say, were we inclined to be controversial. The author writes in a tone of sincerity which cannot be doubted, but he appears to have the most unfounded notions on a number of most important questions. He has abandoned his old views for others, which will certainly not be approved of by Evangelical Christians. The way in which he expounds and justifies his present opinions is ingenious and sometimes plausible, but there is so much that is like special pleading, that few will feel the force of his reasonings. On the whole, if these are fair specimens of the "Tracts for Priests and People," we fear they will not much profit either priests or people.

Happy Years at Hand: Outlines of the Coming Theocracy. By WILLIAM LEASK, D.D. London: Ward and Co. 1861.

THE prophetic school of writers often indulges us with visions of the future. Some time since a pamphlet, called the "Coming Struggle among the Nations of the Earth," was immensely popular, because its author made some shrewd guesses and startling announcements as to coming events, and clearly adapted his vaticinations to sundry passages of Scripture. Still more recently Dr. Cumming gave the world his "Coming Tribulation," in which he set forth prognostications of a most grave and awful character. The success of such works is readily accounted for, and hence the demand for them goes on. Now, we have neither "struggle" nor "tribulation," but "happy years at hand," and bright visions of a blessed future for the world, painted with considerable taste and ability. The author is thoroughly Evangelical, but his readings of prophecy lead him to conclusions about that which is to come which will not be everywhere assented to. There is much in the style which is beautiful and even powerful; we will go so far as to say that there are passages which are really eloquent, and that the book is a most pleasant one to read. There is also great command of Scripture phraseology and imagery, and texts are interwoven with positive skill, and everywhere a spirit of fervent piety pervades the pages. The only drawback of the volume is that in our estimation its theory is not sound. This is a serious difficulty, we admit, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact. An ardent imagination, and an uncritical habit of reading the Scriptures, have led many into the same error, and systems have been built up with no foundation in the Bible, although to all appearance sustained by a thousand texts. It will continue to be so while fulfilment of prophecies are regarded as unfulfilled, and figurative language is treated as literal, and while isolated passages are taken from their connexion, and made to convey a meaning which is not the mind of the spirit. The whole domain of really unfulfilled prophecy needs to be explored with extreme caution, and the neglect of this has carried not a few into the wildest fanaticism. Dr. Lesak is on the whole very modest, notwithstanding his enthusiasm, and, apart from the definiteness of the period to which certain events are assigned, we quite agree with some of his statements. At present, however, this is all we can say; for if we were to descend to details, it would lead us into a discussion of a multitude of expositions and other circumstances, for which we have neither space nor inclination. We do look forward to the purification of the Church and the conversion of the world, and the main object of this journal is to report progress. We look forward to a millennial period of far greater and truer happiness than any which the world has yet known. We hope confidently for a time when the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see the salvation of God. There are, doubtless, "happy years at hand," and this confidence comforts us in our discouragements and conflicts and trials. But when it comes to the "first resurrection," the "destiny of the Jews," the "millennium" of the millenarians, and the "metropolis of the world," we hold back, and leave our friends to pursue their lucubrations alone. We feel no inclination to make such voyages of discovery into the supposed future, and are content to wait and see what will come to pass. To us it seems as plausible to tell the fortune of an individual as to tell the fortune of the world, and our friends must pardon our confession.

The Essays and Reviews Examined: with Preface, Introduction, and Appendix. By JAMES BUCHANAN, D.D. Edinburgh: Johnstone, Hunter, and Co.

THE substance of this volume consists of a series of articles which originally appeared in the Morning Post. To these an introduction and appendix have been added—the former comprising an essay on the two schools at Oxford, and the latter, notes and documents. By these accessories the author has endeavoured to give a completeness to his work which it before had not, and in fact a series of articles embedded in the columns of a newspaper can hardly be called a work at all. We now have them revised and compacted, and can survey them calmly and deliberately. This is what we have endeavoured to do, and our general impression is, that while they bear unmistakable traces of rapid composition and hasty compilation, the letters are well deserving of the permanent form which they have now assumed. We have seen it objected to the work, that it was not written by a member of the Church of England; but this is really no disadvantage whatever, except in regard to the very few points on which Dr. Buchanan must differ from Churchmen in judging of the Oxford book. He has a positive advantage in some respects, because he is not hampered and trammelled, as some of the respondents to "Essays and Reviews" appear to be.

The introduction on the two schools at Oxford, their connexion and contrast, is, of course, based upon the Tractarian and the Essayist movements, each of which has given its gospel to the world, only to be encountered by a storm of opposition. The Tractarians endeavoured to carry back the Church into the dead past, and the Essayists wish to create for it a spiritually lifeless future. The one returned to the beggarly elements of tradition and fathers, of rites, ceremonies, and decorations, to the reign of priestly dominance and sacramental efficacy; the other would bring in an age of reason. In the one we have a faith which degenerates into credulity, and, in the other, a faith which is lost in Rationalism. The second is a natural consequence of the first. Both are alike opposed to the pureness of Evangelical truth and to the reality of Christian life. The infidel tendency of the Oxford tracts was long since pointed out, and the present outbreak of scepticism anticipated. Dr. Buchanan traces this connexion, although he believes that the new development of unbelief is not exclusively due to the influence of the "Tracts for the Times." He holds that it is more than a reaction, and that it is partly the product of the same causes which generated the first movement, and partly the natural development of some principles which were incorporated with the tracts themselves. We commend his whole remarks upon this subject as ably set forth, and well deserving serious consideration. In the main we agree with him.

The letters are nine in number. Seven of them are devoted to a masterly but summary review and refutation of the principles of the essays; and the last two to an exposition of the scheme of thought which pervades the entire volume. The appendix contains additional notes, quotations, and documents. We have examined the book with some care, and have risen with a deep conviction of the author's fitness for his task. He is not a novice, but one who, with a master's hand, traces the errors he refutes, and, with great skill and judgment, confronts them with strong and sound arguments. Our only regret is, that the work has not been more expanded; but, as it is, it is every way excellent.

Evangelical Christendom.

THOUGHTS AND ANTICIPATIONS :

FOURTH CONFERENCE OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS OF ALL COUNTRIES AT GENEVA.

When these lines meet the eye of the reader, a great event is about to occur in the ancient city of Geneva. In that venerable city of which Cæsar makes mention in his "Commentaries," and which has clustering around it the historical associations of two thousand years, there is to be a grand Christian gathering. In the city of Calvin and of many others renowned in Protestant annals, in the city where not a few of our own fathers in the faith were at once protected and instructed, men of every Evangelical denomination, of diverse nationalities, and speaking different languages, are about to assemble, and to greet each other in the name of the Lord. When Constantine summoned the Council of Nicea, he brought together men of eminence from every country, from Persia to Gaul, and from Gothland to Upper Egypt. That was a great sight, and such a one as had not been witnessed before in the history of the Church. But it is believed that at Geneva there will be represented nations yet more divergent, and in numbers yet more considerable. At Nicea men met at the will of an emperor to deliberate and decide upon a momentous doctrine of the faith, and to close, if possible, a controversy by which the Church was distracted and rent asunder. But at Geneva the meeting will be due to the voluntary action of the disciples, and will be for mutual salutation, congratulation and encouragement. At Nicea the attendants were agitated by widely different feelings, and all felt that it was a question of life and death which had called them together. But at Geneva all will be of one heart and of one mind, and will congregate for peaceful and beneficent purposes. At Nicea they met to restore by legislative measures a unity which had been menaced, if not broken. But at Geneva they meet for fraternal conference, to celebrate and avow the substantial unity which exists. Law took them to the one, and love brings them to the other. Happy, therefore, are the circumstances, and joyful will be the events, of this Christian convocation. It is a great triumph over minor diversities of creed and rite, as well as over those natural impediments of country and of language which stand in the way of the Communion of Saints on a grand and imposing scale. Surely multitudes have said in their hearts with Israel of old, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem. Whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord!" And surely He who has said that "whosoever two or three shall be gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them," will vouchsafe His presence to that august representative assembly, and will manifest His glory.

Our readers will remember that this is the fourth of these great assemblies. The first was held in London, in 1851, and the memory of it is still fragrant. That was the year of the Great Exhibition, but there was no sight more solemn or pleasant than that reunion of the strangers scattered abroad. The second of these conferences took place at Paris, in 1855, and brought together a rare assemblage of men eminent for piety, zeal, and consecrated talent. The third was at Berlin, in 1857, and was probably the most remarkable gathering of Christians which the world ever saw. It was a holy and a blessed time, and hallowed influences rested upon the multitudes who came together. Never will it be forgotten by those who were privileged to be present, and its influences will perhaps be felt to the end of the world. And now we have come to the fourth of these general conferences, to be held in a city which was for long regarded as the metropolis and fortress of the Protestant faith. For a considerable period arrangements have been pending, and committees in London, Geneva, and elsewhere, have been diligent in preparing for the varied business which is to be transacted, and for whatever may be needful to ensure the comfort of the visitors. All this is now over, and the time is come. The summons has gone forth over land and over sea; and in obedience to it, multitudes of weary and wayworn pilgrims have already passed through the gates of Geneva. Others are fast approaching, and in a few short hours the congregation will be complete. Meanwhile, the proceedings are awaited with prayerful and with hopeful hearts, and the baptism of the Holy Spirit is confidently, yea joyously, expected.

We have already published formal programmes of the proceedings, and fraternal, if official, invitations; and we may now refresh the memories of those who stay reluctantly behind with a brief outline of what is to be done, and who is to do it.

On Sunday, September 1st, the brethren in Geneva will meet and welcome others at their meeting for solemn prayer to God, to invoke His blessing upon the impending conferences. Let us hope that the same object will form a prominent topic in the public and private devotions of the Lord's people who on that day will not be able to be present in Geneva. It is meet and right that such proceedings should be inaugurated by prayer, for what will they be without the Divine benediction? This, however, we feel assured, will not be withholden in answer to the supplications of the saints.

On Monday, the 2nd, there will be an opening meeting, when a preliminary address will be delivered by the President of the French Branch of the Evangelical Alliance. Other addresses will also be given, and cordial and fraternal salutations will be offered to the visitors. In the afternoon of the same day, Professor Godet, of Neuchâtel, is to read a paper on the Sabbath, and the best means of promoting its sanctification. This subject will be the topic of conversation afterwards; and M. F. Coulin, an excellent pastor at Geneva, will be the first speaker. The importance of this subject is very great, because it is known that views and practices in regard to it are far more lax upon the Continent even than in England; yea, that many of the Protestants themselves do not seem to feel adequately its obligation.

On Tuesday, the 3rd, Professor Rosseeuw St. Hilaire, of Paris—a man of much ability, learning, and piety—will read a paper, in which he is expected to deal with popular religious destitution and immorality in all countries, together with the best means for remedying these great evils. His acquaintance with the state of great cities in France will enable him to speak with authority on this subject; and we have no doubt that the discussion which is to follow will be very important and suggestive. In that discussion, we understand, it is expected that, besides speakers from other countries, Dr. Guthrie and Dr. Norman McLeod will take a part. The afternoon meeting is to be occupied with a consideration of mission work among the brethren since the Berlin Conference. M. Christ, President of the Basle Missionary Society, is to read a paper, and M. Casalis, of Paris, is to commence the subsequent conversation. Some of our readers may recollect the important meeting and discussion on this topic at Berlin; and it seems but right that at such times the wants and woes of the heathen world should be prominently brought forward.

On Wednesday, the 4th, the morning meeting will be one of profound interest, as M. Ernest Naville has promised to produce a paper comprising a critical examination of the scepticism now prevalent in France. M. Bastie has also undertaken to speak upon the subject. The scepticism over the presence of which we lament in Great Britain is far more avowed and extensive in France and French-speaking countries. Under the names of liberalism and of free theology, and the like, it is eating out the life of faith and the love of the truth from multitudes of hearts. Protestants and Roman Catholics alike have succumbed to its influence, and its blighting, withering effects are apparent in every direction. It is one of the greatest obstacles to the spread of Evangelical doctrine, a very hydra which must be manfully grappled with by the disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ. We apprehend that many will be unprepared to hear what will be stated on this occasion. In the afternoon of the same day, Dr. Capadocce is expected to read a paper on the people of Israel and the Gospel, and M. Petavel is to introduce the conversation upon it. Then, we believe, will be exhibited a scene of unparalleled interest. A deputation of Jews from the French branch of the Universal Israelitish Alliance will come, in altogether a friendly spirit, to hear what Christians say of them, and to say what they think of Christ. If this interview is characterised by prudence, its effects may be very beneficial. The fame of it will go forth into all the world, and Christian love may do more for the conversion of Israel to the Gospel of Christ, on that day, than ordinary agency has yet accomplished. On the other hand, indiscretion may dissipate the friendly feeling which leads to the interview, and the result will then be most painful. We confess that we rejoice with trembling, and we intreat our friends to be instant in prayer that this solemn moment may have a happy issue, and the name of Jesus be exalted thereby. Such an invitation was never before given or accepted, and both the giving and the accepting may be viewed as most encouraging symptoms. Perhaps we may misjudge, but we view this as the crisis of the conference, by the issues of which the whole may be estimated. A happy and a peaceful result will be its climax, its topstone, and its glory. May He who has all hearts in His hand overrule it for great good to Israel!

There will be no meeting on the morning of Thursday, the 5th, but the afternoon is set apart for Italy. Italy and the Gospel is to be the subject of a paper by M. Meille, of Turin, and he is to be followed by the excellent and devoted Professor Mazzarella, from Bologna, a man who has for years had the spiritual good of Italy at heart, and in that cause has laboured and suffered abundantly. This, too, will be an important meeting, for never were there such opportunities as now—at least in modern times—for disseminating the Gospel in Italy. There never was so deep an interest manifested in that work, nor ever so extensive and diversified an agency in operation for carrying it on. Dark as are the shadows which rest upon that land, it is a joyful fact that the knowledge of salvation is extending, and that souls are won to Christ. We anticipate nothing but good from this meeting, and we trust it will call forth yet more visibly the generous sympathies of the Lord's people in behalf of Italy, as well as encourage the hearts of those who are His disciples there.

The morning of Friday, the 6th, will be given to another interesting subject: "The Characteristics of the Reformation and of the Reformer of Geneva;" which is to be introduced by Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, who will be followed by the eminent Professor Herzog, of Erlangen. In the afternoon, Sunday-schools will be the topic of a paper by the Rev. J. C. Fletcher, of New York, and of addresses by M. Paul Cook, of Calais, &c.

On Saturday, the 7th, M. E. de Pressensé will produce a paper on religious liberty, as the guarantee of the peace and order of States. This subject is one of immense importance to France, where it is so misunderstood and misrepresented; and we know no man better fitted to handle it than M. de Pressensé, whose name is known everywhere for his untiring efforts in favour of the rights of conscience in his own land. M. Viguet, of Geneva, will take part in the proceedings. The afternoon will be appropriately set apart for a kindred theme. An American meeting—where the speaking will be English—is to be held, when Dr. Baird, of New York, is to read a paper on the influence of civil and religious liberty upon Roman Catholicism in the United States.

The arrangements for the following day are not announced on the programme.

but we believe that assemblies for Divine worship in different languages will be held, and at two p.m. the Lord's Supper will be administered.

On Monday, the 9th, the series of meetings will be resumed by one in English, at which the Anglo-Saxon colonies, in connexion with the spread of the Gospel, will be considered. We look forward to this meeting with much interest, as there will be present gentlemen conversant with these colonies in different parts of the world, and acquainted with the facts of the case. In the afternoon there is to be a meeting on the religious condition of Eastern Europe and Western Asia. This, also, will be a most important meeting, including, we believe, not only European and Asiatic Turkey, but Greece. Enough is not known among us of the state of the Greek Church, and of the other ancient Christian communities, Armenians and others, scattered over those regions. At this moment the condition of the Christians in Bulgaria, as well as those in Syria and in Northern Persia, demands especial attention. Besides which, the vast Mohammedan population in these lands ought to have the sympathy and to arouse the zeal of all Evangelical Christians. We understand that M. Rougemont and the Rev. Mr. Monsell are to introduce this subject; and if any of the American missionaries are also there, it will be treated as it deserves.

On Tuesday, the 10th, the importance of uniting doctrine with Christian life, in order to the prosperity of the Church, will be treated by MM. Bauty and Grandpierre, &c. This meeting will, we expect, be an appropriate supplement to the one on French scepticism, and we doubt not it will furnish a noble opportunity for exhibiting the glory and the power of the truth as it is in Jesus. The chief speakers are well known as the decided advocates and defenders of Evangelical doctrine, and their ability is unquestioned. A testimony in favour of positive doctrine, as distinct from the too prevalent negative creed, will be of immense value. The meeting in the afternoon will be devoted to Germany, when Professor Dorner, Dr. Krummacher, and others, will take up the following subject: Individualism: its rights and limits in Evangelical theology, with its history in the principal Protestant countries.

. The morning meeting of Wednesday, the 11th, will be set apart, very properly, for German Switzerland. It is intended that Professor Riggensbach, of Basle, should read a paper on the question, What are the principal points in which the Rationalism of the present day, particularly that of German Switzerland, is opposed to Evangelical Christianity? This will be an instructive subject, and one in which the German brethren especially will feel interested. The afternoon meeting is to be on Christian brotherhood, and the characteristics which should distinguish controversy among Christians. M. A. de Gasparin will read a paper, and be supported by M. Tournier, of Geneva. The Genevan Conference will be a glorious exhibition of Christian brotherhood; but it is to be feared that there are not a few who do more than look with contempt upon the Evangelical Alliance and its gatherings. They manifest a bitterness and an asperity in their controversial proceedings which are greatly to be deprecated; and while they proclaim on the housetops the sacred name of liberty, would be very tyrants, if they could, towards the brethren from whom they differ. In regard to this very matter of the Genevan Conference, every step in the arrangements has been made a theme for controversy, and a reason for complaining. The confessional basis of the Alliance has been objected to; the doctrinal aspect of the invitation has been subject to hostile criticism; and insinuations the most unworthy have been published on the matter. The request for, and the grant of the venerable Cathedral Church of St. Peter, has been similarly carped at and discussed. Nay, the very presence of the Alliance in Geneva has been objected to. And no wonder. We are told that a manslayer would be horrorstruck at the sight of the ghost of his victim; and when ghosts were believed in, stories of this nature were very common. Probably the murderer would be yet more terrified if he saw his victim rise from the dead. Apply this to Geneva. The old Evangelical faith in and of the Gospel has been overthrown and suppressed by many, and its place has been taken by dead Rationalism. No wonder if they who had performed the funeral obsequies of Evangelical religion, should start and be amazed to see it come back full of life and vigour, glorious and beautiful as ever. The Gospel is not dead, it cannot die; and they who have tried to supplant it by human doctrines must fail, for the "Word of the Lord shall stand for ever." But after all opposition, the Evangelical Alliance goes to Geneva, and, beneath the banner of the Old Gospel, proclaims the existence of a vast multitude who love the truth, and are true in love. The truth they must love; but they must also love truly all who love the Lord Jesus, and so far as it becomes them to be defenders of the faith—for every Christian is a Fidei Defensor—they must defend it in love.

On the 12th there will be two meetings. At the one in the forenoon, Pastor Bonnet, of Frankfort, and Dr. Tholuck, of Halle, will speak on religious movements in Germany since the Berlin Conference. They will, doubtless, state many interesting facts, and give a clearer exhibition of what has been going on in the Christian world of Germany than can be obtained from ordinary sources. Perhaps they may sketch a brighter and more hopeful picture than some of us have been led to anticipate.

The afternoon meeting will be on revivals, when MM. Anet, of Brussels, and G. Monod, of Paris, will be the chief speakers. Probably as the word revival is understood in different senses, either to denote what we mean, or merely an improved state of things in a place or a district, those who attend will do so with different expectations. But we doubt not information in the shape of positive facts will be presented for the instruction of many.

And then will come the closing meetings for prayer and for farewells, the appropriate conclusion of this solemn expression of unity in faith, and love, and hope, and Christ, in which have been associated not only the English Churchman and the Dissenter, but the Lutheran and the Calvinist. All those fiery heats of argument which burned up charity in other times will be extinct, and it will be difficult to imagine that these men represent principles which have by their collision set kingdoms in a flame. It will be like the friendly meeting of the lion, the bear, and the leopard, with their natures changed. This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. This is what grace effects, and shows us how we can be one.

And what will be the thoughts of those who witness these strange sights, who see Geneva invaded, and conquered, and possessed by the Evangelical Alliance? We hope they will believe in the reality of the Evangelical Alliance; that they will believe it furnishes an adequate basis for communion with all the tribes of the Lord; that they will admire the beauty, and the power, and the vitality of the good old faith; and that they will confess it to be not always barren and without effect. Quite sure we are that many will be astonished, for the population of the canton of Geneva is not wholly enlightened. The inhabitants are said to be two-thirds Swiss and one-third foreign; in religion they amount to 36,000 Protestants and 18,000 Catholics; and it is worthy of notice that of the foreigners no fewer than three-fourths are Roman Catholics. Now, as the number of foreigners and the number of Catholics is the same, it will appear that the real Genevese have retained their Protestant name with the exception of some 4,500 among them.

But we must close, or we should have indulged in some anticipations as to the effect of this Conference upon the nations who will be represented there; for that it will have an influence we take to be certain. There may be lessons taught, facts stated, trains of thought started, out of which results momentous to the Church and to the world may spring.

In the meanwhile, we repeat our request that prayers may be offered for the Divine blessing to rest upon those who go, while they journey, as they stay, and when they depart; that the power of the Holy Ghost may be felt by them all; that the name and truth of the Lord Jesus may be abundantly honoured; and that a benediction may remain behind in Geneva, which shall cause her to rejoice in this as a turning-point in her spiritual history.

We shall give ample details of what has been done in our next; and then our readers will have an opportunity of realising for themselves much of the instruction and profit which will have accrued to those who attend the conferences. Finally, let us remind our friends of that wonderful prayer of our blessed Saviour, "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

THE NEWEST THEOLOGY: TRACTS FOR PRIESTS AND PEOPLE.

THERE is certainly much less said about the celebrated Oxford "Essays and Reviews" than there was a few months back, but the theological questions which that volume brought into unwonted prominence are not allowed to slumber. Writers of all shades of religious opinion have embraced the opportunity of publishing their thoughts upon every doctrinal and critical subject and problem. Almost every day something, more or less controversial, emanates from the press, and proves that speculation is rife to an extraordinary degree. The friends of Evangelical truth are numerous among these disputants, and not a few of their publications are calculated to serve the good cause. They write, moreover, in a confident and cheerful tone for the most part, and the least we can say of them is, that they present as respectable an appearance as their adversaries, in a literary point of view. Probably some will be astonished to find evidence of so much learning and critical skill, of so much logical acumen and scientific attainment, as is exhibited by many of the orthodox. There has been an opinion—and it has been freely expressed—that those who abide by the old theology are behind the age, both in their abilities and in their learning. We have never sympathised with this opinion, because we know the diligent study, the patient research, and the severe application of many among us who hold fast what we believe to be the form of sound words. We are convinced that in all respects these will be found a match, and more than a match, for their adversaries. If few remarkable works have lately appeared in apologetical divinity, it is not because the men who could produce them were wanting; but because the occasion had not arisen. Already we have reason to congratulate ourselves on the Christian zeal and abilities of several who have taken part in the current controversy. But we do not think the mine is exhausted, and we quite expect other and probably better books than any which this conflict has yet called forth.

With regard to the professed advocates of the principles for which the "Essays and Reviews" have been condemned, we own that we have seen little or nothing which rises above mediocrity. So also the intermediate literature which has latterly sprung up, and which is both for and against the Oxford Essays, is not all of the first quality. The most remarkable, and perhaps best known, specimens of this latter class, appear to be the "Tracts for Priests and People." When we first saw these announced, we were in doubt whether they were intended as replies to the "Essays and Reviews," or designed to support them, or meant to diffuse the principles of which Mr. Maurice may be taken as the representative. On the whole, the latter view seemed the most probable, especially as the publisher is Mr. Maurice's publisher, while Mr. Maurice and Mr. Llewellyn Davies are among the writers. A perusal of the seven numbers which have been issued leads us to suppose that the authors have little or no understanding with each other, and that the enterprise is that of a bookseller who is wise in his generation. We therefore find no positive harmony in the opinions advocated, and nothing worth the name of a plan in the series, so far as it has gone. Considering the latitude which has been allowed to the writers, we have been disposed to call their collective labours a contribution to free theology. Indeed, the only principle which seems to pervade them is this, that uniformity of opinion is not required, but that every one who writes may propound freely his personal convictions, doubts, and speculations. Therefore the first conclusion to which we come is that the conductors regard sincerity and candour as essentials, but not unanimity and harmony. The consequence is that the tracts, as a whole, have a rather motley appearance, and represent what we may venture to call speckled theology. Now we quite admit the right of every man to his own opinions, and concede and claim for every man the liberty to express them. We consider this to be a privilege which every one can demand from his fellow-man, and which every man must therefore grant to others. This individual and personal freedom is inalienable as a civil right, and is necessary for the honest and unfettered discussion of truth. Conscience demands it, and God allows it, for to Him every man stands or falls, and by Him every man will be ultimately judged. Far be it from us to utter a word which would militate against so sacred a principle; we would rather utter ten thousand words in its advocacy and defence, because we believe that its violation is a violation of the eternal laws of right, a barrier to human thought and progress, and injurious alike to the interests of truth and of man. But all this is consistent with a deep conviction of the importance of men's opinions on matters of religion, and of the reality and unity of truth. Nor does it require us to admit the consistency of such a combination as the one exhibited in the "Tracts for Priests and People." Such a combination is calculated, in our judgment, to lead to uncertainty and indecision, if not to complete indifference. For be it observed, that the separate writers are not arguing with one another, but that each expresses his own views upon the subject or subjects he writes about, with little reference to what the others say. Hence the production of what we have called "speckled theology," for want of a better phrase. Hence, too, we frequently meet in these tracts with what we quite agree, as well as with much that we cannot endorse. The writers are both clergymen and laymen, and are all members of the Established Church. Let us, however, look a little at the separate essays, and make a few observations upon some of their contents.

The first is entitled "Religio Laici," and by Mr. Thomas Hughes, the popular author of "Tom Brown's School Days" and other works. To this is prefixed a short preface, in which occurs a sentence which we shall not do amiss to bear in mind. It is this: "The writers will express frankly their differences from each other, but they do not shrink from the responsibilities which are involved in a joint publication." This is the banner which heads the procession; or, in other words, the motto of the firm of Hughes, Maurice, Davies and Co. is, "Individual liberty and mutual responsibility." It sounds well, and implies a confidence in each other, which again implies a common understanding. But we confess we do not like it, and do not believe in it, because it both grants too much and asks too much. Of one thing we are certain, which is, that we should not like to hold ourselves responsible for the utterances of other men, except we first knew what they were going to utter. But this by the way, and we come to Mr. Hughes, whose essay is a well-written paper on a variety of topics, and apparently intended to represent the utterances of common sense in regard to them. We say "common sense," for Mr. Hughes says: "I am no scholar or critic, I know nothing of natural science, very little indeed of controversial theology." It may appear somewhat strange, therefore, to hear him giving his opinion and advice on topics connected with all these, and giving it too to "priests and people." But, probably, he is not so uninformed as he thinks, and indeed he cannot be, for he tells us what speculations are now rife, what questions are now debated, and what conclusions critics and men of science have in his judgment reached. He intimates that a true and living faith is becoming rarer every day, and that an answer is demanded to the doubts which beset men. He thinks that this doubt goes down far below the external and more prominent matters of religion, to its very foundations, and is, "whether there is a God at all, or rather, whether a living, personal God—thinking, acting, and ruling in this world in which we are—has ever revealed Himself to man?" To those who entertain this doubt, he shows what it involves; as the rejection of prophecy, inspiration, creation, &c. But he goes further, and seeks in a somewhat novel manner to remove the doubt which he has admitted to exist. In all this there is much that is true and forcible, and even beautiful; but there is also a frequent approximation to the peculiarities of Mr. Maurice's style, which detracts from the clearness and point of what is said. Glad, however, as we are to find so much that we agree with, in reference to fundamentals, we feel sorry when we meet with what we cannot acquiesce in with regard to accessories. For instance—when speaking of the authorship of the Biblical books, the purity of the text, and the accuracy of the common version, and other questions—he says: "What is all this to me? What do I care who wrote them; what is the date of them; what this or that passage ought to be?" Now we cannot sympathise with such questions, because it would imply an indifference in regard to the vehicle of revealed truth, which seems both unnatural and rash. We call it unnatural, because human curiosity exists, and finds employment about such things, and because the mind takes pleasure in ascertaining what may be known of them; and we call it rash, because the feeling that these things are something to us is a stimulus to profitable inquiry, and makes us jealous for the preservation and exhibition of the true Word of God. On the subject of miracles Mr. Hughes speaks very well. The difficulties of the Mosaic cosmogony are got over by supposing the first chapter of Genesis to speak of the plan of creation, and the second of its execution—a view which has in part been advanced by others. Rewards and punishments are not satisfactorily explained. Thus he says: "Christ has told me that the only reward I shall ever get will be 'life eternal,' and that life eternal is to know God and Him. That is all the reward I care about." But surely the knowledge of God and Christ is rather a qualification for life eternal, and a condition of its attainment, than eternal life itself. Again: "The only punishment I can ever bring on myself will be, to banish myself from His presence and the presence of all who know Him, to dwell apart from Him and my brethren, shut up in myself. That is the only punishment I dread." But is this all? We think the Bible reveals much in addition to this, and ascribes to future punishment a positive as well as a negative character. There are other matters on which we might animadvert; but we refrain, as we wish to fulfil our intention of speaking upon each of the seven.

Number two is by Mr. Maurice, and is called "The Mote and the Beam: a Clergyman's Lessons from the Present Panic." This essay is mainly about the "Essays and Reviews." It is divided into three parts, in the first of which Mr. Maurice speaks of "Belief and Unbelief in Oxford and London." Herein the Westminster reviewer of the Essays is the most prominent figure, but the Essayists themselves are also called up in succession, and subjected to criticism, partly favourable, partly unfavourable. The writer is beyond question most candid in the utterance of his opinions, and his spirit ought by no means to be deprecated. But we are often constrained to differ from him, and to regard him as altogether erroneous in his judgments. That a man who has spent, and is ever spending, so much of his life in speculation and argument should utter the following words to the London clergy, might almost justify a smile: "We are in the midst of work, you say; we have not time to speculate. Just so. Then why waste the short time in which you are able to work 'n speculation? Why argue and debate when you might proclaim good news to your fellow-creatures :'' Probably Mr. Maurice will tell us that he does not speculate, argue, and debate; but it is a very general conviction that he does, and that he sets others also to do it. Again, speaking of "Essays and Reviews," he says: "If the Essayists and Reviewers set clergymen of all measures of intellect—yes, if they set clergymen of the very highest intellect, with the greatest knowledge of objections, ancient and modern, with great logical power and clearness of exposition—upon the old task of producing evidences for or from miracles, prophecy, the authority of Scripture, their book will be indeed a curse to us." Very fine and noble, no doubt, to be superior to all such evidences for the Bible, but it will not be easy to convince us that the long race of apologists, from Justin Martyr and his generation to our own day, have been useless either to the world or to the Church. Doubtless our author considers his a positive theology, which regards what is true as self-evidential, and requiring neither arguments nor witnesses in its support. "Churches did not rise, and Christendom was not formed, by the preaching of evidences, but by the preaching of a Gospel," says Mr. Maurice; and as he is tolerably familiar with the New Testament, we presume he remembers the appeals which Christ made to His miracles, and to the prophecies from Moses downwards, and does not forget the apostles' practice of proving the truth of what they preached. Deny and ignore evidences as he will, they meet a want of human nature, and have always been employed. The younger clergy may be driven from those dreary arguments, which have proved so ineffectual in the mouths of their fathers, and we would add, that they may be none the better for being set adrift. The second part of the essay is headed "Old Creeds and Modern Opinions," and gives special prominence to the National Review. It abounds in ingenious devices, clearly indicating that Mr. Maurice has in view his own anomalous position, as well as that of the Essayists. He is here, as always, supremely personal; no man, indeed, uses that pronoun I more often than he does in his writings. This self-consciousness, whatever he writes upon, makes this gentleman appear at least to be defending himself, justifying his own opinions; in fact, the very apologist whose office he so much disparages in another department. There is no need for this attitude of self-vindication, but it is natural to Mr. Maurice, and he always assumes it. The feeling in question makes him very merciful to the Essayists on some practical questions affecting their consistency. But our present object is not to expound our differences from him in view and sentiment, and we therefore notice that the third part of the essay is "How to Drive Out and to Bring In Strange Doctrines." Here the prominence is assigned to the Quarterly Review, which of course is sprinkled with more gall than either the Westminster or the National. These are treated with respect and gentleness, but not so the Quarterly, for which "the scorn is open and the anger hot." Amid it all we really see nothing of sufficient interest to call for special remark, and we earnestly hope that this dull repetition, with variations, of the wretched common-places and "dreary arguments" of Mr. Maurice, will show more clearly than ever to some what is, or is not to be, expected from him as the apostle of this generation. We close his essay with a uniform feeling of weariness and dissatisfaction; and whether it be his "everlasting yea, or his everlasting no," whatever be the subject, or whatever the occasion, we feel that he is more glittering and showy than solid and real.

The third tract is by the Rev. F. Garden, on "The Atonement as a Fact and as a Theory." The writer gives an account of what is commonly meant by the word atonement, and of the variations of opinion which have taken place in different ages in regard to the work of Christ. He does not approve of such terms as vicarious and substitutional, as applied to the sufferings of Christ, in which he finds neither penalty nor punishment. He does admit that the death of Christ was a sacrifice; but the construction which he puts upon that word sacrifice, is one in which he will not find many concur. "In truth," he says, "when we look at the whole genus—of which burnt-offerings, sin-offerings, thank-offerings, are the several species—we are forced to regard the generic idea as that of offering and making over a gift to the unseen object of prayer and worship!" He therefore considers "gift to God" as the main and governing meaning of sacrifice; and this idea he extends and applies to the Sacrifice of the Cross. "There is no point at which the offerer pauses. The self-surrender stays not, till the very life has been offered. The obedience is carried on until it becomes an obedience unto death." We might ask: What made such a gift necessary, or possible, or acceptable; or how could it be of advantage to us; or why it involved a violent death under such extraordinary circumstances; or how the death of any son of man can be a gift of life to God, in any proper sense? &c., &c. Some of these questions Mr. Garden seems quite to overlook, or not to feel the force of; and, therefore, we regard his answer to one of them as hollow, rather superficial than profound, and calculated to suggest, rather than to satisfy, inquiry. "And we may see how the union of Christ with His brethren renders this gift propitiatory in its effects upon them." (The Italics are ours.) "For it is human nature which He has offered up in spotless sacrifice to the Father; the whole race is represented in Him. He is the head and the root of all mankind. Therefore mankind now stands accepted before God, and every sharer in the kind may at once plead and occupy the righteous position which has been won for it by the accepted sacrifice of its great Representative." Alas for us, if this is the true doctrine of Sacrifice, Propitiation, and Atonement! Surely it behoves us to be in earnest in the defence and exposition of the scriptural view, when crude speculations like these come from the Sub-Dean of Her Majesty's Chapels Royal. "Another clergyman" has added some "comments" upon this tract, partly agreeing and partly not agreeing with it; but by no means to our taste.

The fourth tract, by the Rev. J. Ll. Davies, is "The Signs of the Kingdom of Heaven: an Appeal to Scripture upon the Question of Miracles." Mr. Davies believes in the miracles of the Gospel, several of which are specified; but he does not view them in the light in which we have been wont to regard them. He says that "the philosophical conception of a miracle, as an interference with the laws of nature, is entirely absent from the New Testament books." Of course it is, because the New Testament is not occupied with philosophical conceptions, but with positive statements; but this is no proof that miracles were not an interference with the laws of nature. Yet he says that "whilst the philosophical and (to speak technically) evidential definition of miracles is thus entirely absent from the Scriptures, there is no doubt that the wonderful, and powerful, and divinely-wrought nature of the works of Christ and His Apostles is plainly set forth." With this we agree, and are quite willing the case should be so stated, but surely these very works were an evidence of something, every sign is an evidence of something, and the only question is, of what are miracles an evidence or a sign? Now, however positive Mr. Davies may be in his statements, he does not by any means dispose of the fact—for it is a fact—that Christ and His Apostles, and the Church in all ages, have appealed to miracles as a reason for faith, or why men should believe. There are numerous points in this essay with which we quite concur, but we disapprove of many of its details, and of its general tone and character. It is ingenious and even able, but the impression it leaves upon our mind is most unsatisfactory, for we do not see how such a composition can produce any beneficial influence upon those who follow such men as Baden Powell. There are two classes of men in the world, those who believe, and those who doubt, and these regard miracles very differently. Mr. Davies may satisfy some who believe, but he will not convince those who doubt—perhaps he would not try.

The fifth tract contains two essays, one by the Rev. C. K. P., on "The Boundaries of the Church," and another by Mr. J. N. Langley, on "The Message of the Church."

The essay of C. K. P. is radically objectionable, and is one of the most decided pleas for Latitudinarian practices which we have seen. The boundaries of the Church of England are made to be no boundaries at all, and it is difficult to see what doctrinal opinions are inconsistent with membership and subscription, if C. K. P. is correct. Views which we hold in abhorrence are here declared perfectly compatible with a professed adhesion to the formularies, etc., of the Church. Mr. Langley is the worthy companion of C. K. P.—Arcades ambo. He calls himself an ex-Dissenter, and writes a remarkably self-satisfied, self-confident, and superficial essay. Such hollow and namby-pamby composition has seldom come into our hands, at least from a man of culture and education. The subjects touched upon in both these essays are doubtless very important; but we utterly demur to the explanations which they contain. The writers are very different in many respects; and, indeed, have not much in common, except the negative and questionable qualities we have indicated. We feel sure that their papers will cause profound sorrow to every sincere and faithful member of the Established Church who may chance to read them in the expectation of being instructed and edified.

Number six also contains two essays—one by Mr. J. M. Ludlow, "A Dialogue on Doubt;" and one by the Rev. F. D. Maurice, on "Morality and Divinity." These papers have as their general title, "The Sermon of the Bishop of Oxford on Revelation, and the Layman's Answer." The Bishop's discourse furnishes the occasion for some severe hits by Mr. Ludlow, and is, in fact, the text on which he hangs his dialogue on doubt. This question of doubt is one of real difficulty, and occasionally we agree with Mr. Ludlow in what he says of it. Its real character, as sinful or innocent, must depend upon circumstances, and it is far from right either always to denounce it as a vice, or to exalt it as a virtue. Doubt is a sign of weakness and of imperfection, and it may be a symptom of moral disease, as much as of intellectual incapacity. It is all very grand to say, "The doubt I am referring to is full of faith." It is precisely that doubt which justifies the golden lines of our poet—

"There lives more faith in honest doubt, Believe me, than in half the creeds."

The doubt that is attended by faith is an accident, and a burden which faith ever strives to remove. It comes as a temptation, and an enemy, with which faith is ever in conflict till it overcomes. However, we have not space to discuss the question, and we have no doubt that our readers will agree with us in thinking it unnecessary. Mr. Maurice starts with the same subject of doubt, and fastens, as his text, upon a passage in a pamphlet by a layman, which appeared at Oxford in reply to two sermons by the bishop of that diocese. The passage in question calls attention to the Christianity of the Sermon on the Mount; a capital, or at least a congenial, theme for Mr. Maurice, who is quite at home in its discussion, and who finds an apt occasion for the exercise of his peculiar faculties. He is a wonderful man, and in his own opinion knows how to set aside what has been commonly taught, and to substitute for it something better. We scarcely know which most to admire, his happy art of depreciating the views of other men, or his unbounded assurance in propounding his own. We are so sick of his incessant ipse dixit, that we must request the readers to judge of this essay for themselves, if they are sufficiently interested in it to read it.

The seventh, and for the present, the last of the tracts, is by Mr. J. M. Ludlow. It contains two dialogues, on "Laws of Nature, and the Faith Therein;" and "On Positive Philosophy." It is our duty to confess that we find in this tract more of which we approve than in any of the others. There is, in fact, so little to object to, and that little almost entirely relating to abstract philosophical questions and opinions, that we have no reluctance to recommend the essay to our readers. Like Mr. Ludlow, we have arrived at the conclusion that the philosophy of Comte is in many respects most dangerous and objectionable; and we think his refutation of some of Comte's principles is excellent.

And now looking back over the series of seven, we are constrained to recognise considerable diversities among the writers, and these diversities relate not to mere forms of expression, but of opinion; not merely to minor details, but to leading principles. And yet these gentlemen have agreed, almost without exception, to direct their forces against their common opponents. They represent a party which cannot be identified with the Oxford Reviewers, nor with the High Church, nor with the Evangelicals. Broad they may be, and comprehensive, and liberal;* but it strikes us that so incongruous a school—incongruous in its elements as well as in its aspects—is not destined to be enduring or powerful. It may commend itself to some; its novelty may attract, but it cannot long cohere; and the speckled theology, like all others not essentially scriptural, will soon pass away. It is a new theology; it is supported by some able, and earnest, and good, if misguided men, and its apostles do not fail to invite attention to it. It sometimes approaches the Essayist school, and a negative form; but there is a permanent abyss between it and them, and it will be impossible to associate them. Between them stands the good old Gospel system, and that will stand for ever. By this assuredly we stand or fall, and love and cherish it as the saving truth of God.

GINSBURG ON THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES.†

OUR readers will remember that last year we reviewed in this journal‡ Hengstenberg's Commentary on Ecclesiastes, which was issued in an English form by Messrs. Clark, of Edinburgh. We have now lying before us a far more valuable work on the same portion of Sacred Scripture—namely, Mr. Ginsburg's commentary—just issued from the press. Not that Professor Hengstenberg's work is at all devoid of value or wanting in interest, but we do think that Mr. Ginsburg's production is of such a masterly character as to throw all previous commentaries in the English language on Ecclesiastes into the shade.

On an examination of Professor Hengstenberg's arguments against the Solomonic authorship, we arrived at the conclusion that his point was "Not proven." We have seen no reason to change our opinion on a perusal of Mr. Ginsburg's book, although he sides with the German professor on this question. The matter, we admit most fully, is open to dispute, but Mr. Ginsburg has not thought it worth his while to discuss the style and language of the work in question, as he views it nearly as a settled question among scholars. We do not coincide with him on this point. We think there is still room left for discussion on both sides: that Dr. Boehl, whose able pamphlet on the subject we also reviewed last year,§ has not established beyond doubt the Solomonic authorship of the work, nor that the advocates of its later date have fully succeeded in proving their point. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the tendency of modern criticism is to discredit the traditional opinion, while we at present prefer to adhere to the popular opinion, that Solomon was its author. At the same time, we feel compelled to reject that portion of tradition which would have us believe that the book contains "Solomon's penitential dirge and lamentation over his sins;" for, although it may have been written by Solomon at the close of his life, and may contain a review of his varied experience, it was not designed to express any penitence on account of his acts, but rather to show the unsatisfying nature of all purely human efforts to obtain happiness. As we have remarked in our previous reviews, the great points of the inspiration of the book, and its profitableness "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," are left untouched and unharmed, whichever way the question may be decided; and we protest against the opinion that a "pious fraud" must needs be supposed to have been committed, if the opinion be adopted, that Solomon is adduced, not as being the actual author of the book, but as being the most illustrious representative of wisdom.

* They are essentially Maurician as a whole: the presence of Mr. Maurice does not make them altogether so.

We are not, however, going to discuss this subject a second time, but must refer our readers to what we have previously written. One peculiarly-interesting feature of this work of Mr. Ginsburg, which is likewise to be found in his valuable commentary on the Song of Songs, is the historical sketch of the exegesis of the book commented on. The commentary itself is most copious, and affords most valuable information and assistance to the Hebrew student. The opinions of the Jewish commentators have not been neglected, and, independently of many points of intrinsic excellence, are of interest in tracing the influence which they have had in moulding the views of the early Reformational divines, and through them the commentators of later date.

The view which Mr. Ginsburg takes of the opening portion of chapter iii. is different from that commonly held. That chapter has been generally supposed to teach the mutability of earthly things—joy and sorrow, rest and labour, death and life, having each their appointed time, and following alternately on the earth. Mr. Ginsburg, however, rather holds that this chapter is the beginning of the second section of the book, in which it is shown that industry cannot secure happiness to man, and the immutable fixedness of all the events of life is adduced in order to show the abortiveness of human labour. Notwithstanding all the efforts of man, the time of birth and death is fixed as well for man as for other created things, and even the apparently fortuitous events of sudden death and of unexpected preservation are all predetermined, so that joy and sorrow are likewise foreordained. Industry, therefore, is as unable as wisdom or pleasure to obtain real happiness for man, and therefore another premiss is laid down of the long sorites, the conclusion of which is that true happiness is found only in fearing God and keeping His commandments.

Mr. Ginsburg has correctly rendered the passage, ch. iii. 10, 11, thus: "I have considered the business which God hath given to the sons of men to busy themselves therewith; He hath made it all beautiful in its season; He hath also put eternity into their heart, only that man understandeth not the work which God hath made from beginning to end." His explanation of it is, that, "on examining the employments which God has assigned to man, Coheleth found that the benign Creator has made them beautiful in their respective seasons; that in addition to this excellent order of things, He has also implanted in the hearts of men a desire for that which is beyond time, and that the failure of man's efforts to secure lasting good is owing to his ignorance of the works of God." We coincide most fully with the rendering of עולם by "eternity," instead of by "the world" (as it is rendered by the ancient versions, our authorised version, Gesenius, and many others), because in no place of the Old Testament is this signification ever attached to the Hebrew word, and it is used unquestionably in all the other places of this very book in the ordinary sense, and there is no good reason why this should be an exception. Mr. Ginsburg also remarks that there is an evident antithesis in the verse between עולם and עַתָּה, and that the particle כִּי, "also," which introduces this clause, shows beyond doubt that there is a gradation in the description of the doings of God—i.e., 'He has not only made everything beautiful in its season, but has done something greater or grander still;’ and to say that this consists in infatuating man, by implanting in his heart the world, or worldly wisdom, or cares, or pleasures, is most incongruous.”

The common error, to be met with every day, of quoting texts of Scripture in support of various truths, without carefully considering whether the application be warranted by the context, receives a striking illustration from the mode in which ch. iii. 21 is often cited. Following the rendering of our authorised version, “Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?” it has frequently been supposed that this is a lamentation over the blindness of man, who considers not the difference between his soul and that of the beast that perisheth, and that therefore the passage teaches that there is a radical difference between the one and the other. The doctrine deduced is indeed sound, but the passage it is deduced from has nothing whatever to say to the question. Mr. Ginsburg has rightly viewed the passage in a far different sense. His translation of it is: “No one knoweth whether the spirit of man goeth upward, and whether the spirit of the beast goeth downward to the earth,” considering the interrogative “who knoweth” to be used in the passage “for an emphatic denial,” as it is frequently used in that sense in Scripture. The context of the passage is, Cohoeleth is showing the fruitlessness of man’s labour; that there is nothing left for him but to quietly enjoy life, which itself will not cause satisfaction to his mind, as nothing will, apart from the duty laid down in ch. xii. 13. Man and beast, he has shown, have the same perishable nature, and who can show that it fares differently with their spirits? The destiny of the soul is beyond human knowledge, and can only be known from revelation; and “Cohoeleth therefore throws the burden of the argument upon his opponents,” as Mr. Ginsburg rightly remarks.

From Mr. Ginsburg’s interpretation of the latter clause of ch. v. 5 we entirely dissent. That clause is: “Neither say thou before the angel that it was an error.” He explains it thus: “If the mouth has been indulged, and the vow violated, the sin of prevarication is not to be added unto it, by declaring in the presence of the angel presiding over the altar that it was (שְׁנֵי שְׁנֵי) a mistaken vow.” Mr. Ginsburg seems to regard angels to have been placed as sentries over various portions of the Temple, and not only so, but, as we shall see hereafter, over the sun and the various phenomena of nature. Much more in conformity with the analogy of Scripture would it be to regard “the angel” spoken of, if viewed as present in the Temple, not, as Mr. Ginsburg considers him to have been, a created angel, but as the Angel of the Covenant, who is in the midst of his people. We are, however, inclined to look upon the opinion of Rashi, followed by Gesenius, Hengstenberg, and others, as preferable—namely, that by “the angel” the “priestly order” is meant; and we cannot look upon the appeal to Mal. ii. 7, 8 as “nugatory,” but rather as confirmatory of this opinion.

It is, however, the note which follows this exposition of Mr. Ginsburg at which we are amazed. His sketch of angelic employments would be all very well if set forward as current Jewish belief, but we object to it being considered as Scripture revelations concerning angels. We are more surprised when we find Mr. Ginsburg quoting the Books of Tobit, Enoch, &c., as if of authority with, or explanatory of, the Holy Scriptures. Perhaps he does not intend us to understand him so, but there is no hint given that he thinks otherwise.

Worthy only of heathen mythology do we regard the notion that the angels occupy different ranks and offices in various departments of God’s government, arranged thus: The cabinet, composed of “Michael, the prime minister;” Raphael, sanitary commissioner (of course true, because St. Jerome thinks so, and Tobit iii. 17, xii. 15; Enoch xl. 8, prove it); Gabriel, Uriel, and three others. “Next to the cabinet comes the privy council (סֵדֶר הַמְּלָכִים), Psalm lxxxix. 6—8; 1 Kings xxii. 19; Daniel iv. 14, vii. 10), composed of four-and-twenty crowned elders (Rev. iv. 4, &c., vii. 13, &c., viii. 3, &c., and compare v. 8), who surround the throne of God (Rev. xi. 16; Isaiah xxiv. 23), before whom Christ will confess those who confessed Him, and deny those who denied Him." (Luke xii. 8, 9.) "Then comes the council, consisting of the seventy angel-princes, the provincial governors presiding over the affairs of the seventy nations into which the human family is divided. . . . Then comes the innumerable company of presence-angels, since every individual has a guardian angel as well as every nation. . . . Then there are angels who preside over all the phenomena of nature; an angel presides over the sun (Rev. xix. 17); angels guard the storm and lightning (Psalms civ. 4; Heb. i. 7); four angels have charge over the four winds (Rev. vii. 1, 2); an angel presides over the waters (Rev. xvi. 5); an angel also presides over the altar in the Temple." (Ibid xiv. 18.)!!!!

We stand aghast at this note. Does Mr. Ginsburg really believe what he writes on angelic employment, or does he mean to reduce Scripture notions to as low a level as the wildest vagaries of heathen mythology? We hope he has too much sense for the former; we cannot think that one who defends so ably the canonicity of Ecclesiastes, and who everywhere expresses his belief in inspiration, could intend the latter. Can it be that he considers Scripture phraseology to be borrowed from Jewish superstitious belief, though used in a different signification? We cannot answer the query ourselves. We hope Mr. Ginsburg will solve our enigma.

Many are the passages which Mr. Ginsburg has opened up satisfactorily, and on which we would fain lay his translations and expositions before our readers. One only, in addition to those we have cited, we would now comment on. It is found in the closing section of the book. We must give Mr. Ginsburg's translation:—

"Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in thy youthful days, and pursue the ways of thine heart, and the things which are seen by the eyes, and know that, respecting all these, God will bring thee into judgment. Banish, therefore, sorrow from thy mind, and put away sadness from thy body, for youth and manhood are vanity; and remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, before the days of evil come, and the years arrive of which thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them: before the sun becometh dark, and the light, and the moon, and the stars, and the clouds return after the rain; when the keepers of the house shall quake, and the men of power writhe, and the grinding-maids shall stop because they have greatly diminished, and the women who look out of the windows shall be shrouded in darkness; and the doors shall be closed in the street; when the noise of the mill shall grow faint, and the swallow shall rise to shriek, and all the singing birds shall retire; yea, the people shall be frightened at that which is coming from on high, and at the terrors which are on their way; and the almond shall be despised, and the locust shall be loathed, and the caper-berry shall be powerless; for man goeth to his eternal home, and the mourners walk about the street: before the silver cord goeth asunder, and the golden bowl escapeth, or the bucket breaketh upon the fountain, and the wheel is shattered at the well, and the body returneth to the earth as it was, and the spirit goeth back to God who gave it."

Mr. Ginsburg views the description here, not as an allegorical picture of wretched old age, as it is generally understood, but as the approach of death viewed as the approach of a gathering storm, when the splendour of heaven is obscured by the clouds ever and anon coming charged with fresh rain—when masters and servants flee, alike stricken with terror, and business is wholly put a stop to—when the terror is so great that the delicious fruit of the almond is left untouched, the locust (which is an agreeable food in the East) loathed, and when even the caper-berry, which was used as a provocative of appetite, fails to arouse a desire for food. A like terror, a similar desolation, does death inspire and bring upon the house when it enters. The approach of death being thus described, Cobeleth passes on to describe its arrival: "To impress upon our minds more deeply the awfulness of that encounter, and the necessity of remembering the Creator before death strikes the final blow, the sacred writer describes the dissolution of man under two different metaphors. In the first part of the verse the breaking up of the human machine and extinction of life are compared to the snapping asunder of the silver cord, by which a burning lamp is suspended from the ceiling, dashing into pieces the golden reservoir of oil which imparts the vital fluid to the branches where the wicks are placed, and extinguishing the light." The second metaphor is taken from the working of a well, "and just as when the bucket or wheel is broken, the machine is incapable of service and useless, so man may be unable to draw comforts from the remembrance of the Creator, when the inroads of death have shattered his frame and impaired his faculties."

We had intended to give our views on the various criticisms whereby Mr. Ginsburg supports his peculiar renderings; but we are forced to cut short our remarks, lest we should be tedious. We may say, however, we much prefer this simple exposition to the passage to the allegorical one, which explains the allusions to refer at one time, to "a bad influenza, accompanied with never-ceasing snuffing," frequent to old age; which explains "the female grinders" to mean "the teeth"—the women looking out of the windows, "the eyes," and would have us to understand, by some passages, the old man's blood having grown cold, and "the moisture being dried up, whereby sleep is nourished, he awakens at the slightest sound, and in the middle of the night, when the cock crows, he rises quickly, not being able frequently to turn his limbs in bed," &c., &c. We did once, indeed, acquiesce in this interpretation, but not without serious doubts of its correctness. Mr. Ginsburg's interpretation seems natural, as it is defensible, on grounds of just criticism. As to the allusions supposed to be made in chapter xii., to the discoveries of modern anatomy, they are chiefly based on mistakes in our authorised version, valuable though it is, and turn out, when sifted by modern criticism, to be illusions.

Foreign Intelligence.

THE support which, under repeated provocations and insults, the Government of France continues to afford to the Roman Pontiff, is described by our correspondent as naturally giving rise, in the public mind, to feelings of impatience and irritation. The present letter, like so many that have preceded it, especially of late, has its tale of priestly intrigue, rapacity, and imposture. Two cases are stated having reference to religious liberty—one bearing upon the custom which compels all persons to uncover in the streets, on the passing of a Popish procession carrying the host; the other, the question as to the opening of the Protestant schools, so long closed, in the Haute-Vienne. It will be seen that since the receipt of our correspondent's letter this last matter has been decided favourably to the Protestants, who are at length allowed to re-open their schools.

An account of the religious anniversaries in Geneva is followed by a copious abstract of the address of the venerable President of the Theological Seminary. This will be read with interest, from its bearing upon the approaching Conference of the Evangelical Alliance. Dr. Merle d'Aubigné's aspirations for the welfare of the National Church of Geneva will not fail to excite attention.

The particulars respecting the opening of the Vaudois Church at Turin affords fresh evidence of the difficulties encountered from the priests and their friends by any Government bent upon carrying out the principles of religious liberty in Italy, and of the indomitable resolve of the Minister now at the helm of State, to whom our correspondent applies the honourable designation of the "Cromwell of Tuscany," that those difficulties shall, in every case, be overcome.

A communication from Germany presents our readers with a good general view of the "Festival Week" in the valley of the Wupper. The pastoral conference, and religious anniversaries were numerously attended, and were characterised by features specially their own.

A variety of interesting information appears from the American missions in Turkey and Persia. The condition of their finances renders pecuniary aid more necessary than ever.

Letters will also be found from China, Africa, and Polynesia.

FRANCE.

Paris, August, 1861.

VACILLATION OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT ON THE ROMAN QUESTION.

We are witnessing a very strange spectacle. For twelve years French troops have protected at Rome the power and personal safety of Pius IX. Everybody is quite convinced that if our soldiers were recalled, a revolution would immediately overthrow the temporal authority of the Pope and the cardinals. To support the Pontifical Government France has spared neither men nor money. It is calculated by one journal that since 1849 more than a thousand millions of francs (forty millions sterling) have been expended by our country in the accomplishment of this task.

Well, far from being grateful for such important service, Pius IX. and his councillors have transformed Rome into a permanent centre for plotting against Napoleon III. and his dynasty. This hostility is no secret to anybody. If the power of the cardinals were equal to their resentment, the Emperor of the French would not retain his crown a day longer. The king after their heart is the heir of the Bourbons, the Pretender Henry V. There is now at Rome a very influential prelate, the Pro-Minister for Military Affairs, M. de Mérode, a Belgian by birth, who, addressing the French general, M. de Goyon, has dared to utter against Napoleon III. the most atrocious abuse. The Emperor's Cabinet has demanded reparation, which has not been obtained. M. de Mérode is always seated in the Pope's councils, and he is constantly repeating his insulting language. His violence knows no bounds, and his enmity he cares not to conceal by the slightest disguise.

Such are the facts. And yet our troops continue to protect Pius IX. at the expense of the national exchequer! It must be admitted that public opinion begins to be moved to indignation by such incredible forbearance. Men of good sense ask how the French Government can still hesitate as to the measures that ought to be taken by them. Is it not time to abandon these ungrateful priests to their own strength, or rather, to their own weakness? They will see, after our soldiers are gone, if they are able, by themselves, to maintain a tyrannical and odious power, which, for many a generation, has excited the hatred of the Romans and the contempt of humanity!

VOL. XV.—II. NEW SERIES.—SEPTEMBER.

circumstances, an indecision, I might almost say a timidity, which is not in accordance with his character or habits. He has more than once been bold to a degree which deserves to be called temerity; and here, in the face of insults, constantly repeated, he displays a complaisance which might be described by a harsher word! What is the cause of this? What mysterious fear, what occult power paralyses the Emperor's energy? It is certain that his popularity has suffered from this irresolution. The French do not like to see the civil power shrink back before the threats of priests. Old and sad experience has taught them that the clergy make a bad master. Besides, why this delay? But one solution of the Romish question is possible, and sooner or later it will be realised. The Pope must cease to be a temporal prince; his incapacity in these matters is irremediable. Let Napoleon III. hasten to withdraw his troops from Rome! It is his right and his duty. The voice of the country will applaud this act of prudence and justice.

DEATH OF FATHER VENTURA.

The name of Father Ventura has sometimes figured in our correspondence. He had acquired among us a certain celebrity by the strangeness of his character and opinions. The Emperor even appointed him, two or three years ago, to preach the Lent sermons in the chapel of the Tuileries. This Italian monk has just died at Versailles. Here are some biographical details of this singular personage.

Ventura de Rauliou was born at Palermo, in the month of December, 1792. He belonged to one of the aristocratic families of Sicily. He entered, in his youth, a monastery of the Theatines—a monastic order, founded in the sixteenth century, for agitating the masses of the people, and little known out of Italy. Father Ventura retained, under the habit of a monk, a restless mind, remarkable views, and ardent passions. He for some time occupied the post of Chaplain of the University of Rome. At that period he inclined towards democracy, and translated into the Italian language the works of the illustrious Lamenais. In 1848 he represented, at the Papal Court, the revolutionary Government of Sicily. When the republic was proclaimed at Rome by Mazzini, Father Ventura became one of its warmest partizans. On his return from Gaeta, Pius IX. pronounced against him a sentence of excommunication and banishment. The Italian monk took refuge in France—first at Montpellier, and then at Paris. There he passed from one extreme to the other; and after having been a fiery demagogue, he became the most violent of Ultramontanes. This was apparently to atone for his former eccentricities. As he spoke somewhat fluently the French language, he occupied the Romish pulpits, and excited the attention of the multitude by his doctrinal exaggerations. He solicited, on his deathbed, by the electric telegraph, the Pope's pardon and benediction. The favour was granted him, through the same medium—a curious thing that electricity should be used in Pontifical benedictions! The Superior-General of the Theatins proceeded to Versailles in order to seize the monk's papers; for they contained documents which might have injured the Church of Rome.

The Monde, a Jesuit journal, has published an interesting letter on the opinions expressed by Father Ventura during his last days. I regret that want of space prevents my giving extracts. The monk had a great aversion to Gallicanism, and a profound contempt for modern philosophy, which he called Paganism. He said that for three centuries—in other words, since Luther—the Christian (read Popish) idea had been the object of an absurd and impious war. "Out of Roman Catholicism," said he, "you will find only slavery, oppression, and materialism in literature; atheism in education; the degradation of woman, lying accounted honourable. . . . Such, at the present moment, is European society; it cannot live."

Father Ventura detested the alliance of France and England. This was very natural on his part. He affirmed that the English are selfish, despotic, full of ungovernable pride, and that they spread everywhere oppression and death (!). Such abuse as this is really praise.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS AGAINST AN ABBE AND A NUN.

The prosecutions which have taken place against certain Popish ecclesiastics on account of their extortion, irregularities, and crimes, are become so numerous, that it would take too long to narrate them. It would be, moreover, only the wearisome repetition of the same scandals. Nevertheless, the Court of Appeal in Paris lately pronounced judgment upon an affair which presents some remarkable features.

The accused were the Abbé Bouland, formerly director of a monastic community at Strasburg, doctor in divinity, author of several ecclesiastical works, and chief editor of the Rosier de Marie, a periodical publication; and a lady named Adèle Chevalier, Abbess of the convent of the Reparation, and considered by the devotees as a saint. These two persons, you see, had a great reputation.

Adèle Chevalier had been the subject of a supernatural cure. Being threatened with the loss of her sight, she had recourse to the miraculous waters of the Virgin of La Salette, and her infirmity immediately yielded to the employment of that means. The news of the wonderful cure spread throughout the surrounding country, and the Bishop of Versailles directed his vicar-general to institute an inquiry into the matter. That high ecclesiastical functionary drew up a report, in which he said, "I hesitate not here to admit a supernatural intervention of the Mother of God!" Such are the disgraceful frauds invented by the clergy to seduce the imagination of the common people!

Encouraged by such powerful support, Adèle Chevalier affirmed that she was in direct communication with the Virgin Mary, and that she frequently received, by mysterious voices, revelations from the "Mother of God!" She pretended that Mary had dictated to her, word by word, a long series of regulations for the organization of a monastic community, called the Institution for the Reparation of Souls. She was also prophetically inspired. At length she undertook, in concert with the Abbé Bouland, her confessor, miraculous cures; she pretended, especially, to restore those who were suffering from diabolical maladies. I cannot indicate the remedies she employed in these operations, which were half medical, half magical: it is too revolting.

The community of the Reparation of Souls soon became very celebrated. Priests wrote to the Abbé Bouland and Sister Adèle Chevalier, inquiring how they could obtain the favour and benediction of the Virgin Mary. Ladies of high rank put questions to them touching incredible cases of conscience. What sad ignorance, what extravagant superstition, on the part of the Romish population! This abbé and this nun—two mere conjuring impostors—were looked upon as the interpreters of the will of God! Their commands were regarded as infallible!

But public opinion was soon shocked by disgraceful scandals. The Abbé Bouland and Sister Adèle Chevalier, inflated apparently by their success, imposed upon their degrading passions no restraint whatever. Anything but strict decorum was prevalent in the new convent. The director and the directress themselves presented a spectacle of disgusting immorality. They also extorted, by the vilest means, large sums of money. They seized, among other sums, 20,000 francs from poor people, alleging, as their authority, a secret conversation of Sister Adèle with the Virgin!

But such serious irregularities could not last. The Bishop of Versailles received numerous remonstrances and complaints against the abbé and the nun. The magistrates, on the other hand, were also informed of what had occurred. A judicial investigation was ordered, which resulted in the discovery of abominable practices. The Abbé Bouland is a man below the middle stature, about forty years of age. His physiognomy bears the impress of fraud and cunning. Sister Chevalier is twenty-nine; she has an easy manner in speaking, and affects an air of mysticism. They have been condemned—the Abbé Bouland to three, and Adèle Chevalier to two years' imprisonment. They richly deserve the punishment.

ONE OF MOLIERE'S COMEDIES FORBIDDEN AT LYONS.

Your readers who have studied French literature doubtless know the name of Molière, the greatest of our comic poets. They are equally aware that one of his best pieces is entitled Tartuffe. It is a life-like picture of a hypocrite, who, while assuming a cloak of piety and holiness, carries sorrow and disgrace into an honest family, and is guilty of the most infamous conduct. This comedy has been played for two centuries upon every stage in France. Well! in the city of Lyons, a few weeks ago, the representation of Tartuffe was prohibited!

When the liberal press of Paris learned this unaccountable fact, there was very strong feeling excited. Who had dared to prevent the representation of a piece that had been authorised even by Louis XIV.? The Minister of State, who presides over the department of the fine arts, hastened to declare in the journals that he had taken no part in the matter. The responsibility fell upon another personage. It appears that the Prefect of Lyons, being desirous of performing an act which should be agreeable to the cardinal-archbishop, had, by his own authority, interdicted the comedy of Molière. But the outrage upon public opinion was too great, and Government disapproved of this excess of complaisance towards the clergy. The consequence is that Tartuffe has been again placed upon the play-bills of the Lyons theatre, and an immense crowd has hailed with applause this piece, in which hypocrisy is so justly chastised. Our public functionaries ought to learn that the will of the priests is not absolute, and that there are limits which cannot be overstepped upon questions in which the national honour is involved.

DISPUTE ON THE SUBJECT OF A ROMAN PROCESSION.

French Protestantism has attracted the notice of the political press more than once of late. We have among our liberal-minded men those who kindly plead our cause, not because they share our doctrines, but because they love liberty. This is a valuable help to us. The civil authorities are too accustomed to exercise intolerance towards the Protestants; but they will be more circumspect when they see that the majority of citizens demand religious equality.

There is at Fresnoy-le-Grand, a little town in the North of France, a population of 300 Protestants, for the most part new converts. They are men of peaceful habits, and deservedly respected. In their pastor, M. Lequenne, prudence is combined with piety. The priests of the neighbourhood have been greatly irritated by the conversations which have taken place, and they sought occasion for creating a disturbance. The day of a solemn festival being come, they organised a pompous public procession, at the hour when Protestant worship is celebrated, and erected an altar at the very door of the pastor's house. This was a decided provocation. Moreover, police-agents compelled every individual who happened to pass the same way as the procession to take off his hat. A most worthy Protestant, going to church, unfortunately met the procession. He refused to uncover to what he, in his conscience, deemed to be objects of idolatry. The chief of the fire brigade, who had taken more wine than was good for him, then struck the Protestant a blow which knocked off his hat. Our co-religionist, who was for a long time a subaltern in the army, returned the blow. A great disturbance followed. The Protestant was summoned before the tribunals, and sentenced to pay a fine of 100 francs for having committed an act of violence against an agent of a legally-armed force. The judges admit that there were extenuating circumstances, i confessed that the Protestant had been ill-treated.

I shall only make one reflection on this affair. The law says that in the communes where there are Protestants the processions must not be public. This is a wise regulation, for the streets and squares in towns belong to citizens of every class, without distinction. The priests of Fresnoy-le-Grand, therefore, violated the law. They, at the same time, made an appeal to brute force. If the public peace was disturbed, who was in fault? Can a Protestant be compelled to perform an act which violates his conscience?

INTOLERANT PROCEEDINGS AGAINST PROTESTANT SCHOOLS.

I have frequently had occasion to speak of the Protestant schools which have been forbidden for nine years past in the department of the Haute-Vienne. Renewed remonstrances were addressed on this subject to the prefect of the department. But that magistrate maintained the prohibition, saying, at the same time, in an official ordinance, that "these schools are established by the Evangelical Society, whose object is to spread its doctrines by all the means which God has placed at its disposal, and that, consequently, these schools would become institutions of religious propagandism." Is not this a singular motive for prohibition? Is religious proselytism a legal offence in a country where religious liberty and equality are proclaimed? Why should the Protestants not have the right to propagate their belief, if they employ only the means of legitimate persuasion? And is not the authority of heads of families, who wish to send their children to a Protestant school, contravened and set at nought by the decision of this prefect?

Observe also that, in the case of one of these schools, established in the village of Villefavard, there is this aggravating circumstance, that the population is entirely Protestant, with the exception of four or five families, who keep a Roman Catholic school. The state of things is sad and singular. A handful of Papists have a communal school for their children, and the numerous Protestants of Villefavard cannot have one for theirs. Did you ever hear of a more flagrant and disgraceful piece of injustice? Alas! religious liberty is still but little understood and little practised in France.

ASSOCIATION OF PIOUS LAYMEN AT PARIS.

In my last two or three letters, I mentioned the formation of a Liberal Protestant Union, which, under the pretext of protecting free examination and mutual support, attacked the fundamental principles of the Gospel. This demonstration of Rationalism has led to the establishment of an Orthodox Association at Paris. The heads of the most ancient and most respected families among the French Protestants, such as MM. Cottier, de Chabaud-Latour, Delessert, Hottinguer, Mallet, Labouchère, Vernes, and others, have put forth their signatures in opposition to the programme of the society. They announce that their object is to defend the faith of the Apostles and the Reformers, the divinity of the Saviour, redemption by His sacrifice, and the authority of the Holy Scriptures. This institution is a cheering sign of the revival of piety among our Protestant Churches.

X. X. X.

[We are glad to be able to supplement our correspondent's letter by the gratifying intelligence, that in consequence of an intimation to the local authorities of the districts of the Haute-Vienne (in which the schools referred to above are situated), Jusnel and the other Protestant teachers will be allowed to open those schools for the children of their co-religionists. The following notice appears in the Archives de Christianisme of August 20:—

"We learn that the re-opening of the Evangelical Schools has just been determined upon by the Departmental Council of the Haute-Vienne, in accordance with instructions received from the Minister of Public Instruction, and from the Prefect of the Department.

"The Council, in its sitting of August 14, withdrawing the opposition against teacher Jusnel, authorised him to open a special school at Balledent, for the Evangelical Christians, on condition of receiving only the children of his co-religionists. It is understood that the other teachers may also open their schools on the same conditions.

"Instead of discussing the conditions laid down, the Evangelical teachers have accepted them. . . . The re-opening after nine years of these schools, closed in consequence of a false interpretation of the law, proves once again that we must never consider a good cause as definitively lost."]

SWITZERLAND.

RELIGIOUS ANNIVERSARIES AT GENEVA.

The anniversaries of the different religious institutions which have their seat at Geneva, took place this year as usual, and occupied three days. Although they attracted fewer strangers than ordinary—doubtless on account of the anticipated grand Conferences of the Evangelical Alliance in September—they were very interesting, and have once more shown that Geneva is the centre of a Christian activity precious for the cause of Protestantism. We regret to be unable to give more than a brief, though succinct, account of the various operations of the several societies.

The Bible Society has circulated during the year, either by its colporteurs, or by issues from its dépôts, about 1,000 Bibles, 2,000 New Testaments, and nearly 15,000 religious tracts. The committee has proposed to the other Bible Societies of Switzerland a joint action, to present a copy of the Word of God to each of the inhabitants of Glaris, whose Bibles were lost in the calamity by which that city has been visited. An association of Bible-readers, connected with the society, numbers thirty-two members, of whom twenty are ladies, and has already, notwithstanding its very recent institution, been enabled to effect some good.

The Missionary Society, which divides the amount of its receipts between the societies of Basle and of Paris, has received during the year more than 34,000*fr.*, which is the largest amount it has ever obtained. To this (as was understood) must be added 4,500*fr.* received by the Ladies' Association of the National Church, and, lastly, 9,000*fr.* raised by the Missionary Penny Society. Two young missionaries, pupils of the Free Theological Seminary—who are now ready to set out, the one for India, and the other for Africa—took farewell of the Christians of Geneva, at a special meeting for that purpose.

The Society for the Dispersed Protestants does not render account of its labours at this period of the year, but it held a public conference, at which details full of interest were given respecting the efforts made in several Swiss cantons (amongst others those of Fribourg and Valais), and in several departments of France, specially those of Ain, the Jura, the High Alps, and Savoy.

The Evangelical Society has received, during the year, 142,000 francs, but has expended more than 151,000. It has employed as colporteurs twenty agents—who have sold, especially in France, 1,074 Bibles, more than 4,200 New Testaments, and 37,000 religious tracts—and, in the work of evangelization, twelve ministers, six evangelists, and eleven schoolmasters, who, together, have evangelised thirty-two principal localities, and 185 sub-stations, and have conducted seventeen day-schools, and twenty-three Sunday-schools. Forty sincere conversions were reported. The Theological Seminary numbers forty-six students, of whom twenty-two are French, and three have this year completed their course of study.

[We have been favoured with a copy of the address delivered by Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, who presided at the anniversary of the Evangelical Society, the more important portions of which we have given in a separate article.]

Lastly, the Evangelical Alliance held a sitting, which was especially occupied with the Universal Conference to be held in September, the preparations made in anticipation of this great Protestant gathering, and the hope of there seeing numerous representatives of foreign churches.

Some days after these meetings, there was held in the open air, at China, a beautiful village in the environs of Geneva, a réunion for edification, convened by the pastors of the adjacent parishes, and at which were present about 700 persons, besides twenty ministers of the Holy Gospel. This festive gathering, very animated in character, but without disorder or undue excitement, and in which prayer was a main feature, has, it is said, removed or lessened most of the objections which persons otherwise pious may have made against the employment of such a means of edification.

ADDRESS OF DR. MERLE D'AUBIGNE AT THE MEETING OF THE EVANGELICAL SOCIETY OF GENEVA.

Dr. Merle d'Aubigné presided at the anniversary of the Evangelical Society. After referring to the various spheres of labour occupied by the Evangelical Society, to the various obligations specially devolving on it, and to its present circumstances, the venerable President expressed his gratification in anticipating the approaching grand Conference of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva, which was the more entitled to the attention of those present, from the fact that their own Society had been, from its foundation, a true alliance.

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

There were three fundamental principles, he observed, which were the glory of the Evangelical Alliance—brotherly love, the Word of God, and the doctrine of Jesus Christ. Brotherly love was the first motto of the Alliance. Whosoever belongs to Jesus Christ loves to be with His brethren, not only for enjoyment, but for giving and receiving good; and all the redeemed should thus form but one body. Why, it might be asked, is there not in the world one comprehensive Church, including all the children of God? Is it not mainly for these reasons: Because sin has, until now, opposed itself to the visible realisation of this grand and unique fraternity? Because there is, in Christendom, an unconverted multitude, which cares neither for Christ, nor His Word, nor the unity of His redeemed people? Because there are often unregenerate men who exert a great influence in the Church (I will only quote, as examples, many of the priests of Rome and of the East), and these clerics oppose themselves with zeal to the efforts which are made to bring together the children of God? These, however, are not the only causes which oppose the visible realisation of the unity which Christ demands. There are hierarchical ideas; there are political motives; there is the forgetfulness of the distinction between things essential and things secondary; there is a spirit of domination and of controversy; there are grave errors, which have corrupted the faith. . . . All these things have separated Christians, and the one Church thus finds itself divided into several different churches, often rivals, and even enemies. Were there some institution, originating with the Spirit of God, which should supply a remedy for this evil—which should bind together God's scattered children—so that men of the most diverse ecclesiastical attachments might exclaim, We are all one in Jesus Christ, would not that be a delightful spectacle in the history of Christianity? Such is the work of the Evangelical Alliance. Its object is to exhibit the profound and living unity of Christ's redeemed, and to convene, as forming one body, notwithstanding all differences of sect or nation, all who are beloved of the same Father, justified by the same Saviour, tokened by the same Spirit. "Such a reunion of all the Evangelical denominations is not Catholicity," was the recent assertion of one of the adversaries of the Alliance, the learned and eloquent Stahl, of Berlin. We remark that the question is not one of a union of denominations, but of Christians, and we maintain that such a union here below is, on the contrary, the most faithful realisation of true Catholicity. . . . What does the Alliance practically mean by laying down brotherly love as one of its fundamental principles? It says, We are brothers. What makes men brothers in the order of nature is, that they owe their birth to the same parents; what makes them brothers in the order of grace is, that they have received the new birth from the same God. The Evangelical Alliance says: Love the brethren. We love those towards whom our natural father shows an affection like that he has for ourselves: how then should we not love those whom our Heavenly Father has loved as ourselves, by giving both for them and us the Son whom He loved from all eternity? We love those in whom we see our Father's features: how should we not be united, in the bonds of closest affection, to those our brethren in whom God's likeness is reflected? The Alliance says, Live for your brethren, and even adds, with Augustine, "and be ready to die for them." Relieve them in their distresses, deliver them in their dangers. Let one brother be another's right hand, his eye, and the staff on which he leans. Especially let us remember those who, in a prison (as said a disciple of the first century), "confess the Lord with glorious voice." Dr. Merle d'Aubigné then dwelt on the

PRACTICAL FRUITS OF THE ALLIANCE— BROTHERLY LOVE.

Works, said he, show faith. What the Evangelical Alliance says, it has often done, and still does every year. It loved the brethren, when learning that a humble Christian and his pious wife had been thrown into the dungeons of Tuscany, because they loved God's Word, it stirred up agitation in all the countries where it had existence—when from Great Britain, from Geneva, from France, from Germany, and from Holland, several of its members set out for Italy, in order to deliver the pious and unfortunate Madial. God crowned the exertions of these brethren—the prisoners of the Lord were set at liberty, and they are now in Italy as pious distributors of the Holy Scriptures. Are the members of the Alliance reproached? Are they accused of being narrowminded men, without charity, regarding their work only in its theological aspect? To me it seems that from the prisons of Italy, of Spain, of Germany, of Sweden, and other countries, voices issue, speaking on behalf of those who themselves are silent, and exclaim: We were in prison and they visited us! The Evangelical Alliance says: Support your brethren—let the sectarian spirit disappear! It wills that each Christian should retain, and even defend, the special conviction of his own Church—the baptism of infants or of adults, for example—but that this should be done without arrogance or bitterness, with mildness, and with moderation, so as not to wound those who are of a contrary opinion. Still further, if it desires brotherly love, it demands also, like St. Peter, universal charity. Never to sacrifice the truth, never to forget charity, “to seek peace and pursue it,” such is its end. Recently there were published in this city some articles which might have occasioned disputes. In not replying to them, the Alliance and its members have shown much wisdom, as several persons have remarked with approval. Should new attacks be made, they will doubtless still answer by silence, for “contentions are the fruits of the flesh,” says the Apostle. Let us love all men, let us smooth down their angularities, let us approach all with sincere mildness, even towards those who are opposed to our religious belief. Instead of irritating them by disputes, let us seek to gain them over by love, and by those works of Christian faith which the Evangelical movement has everywhere made manifest. Yes, let whosoever will come to us, calling on the Father, washed in the blood of Immanuel, born anew by the Spirit! Let him come from far or near: whether we detect in him no fault, or find that he bears some mark of our common infirmity; whether he be fully in accord with us, or in some points differ; whether he be white or black . . . he is our brother. Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God, and whosoever loveth Him that begat, loveth Him also who is begotten of Him. . . . “Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!” But if the love of the brethren be one of the choicest fruits of the Alliance, the root is not less important—and that root is

THE WORD OF GOD.

The Word is the second column of the temple into which we invite you. Sometimes human reason, sometimes strange visions, sometimes theological formulas, have been put in the place of the Scriptures; but the men of the Alliance are the champions of the Divine Word. After brotherly love, our fundamental principles lay down as their basis the Scriptures inspired by God. Are we not right in doing this? Nevertheless, it is in this respect that a second reproach has been cast on the Alliance and its members. It has been said that—forsaking the Scriptures—they attach themselves to theological formulas. A strange reproach!—so strange that it is hardly needful to refute it. Who, for fifty years, have especially maintained the inspiration and authority of Holy Scripture? Who have especially combated that too general error, which gives to human reason the right of rejecting the oracles of God? Who have taken the largest part in the distribution of the Bible, in England, on the Continent, in every land? Who, if not the men who have most at heart the union of the members of Jesus Christ? Unquestionably the Bible is not, to them, a blank book, in which each writes what pleases him; they find in it something written by an infallible hand, and they proclaim it. But are not the Scriptures more honoured by our maintaining the supreme importance of what we find there, than by saying that it is indifferent whether we see in them black or white, provided only we receive them?

Dr. Merle d'Aubigné then referred to some special proofs given by his personal friends and colleagues of their attachment to the Scriptures, and continued: Instead, however, of defending ourselves from an accusation so groundless, let us defend the Bible—that basis of the Evangelical Alliance; this will be the simplest, shortest, and strongest reply. But it will not suffice even to defend Scripture, or to love the brethren. To be true members of the Evangelical Alliance, we must love the Word of God. We do love it, because, though in one sense human, we hear in it a voice from heaven—we behold in it, in His fulness and glory, that God who has already been in part revealed to us by the magnificence of His works, and by our own conscience. We love the Word of God, because it gives to us what is certain, infallible, and absolute, in the midst of the changing scenes of the world, and the differing opinions of men—because it dissipates all our doubts, and makes our hopes unmovable. . . . We love the Scriptures because, when we hear them, we seem to be seated at the feet of Jesus, and to hear Him. The words spoken by Jesus and His Apostles, by which the first Christians were converted, and the words of Scripture, are, in our view, the same. The men of the first century heard them with their ears, and we read them with our eyes—that is all the difference. The oral teaching of the Saviour, and the teaching of the Scripture, are identical; like the contents of a discourse of to-day, first spoken, and then printed. This is why we exhort our young brethren in the ministry to let their preaching be full, both of the spirit and the letter of the Apostolic writings—this is why we urge them to live, to think, and to speak, as with the Word of God. We love that Word, because of the inestimable treasure—the heavenly blessings—that we find in it. It delivers us from the fear of punishment; it relieves us of the burden which weighs upon our conscience; it gives us the joyful assurance of our pardon, and of our communion with God; it begins in us a new life, makes us partakers of Divine adoption, and invests us with a royal dignity. This leads us to the third foundation-stone, on which our alliance is founded, namely—

THE KNOWLEDGE OF JESUS CHRIST.

This is the third column of the temple, and that which constitutes its special beauty. "The central point," says a writer already quoted, "is God manifested in Jesus Christ. The great question is to know who was this Son of Mary, whom the Jews crucified as a blasphemer, and of whom the Apostles preached the resurrection, announcing, in His name, the remission of sins and life everlasting." The Alliance upholds that great mystery, God manifested in the flesh, and raises it as a standard around which it rallies its members. But here it meets with most objections. In these recent times, one question has been much debated—in our houses and our streets—between friends and adversaries—the latter saying that the profession of faith of the Alliance consists only of barren theological formulas, the former affirming that it is the expression of the living faith of Christians. I should delight to clear up this difference, but this is not easy; for I am anxious not to wound those who are of a contrary opinion to mine, and amongst whom are many persons whom I honour. We must first take account of the repugnance which many of the laity show for all formulas, and keep as clear as we can of mere technical theology. This concession made, we again ask: Is it true that the faith professed by the Alliance is but a formula, conceived in terms more or less scholastic, conveying nothing to a soul thirsting for light and for salvation? To solve this problem, I will make a supposition: Imagine to yourselves two men, equally upright and sincere, in front of a blackboard on which is traced with chalk, by means of the characters used in such processes, an algebraic demonstration. One of these men does not understand these signs, these formulas (not theological, but algebraic), and he leaves, affirming that the whole thing is profitless and inexplicable. The other, on the contrary—who comprehends the differences, the magnitudes, the particular values, and the general relations—is charmed and delighted to behold the important truths to which these operations conduct him. Well, is it not thus with the question now before us? Under cover of a proposition seemingly theological, there is a hidden fruit—a savoury pulp; but, to find it, preparation is needful; there must have been Divine action on the inner life—light from God's own Spirit—that Spirit working in the spirit of the man. Previous to this action, Christian truths are but barren formulas; but, after it, we find them to be full of power, of spirit, and of life.

The Evangelical Alliance, then, having required love of the brethren and of the Word, requires the true love of the true Jesus Christ. If, as has been said, it should require merely adhesion to certain formulas, it would be wrong. I am reminded, however, that the love of the Lord is not explicitly required by it; to that I reply that I comprehend why that love has been understood to exist rather than expressly required. It is because its necessity is one of those things so evident, that they hardly need to be expressed; it is because the judgment of the heart belongs only to God; and because man, when he judges his fellow-man, can have respect only to the profession of the lips, confirmed by the profession of the life. But there is a third reason, still more important—namely, that it is impossible to separate the love of Christ from the knowledge of Christ; that, in the Christian, the one cannot exist without the other. We cannot love Christ without knowing Him, but we cannot know Him without loving Him. To separate true knowledge and true love would be a pretension contrary to the very nature of our being—a strange divorce, which no enlightened mind would sanction. Thus, then, in its origin, the Alliance requires the love of Jesus.

Yes, the love of Jesus Christ is a necessity of the first order in a union of Christians; but another thing is no less necessary—the knowledge of Jesus Christ. The love of the Lord, if it be not founded on a true and living knowledge of Christ and of His works, is only a mere feeling, without reality, duration, or value in the sight of God. What is the nature—what are the works of Christ which command our love? To know Him I need not open works on theology, apply to great and learned men, enter the halls of academies, or the palaces of kings. You wish not for theological formulas and official declarations, and I will not seek this knowledge from them; but I will go into some mean cabin, I will mount to some poor attic, I will glide into some obscure shop. To God's glory, nevertheless, I must say that I will also enter into mansions, in which, in the midst of earthly riches, there may be found humble hearts rich in Jesus Christ. The cry of a humble, loving soul is what we seek, and the formulas called theological have no other meaning. Yes, little ones of the flock, arouse yourselves, when we are reproached for putting in the foreground incomprehensible formulas. Speak from our place! Tell us that this faith, regarded by some as a scholastic formula, is your light, your peace, your life, your treasure, the honey which flows for you from the rock. What! shall we omit the vital doctrines? Would it be just that an assembly of Christians should forget their Saviour, His eternal glory, and the mystery, the miracle, of His love upon the Cross? Would it be possible for each not to confess, with a single heart, his Immanuel, God with us? When the philosophy of this century denies Thy divinity, O my Saviour!—when it rejects Thine expiation, and Thy mysterious work of regeneration, ought we to be silent?

Yes, the Alliance lays down, as fundamental principles, the Divinity of Christ, the expiatory sacrifice by which He has redeemed us, justification by grace through faith in His blood, and regeneration by the Holy Spirit. All these are found in its basis. But, so far from this profession compromising it, it is, in my view, that which does it most honour. It is the true and living expression of the faith which saves, which consoles, which gives life, which prepares for a blessed eternity.

This is all very well, say some, but it is the Trinity which is our stumblingblock. One word, in reply, on this doctrine—the key of the chest—which the Lord Himself taught in that important hour in which He instructed His disciples how they must baptize and teach all nations. No one has ever regarded the doctrine of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—three persons in one God—except as a mystery—that is, as a truth, a fact, which to us is as yet but incompletely revealed. We know only the outlines, the boundaries, of God's ways, as saith the Scripture. Behind those outlines which to us are revealed are hidden depths to which we cannot descend, of which we have no idea, but which will be revealed to us in eternity, and will then explain to us all that is now inexplicable.

Nevertheless, this mystery is, in some respects, not only explicable, but necessary; we may even say that it is impossible it should be otherwise. I take the Christian the most ignorant of all theology—whether from Geneva, Germany, France, England, or New Zealand, if you will—and I say to him: "Reflect a little and tell me what, according to your own experience of the Bible and of your own heart, God and His work is in relation to yourself." "The work of God on my behalf," he replies, "is that of a sanctifying Spirit which works in me, and effects a transformation in my heart. The work of God on my behalf is (and from this results my peace of soul) that of a Saviour, who has bought me on the Cross, and who gives me pardon. The work of God on my behalf is that of a Father, who not only has loved me with an everlasting love—who not only has created me, but has, hitherto, never ceased to preserve me, and to draw me to the Son, that I might have life." You perceive that this simple Christian will thus affirm that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, is the God of the Christian, his own living and true God. "This consciousness of a triple relationship to God makes us recognise in God a difference; and since Monothism remains always intact at the basis of a Christian faith, we are necessarily led to the idea of a Divine Trinity." This quotation, which is from one of the most learned theologians* of Germany, and of the Church, is the only theological formula which we shall insert in this discourse. We certainly do not reject dogmas; we do not wish to exclude treatises and theological formulas; but we repeat what we before affirmed—that, under the veil of these formulas and dogmas, is found the living faith of Christians. Now the profession of this faith is necessary to the Evangelical Alliance. We shall have here, in September, brethren of many different denominations—Episcopalians and Presbyterians, Reformed and Lutherans, Baptists and Pædo-Baptists, National and Free Churchmen, Calvinists and Wesleyans, and others besides. On account of these very diversities, it is needful that the ground of unity should be clearly and decisively pronounced. The Alliance must have for its basis the Christian faith in its plenitude, to enable it strongly to bind together all these diversities in a real unity.

Nevertheless, it has been demanded that the Evangelical Alliance, without paying attention to doctrines, should receive all who call themselves Christians.
